PREFACE.

IN the following pages it has been the wiſh of the Author to give the moſt accurate and ſatisfactory account of all the proper names which occur in reading the Claſſics, and, by a judicious collection of anecdotes and hiſtorical facts, to draw a picture of ancient times, not leſs inſtructive than entertaining. Such a work, it is hoped, will not be deemed an uſeleſs acquiſition in the hands of the public; and while the ſtudent is initiated in the knowledge of hiſtory and mythology, and familiarized with the ancient ſituation and extent of kingdoms and cities that no longer exiſt, the man of letters may, perhaps, find it not a contemptible companion, from which he may receive information, and be made, a ſecond time, acquainted with many important particulars which time, or more laborious occupations, may have erazed from his memory. In the proſecution of his plan, the author has been obliged to tread in the ſteps of many learned men, whoſe ſtudies have been directed, and not without ſucceſs, to facilitate the attainment of claſſical knowledge, and the ancient languages. Their compoſitions have been to him a ſource of information, and he truſts that their labors have now found new elucidation in his own, and that, by a due conſideration of every ſubject, he has been enabled to imitate their excellencies, without copying their faults. Many compoſitions of the ſame nature have iſſued from the preſs, but they are partial and unſatisfactory. The attempts to be conciſe, have rendered the labors of one barren and uninſtructive, while long and unconnected quotations of paſſages, from Greek and Latin writers, diſfigure the page of the other, and render the whole inſipid and diſguſting. It cannot, therefore, be a diſcouraging employment now, to endeavour to finiſh what others have left imperfect, and, with the conciſeneſs of Stephens, to add the diffuſe reſearches of Lloyd, Hoffman, Collier, &c. After paying due attention to the ancient poets and hiſtorians, from whom the moſt authentic information can be received, the labors of more modern authors have been conſulted, and every compoſition, diſtinguiſhed for the clearneſs and perſpicuity of hiſtorical narration, or geographical deſcriptions, has been carefully examined. Truly ſenſible of what he owes to modern Latin and Engliſh writers and commentators, the author muſt not forget to make a public acknowledgment of the aſſiſtance he has likewiſe received from the labors of the French. In the Siecles Payens of l'Abbé Sabatier de Caſtres, he has found all the information which judicious criticiſm, and a perfect knowledge of heathen mythology, could procure. The compoſitions of l'Abbé Banier, have alſo been uſeful; and in the Dictionaire Hiſtorique, of a literary ſociety, printed at Caen, a treaſure of original anecdotes, and a candid ſelection and arrangement of hiſtorical facts have been diſcovered.

It was the original deſign of the author of this Dictionary, to give a minute explanation of all the names of which Pliny, and other ancient geographers, make mention; but, upon a ſecond conſideration of the ſubject, he was convinced, that it would have increaſed his volume in bulk, and not in value. The learned reader will be ſenſible of the propriety of this remark, when he recollects, that the names of many places mentioned by Pliny and Pauſanias, occur no where elſe in ancient authors, and that to find the true ſituation of an inſignificant village, mentioned by Strabo, no other writer but Strabo is to be conſulted.

This Dictionary being undertaken more particularly for the uſe of ſchools, it has been thought proper to mark the quantity of the penultimate of every word, and to aſſiſt the ſtudent who can receive no fixed and poſitive rules for pronunciation. In this the authority of Smethius has been followed, as alſo Leedes's edition of Labbe's Catholici Indices.

As every publication ſhould be calculated to facilitate literature, and to be ſerviceable to the advancement of the ſciences, the author of this Dictionary did not preſume to intrude himſelf upon the public, before he was ſenſible that his humble labors would be of ſome ſervice to the lovers of the ancient languages. The undertaking was for the uſe of ſchools, therefore he thought none ſo capable of judging of its merit, and of aſcertaining its utility, as thoſe who preſide over the education of youth. With this view, he took the liberty to communicate his intentions to ſeveral gentlemen in that line, not leſs diſtinguiſhed for purity of criticiſm, than for their claſſical abilities, and from them he received all the encouragement which the deſire of contributing to the advancement of learning can expect. To them, therefore, for their approbation and friendly communications, he publicly returns his thanks, and hopes, that, now his labors are completed, his Dictionary may claim from them that patronage, and that ſupport, to which, in their opinion, the ſpecimen of the work ſeemed to be entitled. He has paid due attention to their remarks, he has received with gratitude their judicious obſervations, and cannot paſs over in ſilence their obliging recommendations, and particularly the friendly advice he has received from the Rev. R. Valpy, Maſter of Reading ſchool.

For the accouut of the Roman laws, and for the feſtivals celebrated by the ancient inhabitants of Greece and Italy, he is particularly indebted to the uſeful collections of Archbiſhop Potter, of Godwyn, and Kennet. In the tables of ancient coins, weights, and meaſures, which he has annexed to the body of the Dictionary, he has followed the learned calculations of Dr.

Dr. Arbuthnot. The quoted authorities have been carefully examined, and frequently reviſed; and, it is hoped, the opinions of mythologiſts will appear without confuſion, and be found diveſted of all obſcurity.

Therefore, with all the confidence which an earneſt deſire of being uſeful can command, the author offers the following pages to the public, conſcious that they may contain inaccuracies and imperfections. A Dictionary, the candid reader is well aware, cannot be made perfect all at once; it muſt ſtill have its faults and omiſſions, however cautious and vigilant the author may have been, and in every page there may be found, in the opinion of ſome, room for improvement, and for addition. Before the candid, therefore, and the impartial, he lays his publication, and for whatever obſervations the friendly critic may make, he will ſhew himſelf grateful, and take advantage of the remarks of every judicious reader, ſhould the favors and the indulgence of the public demand a ſecond edition.

PEMBROKE COLLEGE, OXFORD,
NOVEMBER, 1788.

THE very favorable reception which the firſt edition of the Claſſical Dictionary has met from the public, fully evinces the utility of the performance. From the conſciouſneſs of this, the author has ſpared no pains to render this ſecond edition more deſerving of the ſame liberal patronage. The hints of friends, and the animadverſions of critics, have been carefully adopted, and almoſt every article has been corrected and improved. New names have not only been introduced, but the date of events has been more exactly aſcertained; and, therefore, to ſuch as compare the two editions, the improvements will appear numerous and important in every page.

In anſwer to thoſe Gentlemen who have objected againſt the ſmallneſs of the print, and have recommended a larger type, the author begs leave to obſerve, that it has been found impracticable to remove the inconvenience: ſo much matter could not well have been compreſſed in one octavo; and it muſt be remembered, that the book is intended as a volume of occaſional reference, and, therefore, that it cannot long fatigue the eye.

It will be found not an unneceſſary addition, to have an account of the beſt editions of each claſſic at the end of the reſpective character of the authors. Dr. Harwood's plan has in general been attended to, but the price has not been inſerted from its great fluctuation, which often depends more upon the caprice of opinion than upon real value.

The chronological table prefixed to the Dictionary will, it is hoped, be acknowledged univerſally uſeful. It has been compiled with great accuracy, and chiefly extracted from "The Chronology and Hiſtory of the World, by Dr. J. Blair, folio edition, 1754;" and from Archbiſhop Uſher's "Annales Veteris et Novi Teſtamenti," printed at Geneva, folio, 1722.

LONDON,
JULY, 1792.

THE improvements introduced into this third edition will be diſcovered to be numerous and eſſential. The author would have recommended his work to the ſame liberal patronage which the public have already extended to the two preceding impreſſions, without apology, did he not conceive that ſome anſwer is due to the preface of the Bibliotheca Claſſica, publiſhed at Daventer in Holland, in the year 1794. The anonymous editor, whoſe language proves his abilities as a ſcholar, after reflecting with unbecoming ſeverity upon the firſt edition of this work, has not only been guided by the ſame plan, he has not only literally tranſlated and adopted as his own, verbatim, almoſt every article, but he has followed the original ſo cloſely, as even faithfully to copy ſome of the errors which the ſecond edition, publiſhed in 1792, corrected, and which, in a compoſition ſo voluminous and ſo complex, it is not poſſible for the moſt minute attention to avoid. Such an attack muſt, therefore, be deemed as illiberal as it is unfriendly; but, however, far from wiſhing to detract from the merit of judgment and perſeverance in the tranſlator, the author conſiders himſelf indebted to him for the elegance and the correctneſs of the language in which he has made the Dictionary appear in a Latin dreſs, and conſequently for the recommendation which he has given to his labors among the learned on the Continent.

The chronology of the Arundelian Marbles begins about this time, fixing here the arrival of Cecrops into Attica, an epoch which other writers have placed later by 26 years —	1582
Moſes born — — — —	1571

* In the following table, I have confined myſelf to the more eaſy and convenient eras of before, (B. C.) and after, (A. D.) Chriſt. For the ſake of thoſe, however, that do not wiſh the excluſion of the Julian period, it is neceſſary to obſerve, that, as the firſt year of the Chriſtian era always falls on the 4714th of the Julian years, the number required either before or after Chriſt, will eaſily be diſcovered by the application of the rules of ſubſtraction or addition. The era from the foundation of Rome (A. U. C.) will be found with the ſame facility, by recollecting that the city was built 753 years before Chriſt; and the Olympiads can likewiſe be recurred to by the conſideration, that the conqueſt of Coræbus (B. C. 776.) forms the firſt Olympiad, and that the Olympic games were celebrated after the revolution of four years.

	B. C.
The kingdom of Athens begun under Cecrops, who came from Egypt with a colony of Saites. This happened about 780 years before the firſt Olympiad — — —	1556

Troy taken after a ſiege of 10 years. Æneas ſails to Italy	1184
Alba Longa built by Aſcanius — —	1152
Migration of the Æolian colonies — —	1124
The return of the Heraclidæ into Peloponneſus, 80 years after the taking of Troy. Two years after, they divide the Peloponneſus among themſelves; and here, therefore, begins the kingdom of Lacedæmon under Euryſthenes and Procles —	1104
Saul made king over Iſrael — —	1095
The kingdom of Sicyon ended — —	1088
The kingdom of Athens ends in the death of Codrus —	1070
The migration of the Ionian colonies from Greece, and their ſettlement in Aſia Minor — — —	1044
Dedication of Solomon's temple — —	1004
Samos built — — —	986
Homer and Heſiod floriſhed about this time, according to the Marbles — — — —	907
Lycurgus, 42 years old, eſtabliſhed his laws at Lacedæmon, and, together with Iphitus and Cleoſthenes, reſtores the Olympic games at Elis, about 108 years before the era, which is commonly called the firſt Olympiad — —	884
Phidon, king of Argos, is ſuppoſed to have invented ſcales and meaſures, and coined ſilver at Ægina. Carthage built by Dido — — — —	869
Fall of the Aſſyrian empire by the death of Sardanapalus, an era placed 80 years earlier by Juſtin — —	820
The kingdom of Macedonia begins, and continues 646 years, till the battle of Pydna — — —	814
The kingdom of Lydia begins, and continues 249 year	797

The

Achabȳtos, a lofty mountain in Rhodes, where Jupiter had a temple.

Achæa, a ſirname of Pallas, whoſe temple in Daunia was defended by dogs who fawned upon the Greeks, but fiercely attacked all other perſons. Ariſtot. de Mirab.—Ceres was called Achæa, from her lamentations (αχος) at the loſs of Proſerpine. Plut. in Iſid. & Oſir.

Achæi, the deſcendants of Achæus, at firſt inhabited the country near Argos, but being driven by the Heraclidæ 80 years after the Trojan war, they retired among the Ionians, whoſe 12 cities they ſeized and kept. The names of theſe cities are Pelena, Ægira, Æges, Bura, Tritæa, Ægion, Rhypæ, Olenos, Helice, Patræ, Dyme, and Pharæ. The inhabitants of theſe three laſt began a famous confederacy, 284 years B. C. which continued formidable upwards of 130 years, under the name of the Achæan league, and was moſt illuſtrious whilſt ſupported by the ſplendid virtues and abilities of Aratus and Philopœmen. Their arms were directed againſt the Ætolians for three years, with the aſſiſtance of Philip of Macedon, and they grew powerful by the acceſſion of neighbouring ſtates, and freed their country from foreign ſlavery, till at laſt they were attacked by the Romans, and, after one year's hoſtilities, the Achæan league was totally deſtroyed, B. C. 147. The Achæans extended the borders of their country by conqueſt, and even planted colonies in Magna Græcia.—The name of Achæi is generally applied to all the Greeks indiſcriminately, by the poets. Vid. Achaia. Herodot. 1, c. 145, l. 8, c. 36.—*Stat. ACHELORIUM, a river of Theſſaly. Polyæn. 8.

ACHELŌUS, the ſon of Oceanus & Terra or Tethys, god of the river of the ſame name in Epirus. As one of the numerous ſuitors of Dejanira, daughter of Œneus, he entered the liſts againſt Hercules, and being inferior, changed himſelf into a ſerpent, and afterwards into an ox. Hercules broke off one of his horns, and Achelous being defeated, retired into his bed of waters. The broken horn was given to the goddeſs of Plenty. Some ſay that he was changed into a river after the victory of Hercules. This river is in Epirus, and riſes in mount Pindus, and after dividing Acarnania from Ætolia, falls into the Ionian ſea. The ſand and mud which it carries down, have formed ſome iſlands at its mouth. This river is ſaid by ſome to have ſprung from the earth after the deluge. Herodot. 2, c. 10,—Strab. 10.—*Ovid. ACHERĬMI, a people of Sicily. Cic. 3 in Verr.

ACHĔRON, a river of Theſprotia, in Epirus, falling into the bay of Ambracia. Homer called it, from the dead appearance of its waters, one of the rivers of hell, and the fable has been adopted by all ſucceeding poets, who make the god of the ſtream to be the ſon of Ceres without a father, and ſay that he concealed himſelf in hell for fear of the Titans, and was changed into a bitter ſtream, over which the ſouls of the dead are at firſt conveyed. It receives, ſay they, the the ſouls of the dead, becauſe a deadly languor ſeizes them at the hour of diſſolution. Some make him ſon of Titan, and ſuppoſe that he was plunged into hell by Jupiter, for ſupplying the Titans with water. The word Acheron is often taken for hell itſelf. Horat. 1, od. 3, v. 36.—Virg. G. 2, v. 292. Æn. 2, v. 295, &c.—Strab. 7.—Lucan. 3, v. 16.—Sil. 2 Silv. 6, v. 80.—Liv. 8, c. 24.——A river of Elis in Peloponneſus.——Another on the Riphæan mountains. Orpheus.——Alſo a river in the country of the Brutii in Italy. Juſtin. 12, c. 2.

ACHERONTIA, a town of Apulia on a mountain, thence called Nidus by Horat. 3, od. 4, v. 14.

ACHERŪSIA, a lake of Campania near Capua. Diodorus, lib. 1. mentions, that in Egypt, the bodies of the dead were conveyed over a lake called Acheruſia, and received ſentence according to the actions of their life. ACHILLEUS or AQUILEUS, a Roman general in Egypt, in the reign of Diocletian, who rebelled, and for 5 years maintained the Imperial dignity at Alexandria. Diocletian at laſt marched againſt him; and becauſe he had ſupported a long ſiege, the emperor ordered him to be devoured by lions.

ACHILLĒA, a peninſula near the mouth of the Boryſthenes. Mela 2, c. 1.—Herodot. 4, c. 55 & 76.——An iſland at the mouth of the Iſter, where was the tomb of Achilles, over which it is ſaid that birds never flew. Plin. 10, c. 29.—A fountain of Miletus, whoſe waters riſe ſalted from the earth, and afterwards ſweeten in their courſe. Athen. 2, c. 2.

ACHILLEIENSES, a people near Macedonia. Xenoph. Hiſt. Græc. 3.

ACHILLĒIS, a poem of Statius, in which he deſcribes the education and memorable actions of Achilles. This compoſition is imperfect. The poet's immature death deprived the world of a valuable hiſtory of the life and exploits of this famous hero.

ACHILLES, the ſon of Peleus and Thetis, was the braveſt of all the Greeks in the Trojan war. During his infancy, Thetis plunged him in the Styx, and made every part of his body invulnerable, except the heel, by which ſhe held him. His education was entruſted to the centaur Chiron, who taught him the art of war, and made him maſter of muſic, and by feeding him with the marrow of wild beaſts, rendered him vigorous and active. He was taught eloquence by Phœnix, whom he ever after loved and reſpected. Thetis, to prevent him from going to the Trojan war, where ſhe knew he was to periſh, privately ſent him to the court of Lycomedes, where he was diſguiſed in a female dreſs, and, by his familiarity with the king's daughters, made Deidamia mother of Neoptolemus. As Troy could not be taken without the aid of Achilles, Ulyſſes went to the court of Lycomedes, in the habit of a merchant, and expoſed jewels and arms to ſale. Achilles, chuſing the arms, diſcovered his ſex, and went to war. Vulcan, at the entreaties of Thetis, made him a ſtrong armour, which was proof againſt all weapons. He was deprived by Agamemnon of his favorite miſtreſs, Briſeis, who had fallen to his lot at the diviſion of the booty of Lyrneſſus. For this affront, he refuſed to appear in the field till the death of his friend Patroclus recalled him to action, and to revenge. [Vid. Patroclus.] He ſlew Hector, the bulwark of Troy, tied the corpſe by the heels to his chariot, and dragged it three times round the walls of Troy. After thus appeaſing the ſhades of his friend, he permitted old Priam to ranſom and to carry away Hector's body. In the 10th year of the war, Achilles was charmed with Polyxena; and as he ſolicited her hand in the temple of Minerva, it is ſaid that Paris aimed an arrow at his vulnerable heel, of which wound he died. His body was buried at Sigæum, and divine honors were paid to him, and temples raiſed to his memory. It is ſaid, that after the taking of Troy, the ghoſt of Achilles appeared to the Greeks, and demanded of them Polyxena, who accordingly was ſacrificed on his tomb by his ſon Neoptolemus. Some ſay that this ſacrifice was voluntary, and that Polyxena was ſo grieved at his death that ſhe killed herſelf on his tomb. The Theſſalians yearly ſacrificed a black and a white bull on his tomb. It is reported that he married Helen after the ſiege of Troy; but others maintain, that this marriage happened after his death, in the iſland of Leuce, where many of the ancient heroes lived, as in a ſeparate elyſium. [Vid. Leuce.] When Achilles was young, his mother aſked him, whether he preferred a long life, ſpent in obſcurity and retirement, or a few years of military fame and glory? and that, to his honor, he made choice of the latter. Some ages after the Trojan war, Alexander, going to the conqueſt of Perſia, offered ſacrifices on the tomb of Achilles, and admired the hero who had found a Homer to publiſh his fame to poſterity. Xenoph. de venat.—*Plut. in Alex. Acrisioneus, a patronymic applied to the Argives, from Acrisius, one of their ancient kings, or from Acrisione a town of Argolis, called after a daughter of Acrisius of the same name. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 410.

Acrisioniădes, a patronymic of Perseus, from his grandfather Acrisius. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 70.

Acrisius, son of Abas, king of Argos, by Ocalea, daughter of Mantineus. He was born at the same birth as Prœtus, with whom it is said that he quarrelled even in his mother's womb. After many dissensions, Prœtus was driven from Argos. Acrisius had Danae by Eurydice daughter of Lacedæmon; and being told by an oracle, that his daughter's son would put him to death, he confined Danae in a brazen tower, to prevent her becoming a mother. She however became pregnant, by Jupiter changed into a golden shower; and tho' Acrisius ordered her, and her infant called Perseus, to be exposed on the sea, yet they were saved; and Perseus soon after became so famous for his actions, that Acrisius, anxious to see so renowned a grandson, went to Larissa. Here Perseus, wishing to shew his skill in throwing a quoit, killed an old man who proved to be his grandfather, whom he knew not, and thus the oracle was fulfilled. Acrisius reigned about 31 years. Hygin. fab. 63.—Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 16.—Horat. 3, od. 16.—Apollod. 2, c. 2, &c.—Paus. 2, c. 16, &c.—Vid. Danae, Perseus, Polydectes.

Admētus, ſon of Pheres and Clymene, king of Pheræ in Theſſaly, married Theone daughter of Theſtor, and after her death, Alceſte daughter of Pelias. Apollo, when baniſhed from heaven, is ſaid to have tended his flocks for nine years, and to have obtained from the Parcæ, that Admetus ſhould never die, if another perſon laid down his life for him. This was chearfully done by Alceſte.—Admetus was one of the Argonauts, and was at the hunt of the Calydonian boar. Pelias promiſed his daughter in marriage only to him who could bring him a chariot drawn by a lion and a wild boar. Admetus did this by the aid of Apollo, and obtained Alceſte in marriage. Some ſay that Hercules brought him back Alceſte from hell. Senec. in Medea.—Hygin. fab. 50, 51, & 243.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 3.—Apollod. 1, c. 8 & 9, &c.—Tibull. 2 el. 3.—Pauſ. 5. c. 17.——A king of the Moloſſi, to whom Themiſtocles fled for protection. *C. Adōnia, feſtivals in honor of Adonis, firſt celebrated at Byblos in Phœnicia. They laſted two days, the firſt of which was ſpent in howlings and lamentations, the ſecond in joyful joyful clamors, as if Adonis was returned to life. In ſome towns of Greece and Egypt they laſted eight days. Only women were admitted, and ſuch as did not appear were compelled to proſtitute themſelves for one day. The time of the celebration was ſuppoſed to be very unlucky. The fleet of Nicias ſailed from Athens to Sicily on that day, whence many unfortunate omens were drawn. Plut. in Nicia.—Ammian. 22, c. 9.

ADŌNIS, ſon of Cinyras, by his daughter Myrrha, [vid. Myrrha] was the favorite of Venus. He was fond of hunting, and was often cautioned by his miſtreſs not to hunt wild beaſts, for fear of being killed in the attempt. This advice he ſlighted, and at laſt received a mortal bite from a wild boar which he had wounded, and Venus, after ſhedding many tears at his death, changed him into a flower called anemony. Proſerpine is ſaid to have reſtored him to life, on condition that he ſhould ſpend ſix months with her, and the reſt of the year with Venus. This implies the alternate return of ſummer and winter. Adonis is often taken for Oſiris, becauſe the feſtivals of both were often begun with mournful lamentations, and finiſhed with a revival of joy, as if they were returning to life again.—Adonis had temples raiſed to his memory, and is ſaid by ſome to have been beloved by Apollo and Bacchus. —Apollod. 3, c. 14.—Propert. 2, el. 13, v. 53.—*Virg. ADRIANOPŎLIS, a town of Thrace on the Hebrus.—Another in Ætolia,—Piſidia, and Bithynia.

ADRIĀNUS, or Hadrianus, the 15th emperor of Rome. He is repreſented as an active, learned, warlike and auſtere general. He came to Britain, where he built a wall between the modern towns of Carliſle and Newcaſtle 60 miles long, to protect the Britons from the incurſions of the Caledonians. He killed in battle 500,000 Jews who had rebelled, and built a city on the ruins of Jeruſalem, which he called Ælia. His memory was ſo retentive, that he remembered every incident of his life, and knew all the ſoldiers of his army by name. He was the firſt emperor who wore a long beard, and this he did did to hide the warts on his face. His successors followed his example not through necessity, but for ornament. Adrian went always bareheaded, and in long marches generally travelled on foot. In the beginning of his reign, he followed the virtues of his adopted father and predecessor Trajan; he remitted all arrears due to his treasury for 16 years, and publicly burnt the account-books, that his word might not be suspected. His peace with the Parthians proceeded from a wish of punishing the other enemies of Rome, more than from the effects of fear. The travels of Adrian were not for the display of imperial pride, but to see whether justice was distributed impartially; and public favor was courted by a condescending behaviour, and the meaner familiarity of bathing with the common people. It is said that he wished to enrol Christ among the gods of Rome; but his apparent lenity towards the Christians was disproved, by the erection of a statue to Jupiter on the spot where Jesus rose from the dead, and one to Venus on mount Calvary. The weight of diseases become intolerable. Adrian attempted to destroy himself; and when prevented, he exclaimed, that the lives of others were in his hands, but not his own. He wrote an account of his life, and published it under the name of one of his domestics. He died of a dysentery at Baiæ, July 10. A. D. 138. in the 72d year of his age, after a reign of 21 years. Dio.—An officer of Lucullus. Plut. in Luc.—A rhetorician of Tyre in the age of M. ÆA, a huntress changed into an island of the same name by the gods, to rescue her from the pursuit of her lover, the river Phasis. It had a town called Æa, which was the capital of Colchis. Flacc. 5, v. 426.—A town of Thessaly.—Of Africa.—A fountain of Macedonia near Amydon.

ÆACĒA, games at Ægina, in honor of Æacus.

ÆACĬDAS, a king of Epirus, son of Neoptolemus, and brother to Olympias. He was expelled by his subjects for his continual wars with Macedonia. He left a son, Pyrrhus, only two years old, whom Chaucus king of Illyricum educated. Pauf. 1, c. 11.

ÆACĬDES, a patronymic of the descendants of Æacus, such as Achilles, Peleus, Pyrrhus, &c. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 103, &c.

ÆĂCUS, son of Jupiter by Ægina daughter of Asopus, was king of the island of Œnopia, which he called by his mother's name. A pestilence having destroyed all his subjects, he entreated Jupiter to re-people his kingdom; and according to his desire, all the ants which were in an old oak were changed into men, and called by Æacus myrmidons, from μυρμηξ, an ant.—Æacus married Endeis, by whom he had Telamon and Peleus. He afterwards had Phocus by Psamathe, one of the Nereids. He was a man of such integrity that the antients have made him one of the judges of hell, with Minos and Rhadamanthus. Horat. 2, od. 13, l. 4, od. 8.—Pauf. 1, c. 44. l. 2, c. 29.—Ovid. Met. 7, fab. 25, l. 13, v. 25.—Propert. 4, el. 12.—Plut. de consol. ad Apoll.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.

ÆÆ, ÆA, or ÆÆA, an island of Colchis, in the Phasis. Apollon. 3.

ÆÆA, a name given to Circe, because born at Ææ. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 386.

ÆANTĒUM, a city of Troas, where Ajax was buried. Plin. 5, c. 30.—An island near the Thracian Chersonesus, Id. 4, c. 12.

ÆANTĬDES, a tyrant of Lampsacus, intimate with Darius. He married a daughter of Hippias, tyrant of Athens. Thucyd. 6, c. 59.—One of the 7 poets, called Pleiades.

ÆANTIS, an Athenian tribe. Plut. Symp. 2.

ÆAS, a river of Epirus falling into the Ionian sea. In the fable of Io, Ovid describes it as falling into the Peneus, and meeting other rivers at Tempe. This some have supposed to be a geographical mistake of the poet. Lucan 6, v. 361.—Ovid Met. 1, v. 580.

ÆĀTUS, son of Philip, and brother of Polyclea, was descended from Hercules. An oracle having said that whoever of the two touched the land after crossing the Achelous should obtain the kingdom, Polyclea pretended to be lame, and prevailed upon her brother to carry her across on his shoulders. When they came near the opposite side, Polyclea leaped ashore from her brother's back, exclaiming that the kingdom was her own. Æatus joined her in her exclamation, and afterwards married her, and reigned conjointly with her. Their son Thessalus gave his name to Thessaly. Polyæn. 8.

ÆCHMACŎRAS, a son of Hercules, by Phyllone, daughter of Alcimedon. When the father heard that his daughter had had a child, he exposed her and the infant in the woods to wild beasts, where Hercules, conducted by the noise of a magpye which imitated the cries of a child, found and delivered them. Pauf. 8, c. 12.

ÆCHMIS, succeeded his father Polymnestor on the throne of Arcadia, in the reign reign of Theopompus of Sparta. Paus. 8. c. 5.

ÆDEPSUM, a town of Eubœa. Plin. 4. c. 12.—Strab. 10.

ÆDESSA, or Edeſſa, a town near Pella. Caranus king of Macedonia took it by following goats that ſought ſhelter from the rain, and called it, from that circumſtance (αιγας, capras) Ægeas. It was the burying-place of the Macedonian kings; and an oracle had ſaid, that as long as the kings were buried there, ſo long would their kingdom ſubſiſt. Alexander was buried in a different place; and on that account, ſome authors have ſaid that the kingdom became extinct. Juſtin. 7, c. 1.

ÆDICŬLA Ridiculi, a temple raiſed to the god of mirth, from the following circumſtance: after the battle of Cannæ, Hannibal marched to Rome, whence he was driven back by the inclemency of the weather; which cauſed ſo much joy in Rome, that the Romans raiſed a temple to the god of mirth. This deity was worſhipped at Sparta. Plut. in Lyc. Agid. & Cleom.—Pauſanias alſo mentions a Θεὸς γελωτος.

ÆDĪLES, Roman magiſtrates, that had the care of all buildings, baths and aqueducts, and examined the weights and meaſures, that nothing might be ſold without its due value. There were three different ſorts; the Ædiles Plebeii, or Minores; the Majores Ædiles, and the Ædiles Cereales.—The plebeian ediles were two, firſt created with the tribunes; they preſided over the more minute affairs of the ſtate, good order, and the reparation of the ſtreets. They procured all the proviſions of the city, and executed the decrees of the people. The Majores and Cereales had greater privileges, though they at firſt ſhared in the labor of the plebeian ediles; they appeared with more pomp, and were allowed to ſit publicly in ivory chairs. The office of an edile was honorable, and was always the primary ſtep to greater honors in the republic. The ediles were choſen from the plebeians for 127 years, till A. U. C. 338. Vid. Liv. L. L. 4. c. 14.—Cic. Legib. 3.

ÆDIPSUS, a town in Eubœa.

ÆDON, daughter of Pandarus, married Zethus brother to Amphion, by whom ſhe had a ſon called Itylus. She was ſo jealous of her ſiſter Niobe, becauſe ſhe had more children than herſelf, that ſhe reſolved to murder the elder, who was educated with Itylus. She by miſtake killed her own ſon, and was changed into a nightingale as ſhe attempted to kill herſelf. Homer. Od. 19, v. 518.

ÆDUI, or Hedui, a powerful nation of Celtic Gaul known for their valor in the wars of Cæſar. When their country was invaded by this celebrated general, they were at the head of a faction in oppoſition to the Sequani and their partiſans, and they had eſtabliſhed their ſuperiority in frequent battles. To ſupport their cauſe, however, the Sequani obtained the aſſiſtance of Arioviſtus king of Germany, and ſoon defeated their opponents. The arrival of Cæſar changed the face of affairs, the Ædui were reſtored to the ſovereignty of the country, and the artful Roman, by employing one faction againſt the other, was enabled to conquer them all, though the inſurrection of Ambiorix, and that more powerfully ſupported by Vercingetorix, ſhook for a while the dominion of Rome in Gaul, and checked the career of the conqueror. Cæſ. in bell. G.

ÆĒTA, or Æetes king of Colchis, ſon of Sol, and Perſeis daughter of Oceanus, was father of Medea, Abſyrtus and Chalciope, by Idya, one of the Oceanides. He killed Phryxus ſon of Athamas, who had fled to his court on a golden ram. This murder he committed to obtain the fleece of the golden ram. The Argonauts came againſt Colchis, and recovered the golden fleece by means of Medea, though it was guarded by bulls that breathed fire, and by a venomous dragon. Their expedition has been celebrated by all the ancient poets. [Vid. Jaſon, Medea, and Phryxus.] Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Ovid. Met. 7, fab. 1, &c.—Pauſ. 2, c. 3.—Juſtin 42, c. 2.—Flacc. & Orpheus in Argon.

ÆETIAS, a patronymic given to Medea, as daughter of Æetes. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 9.

ÆGA, an iſland of the Ægean ſea between Tenedos and Chios.

ÆGĒAS, a town, whoſe inhabitants are called Ægeates. [Vid. Ædeſſa.]

ÆGÆ, a city of Macedonia, the ſame as Edeſſa. Some writers make them different, but Juſtin proves this to be erroneous, 7, c. 1.—Plin. 4, c. 10.——A town of Eubœa, whence Neptune is called Ægæus. Strab. 9.

ÆGÆÆ, a town and ſea port of Cilicia. Lucan. 3, v. 227.

ÆGÆON, one of Lycaon's 50 ſons. Apollod. 3, c. 8.——The ſon of Cœlus, or of Pontus and Terra, the ſame as Briareus. [Vid. Briareus.] It is ſuppoſed that he was a notorious pirate chiefly reſiding at Ægæ, whence his name; and that the fable about his 100 hands ariſes from his having 100 men to manage his oars in his piratical excurſions. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 565.

ÆGÆUM MARE (now Archipelago) part of the Mediterranean, dividing Greece from Aſia Minor. It is full of iſlands, ſome of which are called Cyclades, others Sporades, &c. The word Ægeum is derived by ſome from Ægæ, a town of Eubœa; or from the number of iſlands which it contains, that appear above the ſea, as αιγες, goats; or from the the promontory Æga, or from Ægea, a queen of the Amazons; or from Ægeus, who is ſuppoſed to have drowned himſelf there. Plin. 4, c. 11.—Strab. 7.

ÆGÆUS, a ſirname of Neptune, from Ægæ in Eubœa. Strab. 9.——A river of Corcyra.——A plain in Phocis.

ÆGALEOS, or Ægaleum, a mountain of Attica oppoſite Salamis, on which Xerxes ſat during the engagement of his fleet with the Grecian ſhips in the adjacent ſea. Herodot. 8, c. 90.——Thucyd. 2, c. 19.

ÆGAN, [Græc. αἰγαν or αἰγαων] the Ægean ſea. Stat. Theb. 5, v. 56.

ÆGAS, a place of Eubœa.—Another near Daunia in Italy. Polyb. 3.

ÆGĀTES, a promontory of Æolia.——Three Iſlands oppoſite Carthage, called Aræ by Virg. Æn. 1. near which the Romans, in the firſt Punic war, defeated the Carthaginian fleet, under Hanno, 242 B. C. Liv. 21, c. 10 & 41, l. 22, c. 54.—Mela 2, c. 7.

ÆGĒLEON, a town of Macedonia taken by king Attalus. Liv. 31, c. 46.

ÆGĒRIA. Vid. Egeria.

ÆGESTA, the daughter of Hippotes, and mother of Ægeſtus called Aceſtes. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 554.——An ancient town of Sicily near mount Eryx, deſtroyed by Agathocles. It was ſometimes called Segeſta and Aceſta. Diod. 10.

ÆGEUS, king of Athens, ſon of Pandion, being deſirous of having children, went to conſult the oracle, and in his return, ſtopped at the court of Pittheus king of Troezene, who gave him his daughter Æthra in marriage. He left her pregnant, and told her, that if ſhe had a ſon, to ſend him to Athens as ſoon as he could lift a ſtone under which he had concealed his ſword. By this ſword he was to be known to Ægeus, who did not wiſh to make any public diſcovery of a ſon, for fear of his nephews, the Pallantides, who expected his crown. Æthra became mother of Theſeus, whom ſhe accordingly ſent to Athens with his father's ſword. At that time Ægeus lived with Medea, the divorced wife of Jaſon. When Theſeus came to Athens, Medea attempted to poiſon him; but he eſcaped, and upon ſhewing Ægeus the ſword he wore, diſcovered himſelf to be his ſon. When Theſeus returned from Crete after the death of the Minotaur, he forgot, agreeable to the engagement made with his father, to hoiſt up white ſails as a ſignal of his ſucceſs; and Ægeus, at the ſight of black ſails, concluding that his ſon was dead, threw himſelf from a high rock into the ſea; which, from him, as ſome ſuppoſe, has been called the Ægean. Ægeus reigned 48 years, and died B. C. 1235. [Vid. Theſeus, Minotaurus and Medea.] Apollod. 1, c. 8, 9. l. 3, c. 15.—Pauſ. 1, c. 5, 22, 38, l. 4, c. 2.—Plut. in Theſ.—Hygin. fab. 37 & 43.

ÆGIĂLE, one of Phaeton's ſiſters changed into poplars, and their tears into amber. They are called Heliades.——A daughter of Adraſtus, by Amphitea daughter of Pronax. She married Diomedes, in whoſe abſence, during the Trojan War, ſhe proſtituted herſelf to her ſervants, and chiefly to Cometes, whom the king had left maſter of his houſe. At his return, Diomedes being told of his wife's wantonneſs, went to ſettle in Daunia. Some ſay that Venus implanted thoſe vicious and luſtful propenſities in Ægiale, to revenge herſelf on Diomedes, who had wounded her in the Trojan war. Ovid in Ib. v. 350.—Homer Il. 5. v. 412. Apollod. 1, c. 9.——Stat. 3, Silv. 5, v. 48.

ÆGIĂLEA, an iſland near Peloponneſus, in the Cretan ſea.——Another in the Ionian ſea, near the Echinades. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Herodot. 4, c. 107.——The ancient name of Peloponneſus.

ÆGIALEUS, ſon of Adraſtus by Amphitea or Demoanaſſa, was one of the Epigoni, i. e. one of the ſons of thoſe generals who were killed in the firſt Theban war. They went againſt the Thebans, who had refuſed to give burial to their fathers, and were victorious. They all returned home ſafe, except Ægialeus, who was killed. That expedition is called the war of the Epigoni. Pauſ. 1, c. 43, 44. l. 2, c. 20. l. 9, c. 5.—Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 3, c. 7.——The ſame as Abſyrtus brother to Medea. Juſtin. 42, c. 3.

ÆGIĂLUS, ſon of Phoroneus, was entruſted with the kingdom of Achaia by king Apis going to Egypt. Peloponneſus was called Ægialea from him.——A man who founded the kingdom of Sicyon 2091 before the chriſtian era, and reigned 52 years.

ÆGIALUS, a name given to part of Peloponneſus. [Vid. Achaia.] Pauſ. 5. c. 1, l. 7. c. 1.—An inconſiderable town of Pontus.——A city of Aſia Minor.——A city of Thrace near the Strymon.——A mountain of Galatia.——A city of Pontus.——Another in Æthiopia.

ÆGĪDES, a patronymic of Theſeus. Homer Il. 1, v. 265.

ÆGĪLA, a place in Laconia, where Ariſtomenes was taken priſoner by a crowd of religious women whom he had attacked. Pauſ. 4, c. 17.

ÆGILIA, an iſland between Crete and Peloponneſus.—A place in Eubœa. Herodot. 6, c. 101.

ÆGIMIUS, an old man who lived, according to Anacreon, 200 years. Plin. 7, c. 48.

c. 48.——A king of Doris, whom Hercules aſſiſted to conquer the Lapithæ. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

ÆGIMŌRUS or ÆGIMŪRUS, an iſland near Libya, ſuppoſed to be the ſame which Virgil mentions under the name of Araæ. Plin. 5, c. 7.

ÆGĪNA, daughter of Aſopus, had Æacus by Jupiter changed into a flame of fire. She afterwards married Actor, ſon of Myrmidon, by whom ſhe had ſome children, who conſpired againſt their father. Some ſay that ſhe was changed by Jupiter into the iſland which bears her name. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Strab. 8.—Mela 2, c. 7.—Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 3, c. 12.—Pauſ. 2, c. 5 & 29.——An iſland formerly called Œnopia and now Engia, in a part of the Ægean ſea, called Saronicus Sinus, about 22 miles in circumference. The inhabitants were once deſtroyed by a peſtilence, and the country was repeopled by ants changed into men by Jupiter, at the prayer of king Æacus. They were very powerful by ſea, and gave themſelves to Darius when he demanded ſubmiſſion from all the Greeks. The Athenians under Pericles made war againſt them; and after taking 70 of their ſhips in a naval battle, they expelled them from Ægina. The fugitives ſettled in Peloponneſus, and after the ruin of Athens by Lyſander, they returned to their country, but never after roſe to their former power or conſequence. Herodot. 5, 6 & 7.—Pauſ. 2, c. 29.—Strab. 8.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 10.

ÆGINĒTA PAULUS, a phyſician born in Ægina. He floriſhed in the age of Galen, whoſe compoſitions he reviſed and publiſhed in ſeven books.

ÆGĪNĒTES, a king of Arcadia, in whoſe age Lycurgus inſtituted his famous laws. Pauſ. 1, c. 5.

ÆGIŎCHUS, a ſirname of Jupiter, from his uſing the goat Amalthæa's ſkin, inſtead of a ſhield, in the war of the Titans. Diod. 5.

ÆGĬPAN, a name of Pan, becauſe he had goat's feet.

ÆGĪRA, a town between Ætolia and Peloponneſus.——A town of Achaia. Pauſ. 7, c. 26.—Herodot. 1, c. 145.

ÆGIROESSA, a town of Ætolia. Herodot. 1, c. 149.

ÆGIS, the ſhield of Jupiter, απο της αιγος a goat's ſkin. This was the goat Amalthæa, with whoſe ſkin he covered his ſhield. The goat was placed among the conſtellations. Jupiter gave this ſhield to Pallas, who placed upon it Meduſa's head, which turned into ſtones all thoſe who fixed their eyes upon it. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 352 & 435.

ÆGISTHUS, king of Argos, was ſon of Thyeſtes by his daughter Pelopea. Thyeſtes being at variance with his brother Atreus, was told by the oracle, that his wrongs could be revenged only by a ſon born of himſelf and his daughter. To avoid ſuch an inceſt, Pelopea had been conſecrated to the ſervice of Minerva by her father, who ſome time after met her in a wood, and raviſhed her, without knowing who ſhe was. Pelopea kept the ſword of her raviſher, and finding it to be her father's, expoſed the child ſhe had brought forth. The child was preſerved, and when grown up, preſented with the ſword of his mother's raviſher. Pelopea, ſoon after this melancholy adventure, had married her uncle Atreus, who received into his houſe her natural ſon. As Thyeſtes had debauched the firſt wife of Atreus, Atreus ſent Ægiſthus to put him to death; but Thyeſtes knowing the aſſaſſin's ſword, diſcovered he was his own ſon, and, fully to revenge his wrongs, ſent him back to murder Atreus. After this murder Thyeſtes aſcended the throne, and baniſhed Agamemnon and Menelaus, the ſons, or as others ſay, the grandſons of Atreus. Theſe children were taken care of by Œneus, king of Ætolia. By their marriage with the daughters of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, they were impowered to recover the kingdom of Argos, to which Agamemnon ſucceeded, while Menelaus reigned in his father-in-law's place. Ægiſthus had been reconciled to the ſons of Atreus; and when they went to the Trojan war, he was left guardian of Agamemnon's kingdoms, and of his wife Clytemneſtra. Ægiſthus fell in love with Clytemneſtra, and lived with her. On Agamemnon's return, theſe two adulterers murdered him, and, by a public marriage, ſtrengthened themſelves on the throne of Argos. Oreſtes, Agamemnon's ſon, would have ſhared his father's fate, had not his ſiſter Electra privately ſent him to his uncle Strophius, king of Phocis, where he contracted the moſt intimate friendſhip with his couſin Pylades. Some time after, Oreſtes came to Mycenæ, the reſidence of Ægiſthus, and reſolved to puniſh the murderers of his father, in conjunction with Electra, who lived in diſguiſe in the tyrant's family. To effect this more effectually, Electra publicly declared that her brother Oreſtes was dead; upon which Ægiſthus and Clytemneſtra went to the temple of Apollo, to return thanks to the god for his death. Oreſtes, who had ſecretly concealed himſelf in the temple, attacked them, and put them both to death, after a reign of ſeven years. They were buried without the city walls. [Vid. Agamemnon, Thyeſtes, Oreſtes, Clytemneſtra, Pylades, & Electra.] Ovid. de Rem. Am. 161. Triſt. 2, v. 396.——Hygin. fab. 87 & 88.——Ælian.

ÆGYPTA, a freedman of Cicero, ad. Attic. 8.

ÆGYPTII, the inhabitants of Egypt. [Vid. Ægyptus.]

ÆGYPTIUM MARE, that part of the Mediterranean ſea which is on the coaſt of Egypt.

ÆGYPTUS, ſon of Belus, and brother to Danaus, gave his 50 ſons in marriage to the 50 daughters of his brother. Danaus, who had eſtabliſhed himſelf at Argos, and was jealous of his brother, obliged all his daughters to murder their huſbands the firſt night of their nuptials. This was executed; but Hypermneſtra alone ſpared her huſband Lynceus. Even Ægyptus was killed by his niece Polyxena. Vid. Danaus, Danaïdes, Lynceus.——Ægyptus was king, after his father, of a part of Africa, which from him has been called Ægyptus. Hygin. fab. 168, 170.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Ovid. Heroid. 14. —Pauſ. 7, c. 21.——An extenſive country of Africa watered by the Nile, bounded on the eaſt by Arabia, and on the weſt by Libya. Its name is derived from Ægyptus brother to Danaus. Its extent, according to modern calculation, is 180 leagues from north to ſouth, and it meaſures 120 leagues on the ſhore of the Mediterranean; but at the diſtance of 50 leagues from the ſea, it diminiſhes ſo much as ſcarce to meaſure 7 or 8 leagues between the mountains on the eaſt and weſt. It is divided into lower, which lies near the Mediterranean, and upper, which is towards the ſouth. Upper Egypt was famous for the town of Thebes, but Lower Egypt was the moſt peopled, and contained the Delta, a number of large iſlands, which, from their form, have been called after the fourth letter of the Greek alphabet. This country has been the mother of arts and ſciences. The greateſt part of Lower Egypt has been formed by the mud and ſand carried down by the Nile. The Egyptians reckoned themſelves the moſt ancient nation in the univerſe, (Vid. Pſammetichus,) but ſome authors make them of Æthiopian origin. They are remarkable for their ſuperſtition; they paid as much honor to the cat, the crocodile, the bull, and even to onions, as to Iſis. Rain never or ſeldom falls in this country; the fertility of the ſoil originates in the yearly inundations of the Nile, which riſes about 25 feet above the ſurface of the earth, and exhibits a large plain of waters, in which are ſcattered here and there, the towns and villages, as the Cyclades in the Ægean ſea. The air is not wholeſome, but the population is great, and the cattle very prolific. It is ſaid that Egypt once contained 20,000 cities.

It was governed by kings who have immortalized themſelves by the pyramids they have raiſed and the canals they have opened. The prieſts traced the exiſtence of the country for many thouſand years, and fondly imagined that the gods were their firſt ſovereigns, and that their monarchy had laſted 11,340 years according to Herodotus. According to the calculation of Conſtantine Manaſſes, the kingdom of Egypt laſted 1663 years from its beginning under Miſraim the ſon of Ham, 2188 B. C. to the conqueſt of Cambyſes, 525 B. C. Egypt revolted afterwards from the Perſian power, B. C. 414, and Amyrtæus then became king. After him ſucceeded Pſammetichus, whoſe reign began 408 B. C. Nephereus 396. Acoris 389. Pſammuthis 376. Nepherites 4 months, and Nectanebis, 375. Tachos, or Teos, 363. Nectanebus, 361. It was conquered by Ochus 350 B. C.; and after the conqueſt of Perſia by Alexander, Ptolemy refounded the kingdom, and began to reign 323 B. C. Philadelphus, 284. Evergetes, 246. Philopater, 221. Epiphanes, 204. Philomator, 180 and 169, conjointly with Evergetes II. or Phyſcon, for 6 years. Evergetes II. 145. Lathurus Soter, and his mother Cleopatra, 116. Alexander of Cyprus, and Cleopatra, 106. Lathurus Soter reſtored, 88. Cleopatra II. 6 months, with Alexander the ſecond 19 days, 81. Ptolemy, ſirnamed Alexander III. 80. Dionyſius, ſirnamed Auletes, 65. Dionyſius II. with Cleopatra III. 51. Cleopatra III. with young Ptolemy, 46, and in 30 B. C. it was reduced by Auguſtus into a Roman province. The hiſtory of Egypt, therefore, can be divided into three epochas; the firſt beginning with the foundation of the empire, to the conqueſt of Cambyſes; the ſecond ends at the death of Alexander; and the third comprehends the reign of the Ptolemies, and ends at the death of Cleopatra, in the age of Auguſtus. Strab. 17.—Herodot. 2, 3 & 7.—*Theocrit. Ælia, the wife of Sylla. Plut. in Syll.——The name of ſome towns built or repaired by the emperor Adrian.

Ælia lex, enacted by Ælius Tubero the tribune, A. U. C. 559, to ſend two colonies into the country of the Brutii. Liv. 34, c. 53.——Another A. U. C. 568, ordaining, that, in public affairs, the augurs ſhould obſerve the appearance of the ſky, and the magiſtrates be empowered to poſtpone the buſineſs.——Another called Ælia Sextia, by Ælius Sextus, A. U. C. 756, which enacted, that all ſlaves who bore any marks of puniſhment received from their maſters, or who had been impriſoned, ſhould be ſet at liberty, but not rank as Roman citizens.

Ælia Petina, of the family of Tubero, married Claudius Cæſar, by whom ſhe had a ſon. The emperor divorced her, to marry Meſſalina. Sueton. in Claud. 26.

Æliānus Claudus, a Roman ſophiſt of Prænеſte, in the reign of Adrian. He firſt taught rhetoric at Rome; but being diſguſted with his profeſſion, he became author, and publiſhed treatiſes on animals in 17 books, on various hiſtory in 14 books, &c. in Greek, a language which he preferred to Latin. In his writings he ſhows himſelf very fond of the marvellous, and relates many ſtories which are often devoid of elegance and purity of ſtyle; though Philoſtratus has commended his language as ſuperior to what could be expected from a perſon who was neither born nor educated in Greece. Ælian died in the 60th year of his age, A. D. 140. The beſt editions of his works collected together are that of Conrad Geſner, folio, printed Tiguri, 1556, though now ſeldom to be met with, and that of Kuenius, 2 vols. 8vo. Lipſ. 1780. Some attribute the treatiſe on the tactics of the Greeks to another Ælian.

Ælius & Ælia, a family in Rome, ſo poor that 16 lived in a ſmall houſe, and were maintained by the produce of a little field. Their poverty continued till Paulus conquered Perſeus king of Macedonia, and gave his ſon-in-law Æl. Tubero five pounds of gold from the booty. Val. Max. 4, c. 4.

Ælius Adriānus, an African, grandfather to the emperor Adrian.——Gallus, a Roman knight, the firſt who invaded Arabia Felix. He was very intimate with Strabo the geographer, and ſailed on the Nile with him to take a view of the country. Plin. 6, c. 28.——Publius, one of the firſt queſtors choſen from the plebeians at Rome. Liv. 4, c. 54.——Q. Æl. Pætus, ſon of Sextus or Publius. As he ſat in the ſenate-houſe, a woodpecker perched on his head; upon which a ſoothſayer exclaimed, that if he preſerved the bird, his houſe would floriſh, and Rome decay; and if he killed it, the contrary muſt happen. Hearing this, Ælius, in the preſence of the ſenate, bit off the head of the bird.

All

All the youths of his family were killed at Cannæ, and the Roman arms were ſoon attended with ſucceſs. Val. Max. 5, c. 6. ——Saturninus, a ſatyriſt, thrown down from the Tarpeian rock for writing verſes againſt Tiberius.——Sejānus, Vid. Sejanus. ——Sextus Catus, cenſor with M. Cethegus. He ſeparated the ſenators from the people in the public ſpectacles. During his conſuliſhip, the ambaſſadors of the Ætolians found him feaſting in earthen diſhes, and offered him ſilver veſſels, which he refuſed, ſatisfied with the earthen cups, &c. which, for his virtues, he had received from his father-in-law, L. Paulus, after the conqueſt of Macedonia. Plin. 33, c. 11. Cic. de Orat. 1.——Spartiānus, wrote the lives of the emperors Adrian, Antoninus Pius, & M. Aurelius. He floriſhed A. D. 240.——Tubero, grandſon of L. Paulus, was auſtere in his morals, and a formidable enemy to the Gracchi. His grandſon was accuſed before Cæſar, and ably defended by Cicero. Cic. ep. ad Brut.—— Verus Cæſar, the name of L. C. Commodus Verus, after Adrian had adopted him. He was made pretor and conſul by the emperor, who was ſoon convinced of his incapacity in the diſcharge of public duty. He killed himſelf by drinking an antidote; and Antoninus, ſirnamed Pius, was adopted in his place. Ælius was father to Antoninus Verus, whom Pius adopted.——A phyſician mentioned by Galen.——L Gallus, a lawyer, who wrote 12 books concerning the ſignification of all law words.——Sextus Pætus, a lawyer, conſul at Rome A. U. C. 554 He is greatly commended by Cicero for his learning, and called cordatus homo by Ennius for his knowledge of law. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 48. in Brut. 20.——Stilo, a native of Lanuvium, maſter to N. Æ̆NE̅Ă̆DÆ, a name given to the friends and companions of Æneas, by Virg. Æn. 1, v. 161.

Æ̆NE̅AS, a Trojan prince, ſon of Anchiſes and the goddeſs Venus. The opinions of authors concerning his character are different. He was educated by Chiron. Xenop. Cyneg. 1.—He married Creuſa, Priam's daughter, by whom he had a ſon called Aſcanius. During the Trojan war, he behaved with great valor, in defence of his country, and came to an engagement with Diomedes and Achilles. Yet Strabo, Dictys of Crete, Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, and Dares of Phrygia, accuſe him of betraying his country to the Greeks, with Antenor, and of preſerving his life and fortune by this treacherous meaſure. He lived at variance with Priam, becauſe he received not ſufficient marks of diſtinction from the king and his family, as Homer. Il. 13, ſays. This might have provoked him to ſeek revenge by perfidy.—Authors of credit report, that when Troy was in flames, he carried away, upon his ſhoulders, his father Anchiſes, and the ſtatues of his houſhold gods, leading in his hand his ſon Aſcanius, and leaving his wife to follow behind. Some ſay that he retired to Mount Ida, where he built a fleet of 20 ſhips, and ſet ſail in queſt of a ſettlement. Strabo and others maintain that Æneas never left his country, but rebuilt Troy, where he reigned, and his poſterity after him. Even Homer, who lived 400 years after the Trojan war, ſays, Il. 20, v. 30, &c. that the gods deſtined Æneas and his poſterity to reign over the Trojans. This paſſage Dionyſ. Hal. explained, by ſaying that Homer meant the Trojans who had gone over to Italy with Æneas, and not the actual inhabitants of Troy. According to Virgil and other Latin authors, who, to make their court to the Roman emperors, traced their origin up to Æneas, and deſcribed his arrival into Italy as indubitable, he with his fleet firſt came to the Thracian Cherſoneſus, where Polymneſtor, one of his allies, reigned. After viſiting Delos, the Strophades, and Crete, where he expected to find the empire promiſed him by the oracle, as in the place where his progenitors were born, he landed in Epirus and Drepanum, the court of king Aceſtes, in Sicily, where he buried his father. From Sicily he ſailed for Italy, but was driven on the coaſts of Africa, and kindly received by Dido queen of Carthage, to whom on his firſt interview, he gave one of the garments of the beautiful Helen. Dido being enamoured of him, wiſhed to marry him; but he left Carthage by order of the gods. In his voyage he was driven to Sicily, and from thence he paſſed to Cumæ, where the Sybil conducted him to hell, that he might hear from his father the fates which attended him and all his poſterity. After a voyage of ſeven years, and the loſs of 13 ſhips, he came to the Tyber. Latinus, the king of the country, received him with hoſpitality, and promiſed him his daughter Lavinia, who had been before betrothed to king Turnus by her mother Amata. To prevent this marriage, Turnus made war againſt Æneas; and after many battles, the war was decided by a combat between the two rivals, in which Turnus was killed. Æneas married Lavinia, in whoſe honor he built the town of Lavinium, and ſucceeded his father-in-law. After a ſhort reign, Æneas was killed in a battle againſt the Etrurians. Some ſay that he was drowned in the Numicus, and his body weighed down by his armour; upon which the Latins, not finding their king, ſuppoſed that he had been taken up to heaven, and therefore offered him ſacrifices as to a god. Dionyſ. Hal. fixes the arrival of Æneas in Italy in the 54th olymp. Some authors ſuppoſe that Æneas, after the ſiege of Troy, fell to the ſhare of Neoptolemus, together with Andromache, and that he was carried to Theſſaly, whence he eſcaped to Italy. Others ſay, that after he had come to Italy, he returned to Troy, leaving Aſcanius king of Latium. Æneas has been praiſed for his piety, and ſubmiſſion to the will of the gods. *Homer. He ſucceeded Aſcanius in Latium. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 770.—Liv. 1, c. 3.——An ambaſſador ſent by the Lacedæmonians to Athens, to treat of peace, in the 8th year of the Peloponneſian war.—An ancient author who wrote on tactics, beſides other treatiſes, which, according to Ælian, were epitomiſed by Cineas the friend of Pyrrhus.—A native of Gaza, who, from a Platonic philoſopher became a chriſtian, A. D. 485, and wrote a dialogue called Theophraſtus, on the immortality of the ſoul, and the reſurrection.

ÆNĒIA, or ÆNIA, a place near Rome, afterwards called Janiculum.——A city of Troas. Strab. 17.——A city of Macedonia. Dionyſ. Hal. 1.

ÆNEIDES, a patronymic given to Aſcanius, as ſon of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 653.

ÆNĒIS, a poem of Virgil, which has for its ſubject the ſettlement of Æneas in Italy. The great merit of this poem is well known. The author has imitated Homer, and, as ſome ſay, Homer is ſuperior to him only becauſe he is more ancient, and is an original. Virgil died before he had corrected it, and at his death deſired it might be burnt. This was happily diſobeyed, and Auguſtus ſaved from the flames, a poem which proved his family to be deſcended from the kings of Troy. The Æneid had engaged the attention of the poet for 11 years, and in the firſt ſix books it ſeems that it was Virgil's deſign to imitate Homer's Odyſſey, and in the laſt the Iliad. The action of the poem comprehends eight years, one of which only, the laſt, is really taken up by action, as the ſeven firſt are merely epiſodes, ſuch as Juno's attempts to deſtroy the Trojans, the loves of Æneas and Dido, the relation of the fall of Troy, &c.—In the firſt book of the Æneid, the hero is introduced, in the ſeventh year of his expedition, ſailing in the Mediterranean, and ſhipwrecked on the African coaſt, where he is received by Dido. In the ſecond, Æneas, at the deſire of the Phœnician queen, relates the fall of Troy, and his flight through the general conflagration to mount Ida. In the third, the hero continues his narration, by a minute account of his voyage through the Cyclades, the places where he landed, and the dreadful ſtorm with the deſcription of which the poem opened. Dido, in the fourth book, makes public her partiality to Æneas, which is ſlighted by the ſailing of the Trojans from Carthage, and the book cloſes with the ſuicide of the diſappointed queen. In the fifth book, Æneas ſails to Sicily, where he celebrates the anniverſary of his father's death, and thence purſues his voyage to Italy. In the ſixth, he viſits the Elyſian fields, and learns from his father the fate which attends him and his deſcendants the Romans. In the ſeventh book, the hero reaches the deſtined land of Latium, and concludes a treaty with the king of the country, which is ſoon broken by the interference of Juno, who ſtimulates Turnus to war. The auxiliaries of the enemy are enumerated; and in the eighth book, Æneas is aſſiſted by Evander, and receives from Venus a ſhield wrought by Vulcan, on which are repreſented the future glory and triumphs of the Roman nation. The reader is pleaſed, in the ninth book, with the account of battles between the rival armies, and the immortal friendſhip of Niſus and Euryalus. Jupiter in the tenth, attempts a reconciliation between Venus and Juno, who patroniſed the oppoſite parties; the fight is renewed, Pallas killed, and Turnus ſaved from the avenging hand of Æneas, by the interpoſition of Juno. The eleventh book gives an account of the funeral of Pallas, and of the meditated reconciliation between Æneas and Latinus, which the ſudden appearance of the enemy defeats. Camilla is ſlain, and the combatants ſeparated by the night. In the laſt book, Juno prevents the ſingle combat agreed upon by Turnus and Æneas. The Trojans are defeated in the abſence of their king; but on the return of Æneas, the battle aſſumes a different turn, a ſingle combat is fought by the rival leaders, and the poem is concluded by the death of king Turnus. Plin. 7, c. 30, &c.

Ænesidēmus, a brave general of Argos. Liv. 32, c. 25.—A Cretan philoſopher, who wrote 8 books on the doctrine of his maſter Pyrrho. Diog. in. Pyr.

Æŏlia, a name given to Arne. Sappho is called Æolia puella, by Horace, 4, od. 9, v. 12.

Æŏlia, or Æolis, a country of Aſia Minor, near the Ægean ſea. It has Troas at the north, and Ionia at the ſouth. The inhabitants were of Grecian origin, and were maſters of many of the neighbouring iſlands. They had 12, others ſay 30 conſiderable cities, of which Cumæ and Leſbos were the moſt famous. They receive their name from Æolus ſon of Hellenus. They migrated from Greece about 1124 B. C. 80 years before the migration of the Ionian tribes. Herodot. 1, c. 26, &c.—Strab. 1, 2 & 6.—Plin. 5, c. 30.—Mela. 1, c. 2 & 18.——Theſſaly has been anciently called Æolia. Bœotus, ſon of Neptune, having ſettled there, called his followers Bœotians, and their country Bœotia.

Æoliæ and Æolĭdes, ſeven iſlands between Sicily and Italy; called Lipara, Hiera, Strongyle, Didyme, Ericuſa, Phœnicuſa, and Euonymos. They were the retreat of the winds; and Virg. Æn. 1, v. 56, calls them Æolia, and the kingdom of Æolus the god of ſtorms and winds. They ſometimes bear the name of Vulcaniæ and Hephæſtiades, and are known now among the moderns under the general appellation of Lipari iſlands. Juſtin. 4, c. 1.

Æolĭda, a city of Tenedos——Another near Thermopylæ. Herodot. 8, c. 35.

Æolĭdes, a patronymic of Ulyſſes, from Æolus; becauſe Anticlea, his mother, was pregnant by Siſyphus, the ſon of Æolus, when ſhe married Laertes. It is alſo given to Athamas and Miſenus, as ſons of Æolus. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 511, l. 13, v. 31.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 164 & 529.

Æŏlus, the king of ſtorms and winds, was the ſon of Hippotas. He reigned over Æolia; and becauſe he was the inventor of ſails, and a great aſtronomer, the poets have called him the god of the wind. It is ſaid that he confined in a bag, and gave Ulyſſes, all the winds that could blow againſt his veſſel, when he returned to Ithaca. The companions of Ulyſſes untied the bag, and gave the winds their liberty. Æolus was indebted to Juno for his royal dignity, according to Virgil. The name ſeems to be derived from αιολος, varius, becauſe the winds over which he preſided are ever varying.——There were two others, a king of Etruria, father to Macareus and Canace, and a ſon of Hellenus, often confounded with the god of the winds. This laſt married Enaretta, by whom he had ſeven ſons and five daughters.

ÆRIAS, an ancient king of Cyprus, who built the temple of Paphos. Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 3.

ÆRŎPE, wife of Atreus, committed adultery with Thyestes her brother-in-law, and had by him twins, who were placed as food before Atreus. Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 391.——A daughter of Cepheus, ravished by Mars. She died in child-bed; her child was preserved, and called Æropus. Paus. 8, c. 44.

ÆRŎPUS, a general of Epirus, in the reign of Pyrrhus.——A person appointed regent to Orestes, the infant son of Archelaus king of Macedonia.——An officer of king Philip, banished for bringing a singer into his camp. Polyæn. 4, c. 2.——A mountain of Chaonia. Liv. 31, c. 5.

ÆSĂCUS, a river of Troy near Ida.——A son of Priam, by Alexirhoe. He became enamoured of Hesperia, whom he pursued into the woods. The nymph threw herself into the sea, and was changed into a bird. Æsacus followed her example, and was changed into a cormorant. Ovid. Met. 11. fab. 11.

ÆSĀPUS, a river of Mysia, in Asia, falling into the Hellespont. Plin. 5. c. 32.

ÆSAR, or ÆSĀRAS, a river of Magna Græcia, falling into the sea near Crotona. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 28.

ÆSCHĬNES, an Athenian orator, who flourished about 342 B. C. and distinguished himself by his rivalship with Demosthenes. His father's name was Atrometus, and he boasted of his descent from a noble family, though Demosthenes reproached him as being the son of a courtezan. The first open signs of enmity between the rival orators appeared at the court of Philip, where they were sent as ambassadors; but the character of Æschines was tarnished by the acceptance of a bribe from the Macedonian prince, whose tyranny had hitherto been the general subject of his declamation. When the Athenians wished to reward the patriotic labors of Demosthenes with a golden crown, Æschines impeached Ctesiphon, who proposed it; and to their subsequent dispute we are indebted for the two celebrated orations de coronâ. Æschines was defeated by his rival's superior eloquence, and banished to Rhodes; but as he retired from Athens, Demosthenes ran after him, and nobly forced him to accept a present of silver. In his banishment, the orator repeated to the Rhodians, what he had delivered against Demosthenes; and after receiving much applause, he was desired to read the answer of his antagonist. It was received with greater marks of approbation; but, exclaimed Æschines, how much more would your admiration have been raised, had you heard Demosthenes himself speak it! Æschines died in the 75th year of his age, at Rhodes, or, as some suppose, at Samos. He wrote 3 orations, and 9 epistles, which, from their number, received the name, the first of the graces, and the last of the muses. The orations alone are extant, generally found collected with those of Lysias. An oration which bears the name of Deliaca lex, is said not to be his production, but that of Æschines, another orator of that age. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 24. l. 2, c. 53. in Brut. c. 17.—Plut. in Demosth.—Diog. 2 & 3.—Plin. 7, c. 30. Diogenes mentions seven more of the same name.——A philosopher, disciple of Socrates, who wrote several dialogues, some of which bore the following titles: Aspasia, Phædon, Alcibiades, Draco, Erycia, Polyænus, Telauges, &c. The dialogue intituled Axiochus, and aſcribed to Plato, is ſuppoſed to be his compoſition. The beſt editions are that of Leovard, 1718, with the notes of Horræus, in 8vo. and that Fiſcher, 8vo. Lipſ. 1766.——A man who wrote on oratory.——An Arcadian.——A Mitylenean.——A diſciple of Melanthius.——A Mileſian writer.——A ſtatuary.

ÆSCHRION, a Mitylenean poet, intimate with Ariſtotle. He accompanied Alexander in his Aſiatic expedition.—An Iambic poet of Samos. Athen.—A phyſician commended by Galen. A treatiſe of his on huſbandry has been quoted by Pliny.——A lieutenant of Archagathus, killed by Hanno. Diod. 20.

ÆSCHYLĪDES, a man who wrote a book on agriculture. Ælian. H. An. 15.

ÆSCHŸLUS, an excellent ſoldier and poet of Athens, ſon of Euphorion, and brother to Cynægirus. He was in the Athenian army at the battles of Marathon, Salamis, and Platæa. But the moſt ſolid fame he has obtained, is the offspring leſs of his valor in the field of battle than of his writings. Of ninety tragedies, however, the fruit of his ingenious labors, 40 of which were rewarded with the public prize, only ſeven have come ſafe to us: Prometheus vinctus, Septem duces apud Thebas, Perſæ, Agamemnon, Chæphori, Eumenides, Supplices. Æſchylus is the firſt who introduced two actors on the ſtage, and cloathed them with dreſſes ſuitable to their character. He likewiſe removed murder from the ſtage. It is ſaid, that when he compoſed, his countenance betrayed the greateſt ferocity; and according to one of his ſcholiaſts, when his Eumenides were repreſented, many children died through fear, and ſeveral pregnant women actually miſcarried in the houſe, at the ſight of the horrible maſks that were introduced. The imagination of the poet was ſtrong and comprehenſive, but diſorderly and wild; fruitful in prodigies, but diſdaining probabilities. His ſtile is obſcure, and the labors of an excellent modern critic, have pronounced him the moſt difficult of all the Greek claſſics. A few expreſſions of impious tendency in one of his plays, nearly proved fatal to Æſchylus; he was condemned to death; but his brother Amynias, it is reported, reverſed the ſentence, by uncovering an arm, of which the hand had been cut off at the battle of Salamis in the ſervice of his country, and the poet was pardoned. Æſchylus has been accuſed of drinking to exceſs, and of never compoſing except when in a ſtate of intoxication. In his old age he retired to the court of Hiero in Sicily; and being informed that he was to die by the fall of a houſe, he retired from the city into the fields, where he ſat down. An eagle, with a tortoiſe in her bill, flew over his bald head, and ſuppoſing it to be a ſtone, dropped her prey upon it to break the ſhell, and Æſchylus inſtantly died of the blow, in the 69th year of his age, 456 B. C. It is ſaid that he wrote an account of the battle of Marathon, in elegiac verſes. The beſt editions of his works are thoſe of Stanley, fol. London, 1663, that of Glaſg. 2 vols. in 12mo, 1746. and that of Schutz, 2 vols. 8vo. Halæ, 1782.—Horat. Art. Poet. 278.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Plin. 10, c. 3.—Val. Max. 9, c. 12.——The 12th perpetual archon of Athens.——A Corinthian, brother-in-law to Timophanes, intimate with Timoleon. Plut. in Timol——A Rhodian ſet over Egypt with Peuceſtes of Macedonia. Curt. 4, c. 8.

ÆSCULĀPIUS, ſon of Apollo, by Coronis, or as ſome ſay, by Lariſſa daughter of Phlegias, was god of medicine After his union with Coronis, Apollo ſet a crow to watch her, and was ſoon informed that ſhe admitted the careſſes of Iſchys, of Æmonia. The god in a fit of anger, deſtroyed Coronis with lightning, but ſaved the infant from her womb, and gave him to be educated to Chiron, who taught him the art of medicine. Some authors ſay, that Coronis left her father to avoid the diſcovery of her pregnancy, and that ſhe expoſed her child near Epidaurus. A goat of the flocks of Areſthanas gave him her milk, and the dog who kept the flock ſtood by him to ſhelter him from injury. He was found by the maſter of the flock, who went in ſearch of his ſtray goat, and ſaw his head ſurrounded with reſplendent rays of light. Æſculapius was phyſician to the Argonauts. He reſtored many to life, of which Pluto complained to Jupiter, who ſtruck Æſculapius with thunder, but Apollo, angry at the death of his ſon, killed the Cyclops who made the thunderbolts. Æſculapius received divine honors after death, chiefly at Epidaurus, Pergamus, Athens, Smyrna, &c. Goats, bulls, lambs, and pigs, were ſacrificed on his altars, and the cock and the ſerpent were ſacred to him. Rome A. U. C. 462, was delivered of a plague, and built a temple to the god of medicine, who, as was ſuppoſed, had come there in the form of a ſerpent, and hid himſelf among the reeds in an iſland of the Tyber. Æſculapius is repreſented with a large beard, holding in his hand a ſtaff, round which is wreathed a ſerpent; his other hand is ſometimes ſupported on the head of a ſerpent. Serpents are more particularly ſacred to him, as the ancient phyſicians uſed them in their preſcriptions.

He

He married Epione, by whom he had two ſons, famous for their ſkill in medicine, Machaon and Podalirus; and four daughters, of whom Hygica, goddeſs of health, is the moſt celebrated. Some have ſuppoſed that he lived a ſhort time after the Trojan war. Heſiod makes no mention of him. Homer. Il. 4, v. 193. Hymn. in Æſcul.—Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Apollon. 4, Argon.—Hygin. fab. 49.—Ovid. Met. 2, fab. 8.—Pauſ. 2, c. 11 & 27. l. 7, c. 23, &c.—Diod. 4.—Pindar Pyth. 3.—Lucian. D. 3, c. 22, ſays there were three of this name; the 1ſt, a ſon of Apollo, worſhipped in Arcadia; 2d, a brother of Mercury; 3d, a man who firſt taught medicine.

Æsēmus, a ſon of Bucolion. Homer. Il. 6, v. 21.—A river. Vid. Æſapus.

Æsernia, a city of the Samnites, in Italy. Liv. 27. c. 12.—Sil. 8, v. 567.

Æsīon, an Athenian, known for his reſpect for the talents of Demoſthenes. Plut. in Demoſth.

Æson, ſon of Cretheus, was born at the ſame birth as Pelias. He ſucceeded his father in the kingdom of Iolchos, but was ſoon exiled by his brother. He married Alcimeda, by whom he had Jaſon, whoſe education he entruſted to Chiron, being afraid of Pelias. When Jaſon was grown up, he demanded his father's kingdom from his uncle, who gave him evaſive anſwers, and perſuaded him to go in queſt of the golden fleece. [Vid. Jaſon.] At his return, Jaſon found his father very infirm; and Medea, [Vid. Medea], at his requeſt, drew the blood from Æſon's veins, and refilled them with the juice of certain herbs which ſhe had gathered, and immediately the old man recovered the vigor and bloom of youth. Some ſay that Æſon killed himſelf by drinking bull's blood, to avoid the perſecution of Pelias. Diod. 4.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 285.—Hygin. fab. 12.———A river of Theſſaly, with a town of the ſame name.

Æsŏnĭdes, a patronymic of Jaſon, as being deſcended from Æſon.

Æsōpus, a Phrygian philoſopher, who, though originally a ſlave, procured his liberty by the ſallies of his genius. He travelled over the greateſt part of Greece and Egypt, but chiefly reſided at the court of Crœſus, king of Lydia, by whom he was ſent to conſult the oracle of Delphi. In this commiſſion Æſop behaved with great ſeverity, and ſatirically compared the Delphians to floating ſticks, which appear large at a diſtance, but are nothing when brought near. The Delphians, offended with his ſarcaſtic remarks, accuſed him of having ſecreted one of the ſacred veſſels of Apollo's temple, and threw him down from a rock, 561 B. C. Maximus Planudes has written his life in Greek; but no credit is to be given to the biographer, who falſely aſſerts that the mythologiſt was ſhort and deformed. Æſop dedicated his fables to his patron Crœſus; but what appears now under his name, is no doubt a compilation of all the fables and apologues of wits before and after the age of Æſop, conjointly with his own. Plut. in Solon.—Phæd. 1, fab. 2. l. 2, fab. 9.—— Claudus, an actor on the Roman ſtage, very intimate with Cicero. He amaſſed an immenſe fortune. His ſon, to be more expenſive, melted precious ſtones to drink at his entertainments. Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 239.—*Val. Æsymnētes, a ſirname of Bacchus. Pauſ. 7, c. 21.

Æsymnus, a perſon of Megara, who conſulted Apollo to know the beſt method of governing his country. Pauſ. 1, c. 43.

Æthalĭdes, a herald, ſon of Mercury, to whom it was granted to be amongſt the dead and the living at ſtated times. Apollon. Argon. 1.

Æthion a man ſlain at the nuptials of Andromeda. Ovid. Met. 5. v. 146.

Æthiŏpia, an extenſive country of Africa, at the ſouth of Egypt, divided into eaſt and weſt by the ancients, the former diviſion lying near Meroe, and the latter near the Mauri. The country, as well as the inhabitants, were little known to the ancients, though Homer has ſtyled them the juſteſt of men. Diod. 4, ſays, that the Æthiopians were the firſt inhabitants of the earth. They were the firſt who worſhipped the gods, for which, as ſome ſuppoſe, their country has never been invaded by a foreign enemy. The inhabitants are of a dark complexion. The country is inundated for five months every year, and their days and nights are almoſt of an equal length. The ancients have given the name of Æthiopia to every country whoſe inhabitants are of a black color. Lucan. 3, v. 253. l. 9, v. 651.—Juv. 2, v. 23.—

ÆTHŪSA, a daughter of Neptune by Amphitrite. Pauſ. 9, c. 20.——An iſland near Lilybæum. Plin. 3, c. 8.

ÆTIA, a poem of Callimachus, in which he ſpeaks of ſacrifices, and of the manner in which they were offered. Mart. 10, ep. 4.

ÆTION or EETION, the father of Andromache, Hector's wife. He was killed at Thebes, with his ſeven ſons, by the Greeks.——A famous painter. He drew a painting of Alexander going to celebrate his nuptials with Roxane. This piece was much valued, and was expoſed to public view at the Olympic games, where it gained ſo much applauſe that the preſident of the games gave the painter his daughter in marriage.

ÆTNA, a mountain of Sicily, now called Mount Gibel, famous for its vulcano, which, for about 3000 years, has thrown out fire at intervals. It is 2 miles in perpendicular height, and meaſures 100 miles round at the baſe, with an aſcent of 30 miles. Its crater forms a circle about 3½ miles in circumference, and its top is covered with ſnow and ſmoke at the ſame time, whilſt the ſides of the mountain, from the great fertility of the ſoil, exhibit a rich ſcenery of cultivated fields and blooming vineyards. Pindar is the firſt who mentions an eruption of Ætna; and the ſilence of Homer on the ſubject is conſidered as a proof that the fires of the mountain were unknown in his age. From the time of Pythagoras, the ſuppoſed date of the firſt volcanic appearance, to the battle of Pharſalia, it is computed that Ætna has had 100 eruptions. The poets ſuppoſed that Jupiter had confined the giants under this mountain, and it was repreſented as the forge of Vulcan, where his ſervants the Cyclops fabricated thunderbolts, &c. Heſiod. Theog. v. 860.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 570.—Ovid. Met. 5. fab. 6. l. 15, v. 340.—Ital. 14, v. 59.

ÆTŌLIA, a country bounded by Epirus, Acarnania, and Locris, ſuppoſed to be about the middle of Greece. It received its name from Ætolus. The inhabitants were covetous and illiberal, and were little known in Greece, till after the ruin of Athens and Sparta they aſſumed a conſequence in the country, and afterwards made themſelves formidable as the allies of Rome, and as its enemies, till they were conquered by Fulvius. Liv. 26, c. 24, &c.—Flor. 2, c. 9.—Strab. 8 & 10.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Plin. 4, c. 2.—Pauſ. 10, c. 18.—Plut. in Flam.

ÆTŌLUS, ſon of Endymion of Elis and Iphianaſſa, married Pronoe, by whom he had Pleuron and Calydon. Having accidentally killed a perſon, he left his country, and came to ſettle in that part of Greece which has been called, from him, Ætolia. Apollod. 1, c. 7 & 9.—Pauſ. 5, c. 1.

ÆX, a rocky iſland between Tenedos and Chios. Plin. 4, c. 11.——A city in the country of the Marſi.——The nurſe of Jupiter changed into a conſtellation.

AFER, an inhabitant of Africa.——An informer under Tiberius and his ſucceſſors. He became alſo known as an orator, and as the preceptor of Quintilian, and was made conſul by Domitian. He died A. D. 59.

AFRĀNIA, a Roman matron who frequented the forum, forgetful of female decency. Val. Max. 8, c. 3.

AFRĀNIUS, a Latin comic poet in the age of Terence, often compared to Menander. He is blamed for the unnatural love of boys, which he mentions in his writings, ſome fragments of which are to be found in the Corpus Poetarum. Quint. 10, c. 1.—Sueton. Ner. 11.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 57.——A general of Pompey, conquered by Cæſar in Spain. Sueton. in Cæſ. 34.—Plut. in Pomp.——Q. a man who wrote a ſevere ſatyr againſt Nero, for which he was put to death in the Piſonian conſpiracy. Tacit.——Potitus, a plebeian, who ſaid before Caligula, that he would willingly die if the emperor could recover from the diſtemper he labored under. Caligula recovered, and Afranius was put to death that he might not forfeit his word. Dio.

AFRĬCA, called Libya by the Greeks, one of the three parts of the ancient world, and the greateſt peninſula of the univerſe, was bounded on the eaſt by Arabia and the Red Sea, on the north by the Mediterranean, ſouth and weſt by the ocean. In its greateſt length it extends 4300 miles, and in its greateſt breadth it is 3500 miles.

It

It is joined on the east to Asia, by an isthmus 60 miles long, which some of the Ptolemies endeavoured to cut, in vain, to join the Red and Mediterranean seas. It is so immediately situate under the sun, that only the maritime parts are inhabited, and the inland country is mostly barren and sandy, and infested with wild beasts. The ancients, through ignorance, peopled the southern parts of Africa with monsters, enchanters, and chimeras; errors which begin to be corrected by modern travellers. Vid. Libya. Mela. 1, c. 4, &c.—Diod. 3, 4, & 20.—Herodot. 2, c. 17, 26, & 32. l. 4, c. 41, &c.—Plin. 5, c. 1, &c.——There is a part of Africa called Propria, which lies about the middle, and has Carthage for its capital.

Africānus, a blind poet commended by Ennius.——A christian writer, who flourished A. D. 222. In his chronicle, which was universally esteemed, he reckoned 5500 years from the creation of the world to the age of Julius Cæsar. Nothing remains of this work, but what Eusebius has preserved. In a letter to Origen, Africanus proved, that the history of Susanna is suppositious; and in another to Aristides, still extant, he endeavours to reconcile the seeming contradictions that appear in the genealogies of Christ in St. Matthew and Luke. He is supposed to be the same who wrote nine books, in which he treats of physic, agriculture, &c.—A lawyer, disciple to Papinian, and intimate with the emperor Alexander.—An orator mentioned by Quintilian.——The surname of the Scipios, from the conquest of Africa. Vid. Scipio.

Afrĭcum mare, is that part of the Mediterranean which is on the coast of Africa.

Agăgriānæ portæ, gates at Syracuse, near which the dead were buried. Cic. in Tusc.

Agalasses, a nation of India, conquered by Alexander. Diod. 17.

Agalla, a woman of Corcyra, who wrote a treatise upon grammar. Athen. 1.

Agamēdes and Trophonius, two architects who made the entrance of the temple of Delphi, for which they demanded of the god, whatever gift was most advantageous for a man to receive. Three days after they were found dead in their bed. Plut. de conf. ad Apol.—Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 47.——Pauf. 9, c. 11 & 37, gives a different account.

Agamemnon, king of Mycenæ and Argos, was brother to Menelaus, and son of Plisthenes, the son of Atreus. Homer calls them sons of Atreus, which is false, upon the authority of Hesiod, Apollod. &c. [Vid. Plisthenes.] When Atreus was dead, his brother Thyestes seized the kingdom of Argos, and removed Agamemnon and Menelaus, who fled to Polyphidus king of Sicyon, and hence to Œneus, king of Ætolia, where they were educated. Agamemnon married Clytemnestra, and Menelaus Helen, both daughters of Tyndarus king of Sparta, who assisted them to recover their father's kingdom. Agamemnon established himself, at Mycenæ, whilst Menelaus succeeded his father-in-law at Sparta. When Helen was stolen by Paris, Agamemnon was elected commander in chief of the Grecian forces going against Troy. Their fleet was detained at Aulis, where Agamemnon sacrificed his daughter to appease Diana. [Vid. Iphigenia.] During the Trojan war, Agamemnon behaved with much valor; but his quarrel with Achilles, whose mistress he took by force, was fatal to the Greeks. [Vid. Brisēis.] After the ruin of Troy, Cassandra fell to his share, and foretold him that his wife would put him to death. He gave no credit to this, and returned to Argos with Cassandra. Clytemnestra, with her adulterer Ægisthus, [Vid. Ægisthus] prepared to murder him; and as he came from the bath, to embarrass him, she gave him a tunic whose sleeves were sewed together, and while he attempted to put it on, she brought him to the ground with a stroke of a hatchet, and Ægisthus seconded her blows. His death was revenged by his son Orestes. [Vid. Clytemnestra, Menelaus, and Orestes.] Homer Il. 1, 2, &c. Od. 4, &c.—*Ovid. de Rem. AGESILĀUS, king of Sparta, of the family of the Agidæ, was son of Doryssus, and father of Archelaus. During his reign, Lycurgus instituted his famous laws. Herodot. 7, c. 204.—Pauf. 3, c. 2.——A son of Archidamus of the family of the Proclidæ, made king in preference to his nephew Leotychides. He made war against Artaxerxes king of Persia with success; but in the midst of his conquests in Asia, he was recalled home to oppose the Athenians and Bœotians, who desolated his country; and his return was so expeditious that he passed, in thirty days, over that tract of country which had taken up a whole year of Xerxes' expedition. He defeated his enemies at Coronea; but sickness prevented the progress of his conquests, and the Spartans were beat in every engagement, especially at Leuctra, till he appeared at their head. Though deformed, small of stature, and lame, he was brave, and a greatness of soul compensated all the imperfections of nature. He was as fond of sobriety as of military discipline; and when he went, in his 80th year, to assist Tachus king of Egypt, the servants of the monarch could hardly be persuaded that the Lacedæmonian general was eating with his soldiers on the ground, bare-headed, and without any covering to repose upon. Agesilaus died on his return from Egypt, after a reign of 36 years, 362 B. C. and his remains were embalmed and brought to Lacedæmon. Justin. 6, c. 1.—Plut. & C. Nep. in vit.—Pauf. 3, c. 9.—Xenoph. Orat. pro Agef.——A brother of Themistocles, who went into the Persian camp, and stabbed Mardonius instead of Xerxes. Plut. in Parall.——A surname of Pluto.——A Greek who wrote an history of Italy.

AGESIPŎLIS, 1st, king of Lacedæmon, son of Pausanias, obtained a great victory over the Mantineans. He reigned 14 years, and was succeeded by his brother Cleombrotus, B. C. 380. Pauf. 3, c. 5, l. 8, c. 8.——Xenoph. 3. Hist. Græc.——2d, son of Cleombrotus, king of Sparta, was succeeded by Cleomenes, 2d, B. C. 370. Pauf. 1, c. 13, l. 3, c. 5.

AGESISTRĂTA, the mother of king Agis. Plut. in Agid.

AGESISTRĂTUS, a man who wrote a treatise intitled De arte machinali.

AGGRAMMES, a cruel king of the Gangarides. His father was a hair-dresser, of whom the queen became enamoured, and whom she made governor to the king's children, to gratify her passion. He killed them, to raise Aggrammes, his son by the queen, to the throne. Curt. 9, c. 2.

AGGRĪNÆ, a people near mount Rhodope. Cic. in L. Pis. 37.

AGĬDÆ, the descendants of Eurysthenes, who shared the throne of Sparta with the Proclidæ; the name seems to be derived from Agis son of Eurysthenes. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 682.

AGILĀUS, king of Corinth, reigned 36 years.——One of the Ephori, almost murdered by the partizans of Cleomenes. Plut. in Cleom.

AGIS, king of Sparta, succeeded his father, Eurysthenes, and after a reign of one year, was succeeded by his son Echestratus, B. C. 1058. Pauf. 3, c. 2.——Another king of Sparta, who waged bloody wars against Athens, and restored liberty to many Greek cities. He attempted to restore the laws of Lycurgus at Sparta, but in vain; the perfidy of friends, who pretended to second his views, brought him to difficulties, and he was at last dragged from a temple, a temple, where he had taken refuge, to a prison, where he was strangled by orders of the Ephori. Plut. in Agid.——Another, son of Archidamus, who signalized himself in the war which the Spartans waged against Epidaurus. He obtained a victory at Mantinea, and was successful in the Peloponnesian war. He reigned 27 years. Thucyd. 3 & 4.—Paus. 3, c. 8 & 10.——Another, son of Archidamus, king of Sparta, who endeavoured to deliver Greece from the empire of Macedonia, with the assistance of the Persians. He was conquered in the attempt, and slain by Antipater, Alexander's general, and 5,300 Lacedæmonians perished with him. Curt. 6, c. 1.—Diod. 17.—Justin. 12, c. 1. &c.——Another, son of Eudamidas, killed in a battle against the Mantineans. Paus. 8, c. 10.——An Arcadian in the expedition of Cyrus against his brother Artaxerxes. Polyæn. 7, c. 18.——A poet of Argos, who said that Bacchus and the sons of Leda would give way to Alexander, when a god. Curt. 8. c. 5.——A Lycian who followed Æneas into Italy, where he was killed. *Virg. Agna, a woman in the age of Horace, who, though deformed, had many admirers. Horat. 1, Sat. 3, v. 40.

Agno, one of the nymphs who nursed Jupiter. She gave her name to a fountain on mount Lycæus. When the priest of Jupiter, after a prayer, stirred the waters of this fountain with a bough, a thick vapor arose, which was soon dissolved into a plentiful shower. Paus. 8, c. 31, &c.

Agnodĭce, an Athenian virgin, who disguised her sex to learn medicine. She was taught by Hierophilus the art of midwifery, and when employed, always discovered her sex to her patients. This brought her into so much practice, that the males of her profession, who were now out of employment, accused her before the Areopagus, of corruption. She confessed her sex to the judges, and a law was immediately made to empower all free-born women to learn midwifery. Hygin. fab. 274.

Agnon, son of Nicias, was present at the taking of Samos by Pericles. In the Peloponnesian war he went against Potidæa, but abandoned his expedition through disease. He built Amphipolis, whose inhabitants rebelled to Brasidas, whom they regarded as their founder, forgetful of Agnon. Thucyd. 2, 3, &c.——A writer. Quintil. 2, c. 17.——One of Alexander's officers. Plin. 33, c. 3.

Agnonĭdes, a rhetorician of Athens, who accused Phocion of betraying the Piræus to Nicanor. When the people recollected what services Phocion had rendered them, they raised him statues, and put to death his accuser. Plut. & Nep. in Phocion.

Agræi and Agrenses, a people of Arabia. Plin. 6, c. 28.——Of Ætolia. Liv. 42, c. 34.

Agrăgas, or Acragas, a river, town, and mountain of Sicily; called also, Agrigentum. The town was built by the people of Gela, who were a Rhodian colony. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 703.—Diod. 11.

Agraria lex was enacted to distribute among the Roman people all the lands which they had gained by conquest. It was first proposed A. U. C. 267, by the consul conſul Sp. Caſſius Vicellinus, and rejected by the ſenate. This produced diſſenſions between the ſenate and the people, and Caſſius, upon ſeeing the ill ſucceſs of the new regulations he propoſed, offered to diſtribute among the people, the money which was produced from the corn of Sicily, after it had been brought and ſold in Rome. This act of liberality the people refuſed, and tranquillity was ſoon after re-eſtabliſhed in the ſtate. It was propoſed a ſecond time A. U. C. 269, by the tribune Licinius Stolo, but with no better ſucceſs; and ſo great were the tumults which followed, that one of the tribunes of the people was killed, and many of the ſenators fined for their oppoſition. Mutius Scævola, A. U. C. 620, perſuaded the tribune Tiberius Gracchus to propoſe it a third time; and though Octavius, his colleague in the tribuneſhip, oppoſed it, yet Tiberius made it paſs into a law, after much altercation, and commiſſioners were authoriſed to make a diviſion of the lands.—This law at laſt proved fatal to the freedom of Rome under J. Cæſar. Flor. 3, c. 3 & 13.—Cic. pro Leg. Agr.—Liv. 2, c. 41.

AGRAULE, a tribe of Athens. Plut. in Them.

AGRICŎLA, the father-in-law of the hiſtorian Tacitus, who wrote his life. He was eminent for his public and private virtues. He was governor of Britain, and firſt diſcovered it to be an iſland. Domitian envied his virtues; he recalled him from the province he had governed with equity and moderation, and ordered him to enter Rome in the night, that no triumph might be granted to him. Agricola obeyed, and without betraying any reſentment, he retired to a peaceful ſolitude, and the enjoyment of the ſociety of a few friends. He died in his 56th year, A. D. 93. Tacit. in Agric.

AGRIGENTUM, a town of Sicily, 18 ſtadia from the ſea, on mount Agragas. It was founded by a Rhodian colony. The inhabitants were famous for their hoſpitality and for their luxurious manner of living. In its floriſhing ſituation Agrigentum contained 200,000 inhabitants, who ſubmitted with reluctance to the ſuperior power of Syracuſe. The government was monarchical, but afterwards a democracy was eſtabliſhed. The famous Phalaris uſurped the ſovereignty which was alſo for ſome time in the hands of the Carthaginians. Agrigentum can now boaſt of more venerable remains of antiquity than any other town in Sicily. Polyb. 9.—Strab. 6.

AGRINIUM, a city of Acarnania. Polyb. 6.

AGRIŌNIA, annual feſtivals in honor of Bacchus, celebrated generally in the night. They were inſtituted, as ſome ſuppoſe, becauſe the god was attended with wild beaſts.

AGRIOPAS, a man who wrote the hiſtory of all thoſe who had obtained the public prize at Olympia. Plin. 8, c. 22.

AGRIŌPE, the wife of king Agenor.

M. AGRIPPA VIPSANIUS, a celebrated Roman, who obtained a victory over S. Pompey, and favored the cauſe of Auguſtus at the battles of Actium and Philippi, where he behaved with great valor. He adviſed his imperial friend to re-eſtabliſh the republican government at Rome, but he was over-ruled by Mecænas. In his expeditions in Gaul and Germany he obtained ſeveral victories, but refuſed the honors of a triumph, and turned his liberality towards the embelliſhing of Rome, and the raiſing of magnificent buildings, one of which, the Pantheon, ſtill exiſts. After he had retired for two years to Mitylene, in conſequence of a quarrel with Marcellus, Auguſtus recalled him, and as a proof of his regard, gave him his daughter Julia in marriage, and left him the care of the empire during an abſence of two years employed in viſiting the Roman provinces of Greece and Aſia. He died univerſally lamented at Rome in the 51ſt year of his age, 12 B. C. and his body was placed in the tomb which Auguſtus had prepared for himſelf. He had been married three times, to Pomponia daughter of Atticus, to Marcella daughter of Octavia, and to Julia, by whom he had five children, Caius, and Lucius Cæſares, Poſthumus Agrippa, Agrippina, and Julia. His ſon, C. Cæſar Agrippa, was adopted by Auguſtus, and made conſul, by the flattery of the Roman people, at the age of 14 or 15. This promiſing youth went to Armenia, on an expedition againſt the Perſians, where he received a fatal blow from the treacherous hand of Lollius, the governor of one of the neighbouring cities. He languiſhed for a little time, and died in Lycia. His younger brother, L. Cæſar Agrippa, was likewiſe adopted by his grandfather Auguſtus; but he was ſoon after baniſhed to Campania, for for using seditious language against his benefactor. In the 7th year of his exile he would have been recalled, had not Livia and Tiberius, jealous of the partiality of Augustus for him, ordered him to be assassinated in his 26th year. He has been called ferocious and savage; and he gave himself the name of Neptune, because he was fond of fishing. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 682. Horat. 1, od. 6.—Sylvius, a son of Tiberinus Sylvius, king of Latium. He reigned 33 years, and was succeeded by his son Remulus Sylvius. Dionys. Hal. 1. c. 8. ——One of the servants of the murdered prince assumed his name and raised commotions. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 39.——A consul who conquered the Æqui.——A philosopher. Diog.——Herodes, a son of Aristobulus, grandson of the Great Herod, who became tutor to the grand-child of Tiberius, and was soon after imprisoned by the suspicious tyrant. When Caligula ascended the throne, his favorite was released, presented with a chain of gold as heavy as that which had lately confined him, and made king of Judæa. He was a popular character with the Jews; and it is said, that while they were flattering him with the appellation of god, an angel of God struck him with the lousy disease, of which he died, A. D. 43. His son, of the same name, was the last king of the Jews, deprived of his kingdom by Claudius, in exchange for other provinces. He was with Titus at the celebrated siege of Jerusalem, and died A. D. 94. It was before him that St. Paul pleaded, and made mention of his incestuous commerce with his sister Berenice. Juv. 6, v. 156.—Tacit. 2 Hist. c. 81.——Menenius, a Roman general, who obtained a triumph over the Sabines, appeased the populace of Rome by the well-known fable of the belly and the limbs, and erected the new office of tribunes of the people, A. U. C. 261. He died poor, but universally regretted; his funeral was at the expence of the public, from which also his daughters received dowries. Liv. 2, c. 32.—Flor. 1, c. 23. ——A mathematician in the reign of Domitian; he was a native of Bithynia.

AGRIPPĪNA, a wife of Tiberius. The emperor repudiated her to marry Julia. Sueton. in Tib. 7.——A daughter of M. Agrippa, and grand-daughter to Augustus. She married Germanicus, whom she accompanied in Syria; and when Piso poisoned him, she carried his ashes to Italy, and accused his murderer, who stabbed himself. She fell under the displeasure of Tiberius, who exiled her in an island, where she died, A. D. 26, for want of bread. She left nine children, and was universally distinguished for intrepidity and conjugal affection. Tac. 1, Ann. c. 2. &c.—Sueton. in Tib. 52.——Julia, daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, married Domitius Ænobarbus, by whom she had Nero. After her husband's death she married her uncle the emperor Claudius, whom she destroyed, to make Nero succeed to the throne. After many cruelties, and much licentiousness, she was assassinated by order of her son, and as she expired, she exclaimed, "strike the belly which could give birth to such a monster." She died A. D. 59, after a life of prostitution and incestuous gratifications. It is said that her son viewed her dead body with all the raptures of admiration, saying, he never could have believed his mother was so beautiful a woman. She left memoirs which assisted Tacitus in the composition of his annals. The town which she built, where she was born, on the borders of the Rhine, and called Agrippina Colonia, is the modern Cologne. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 75. l. 12, c. 7, 22, &c.

AGRON, a king of Illyria, who, after conquering the Ætolians, drank to such excess that he died instantly, B. C. 231. Polyb. 2, c. 4.

AGROTAS, a Greek orator of Marseilles.

AGROTĔRA, an anniversary sacrifice of goats offered to Minerva at Athens. It was instituted by Callimachus the Polemarch, who vowed to sacrifice to the goddess so many goats as there might be enemies killed in a battle which he was going to fight against the troops of Darius, who had invaded Attica. The quantity of the slain was so great, that a sufficient number of goats could not be procured; therefore they were limited to 500 every year, till they equalled the number of Persians slain in battle.

AGYLEUS and AGYIEUS, from αγυια, a street; a surname of Apollo, because sacrifices were offered to him in the public streets of Athens. Horat. 4, od. 6.

AGYLLA, a town of Etruria, founded by a colony of Pelaſgians, and governed by Mezentius when Æneas came to Italy. It was afterwards called Cære, by the Lydians, who took poſſeſſion of it. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 652. l. 8, v. 479.

AHĀLA, the ſirname of the Servilii at Rome.

AHENOBARBUS. Vid. Ænobarbus.

AJAX, ſon of Telamon by Peribœa or Eribœa daughter of Alcathous, was next to Achilles the braveſt of all the Greeks in the Trojan war. He engaged Hector, with whom at parting he exchanged arms. After the death of Achilles, Ajax and Ulyſſes diſputed their claim to the arms of the dead hero. When they were given to the latter, Ajax was ſo enraged, that he ſlaughtered a whole flock of ſheep, ſuppoſing them to be the ſons of Atreus, who had given the preference to Ulyſſes, and ſtabbed himſelf with his ſword. The blood which ran to the ground from the wound, was changed into the flower hyacinth. Some ſay that he was killed by Paris in battle, others, that he was murdered by Ulyſſes. His body was buried at Sigæum, ſome ſay on mount Rhœtus and his tomb was viſited and honored by Alexander. Hercules, according to ſome authors, prayed to the gods that his friend Telamon, who was childleſs, might have a ſon, with a ſkin as impenetrable as the ſkin of the Nemæan lion, which he then wore. His prayers were heard; and when Ajax was born, Hercules wrapped him up in the lion's ſkin, which rendered his body invulnerable, except that part which was left uncovered by a hole in the ſkin, through which Hercules hung his quiver. This vulnerable part was in his breaſt, or as ſome ſay behind the neck. Q. Calab. 1 & 4.—Apollod. 3, c. 10 & 13.—Philoſtr. in Heroic. c. 12.—Pindar. Iſthm. 6.—Homer. Il. 1, *&c. He went with 40 ſhips to the Trojan war, as being one of Helen's ſuitors. The night that Troy was taken, he offered violence to Caſſandra, who fled into Minerva's temple; and for this offence as he returned home, the goddeſs, who had obtained the thunders of Jupiter, and the power of tempeſts from Neptune, deſtroyed his ſhip in a ſtorm. Ajax ſwam to a rock, and ſaid that he was ſafe in ſpite of all the gods. Such impiety offended Neptune, who ſtruck the rock with his trident, and Ajax tumbled into the ſea with part of the rock, and was drowned. His body was afterwards found by the Greeks, and black ſheep offered on his tomb. According to Virgil's account, Minerva ſeized him in a whirlwind, and daſhed him againſt a rock, where he expired, conſumed by thunder. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 43, &c.—Homer. Il. 2, 13, *&c. ALBĪNUS, was born at Adrumetum in Africa, and made governor of Britain, by Commodus. After the murder of Pertinax, he was elected emperor by the ſoldiers in Britain. Severus had alſo been inveſted with the imperial dignity by his own army; and theſe two rivals, with about 50,000 men each, came into Gaul to decide the fate of the empire. Severus was conqueror, and he ordered the head of Albinus to be cut off, and his body to be thrown into the Rhone, A. D. 198. Albinus, according to the exaggerated account of a certain writer called Codrus, was famous for his voracious appetite, and ſometimes eat for breakfaſt no leſs than 500 figs, 100 peaches, 20 pounds of dry raiſins, 10 melons, and 400 oyſters. ——A pretorian ſent to Sylla, as ambaſſador from the Senate during the civil wars.

He was put to death by Sylla's ſoldiers. Plut. in Syll.—An uſurer. Horat.——A Roman plebeian who received the veſtals into his chariot in preference to his family, when they fled from Rome, which the Gauls had ſacked. *Val. ALCĒNOR, an Argive, who alone with Chromius ſurvived the battle between 300 of his countrymen and 300 Lacedæmonians. Herodot. 1, c. 82.

ALCESTE, or ALCESTIS, daughter of Pelias, married Admetus. She, with her ſiſters, put to death her father, that he might be reſtored to youth and vigor by Medea, who, however, refuſed to perform her promiſe. Upon this, the ſiſters fled to Admetus, who married Alceſte. They were ſoon purſued by an army headed by their brother Acaſtus; and Admetus being taken priſoner, was redeemed from death, by the generous offer of his wife, who was ſacrificed in his ſtead to appeaſe the ſhades of her father. Some ſay that Alceſte laid down her life for her huſband, when ſhe had been told by an oracle, that he could never recover from a diſeaſe except ſome one of his friends died in his ſtead. According to ſome authors, Hercules brought her back from hell. She had many ſuitors while ſhe lived with her father. Vid. Admetus. Juv. 6, v. 651.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Pauſ. 5, c. 17.—Hygin. fab. 251.—Eurip. in Alceſt.

ALCHIMĂCHUS, a celebrated painter. Plin. 35, c. 11.

ALCIBIĂDES, an Athenian general, famous for his enterpriſing ſpirit, verſatile genius, and natural foibles. He was diſciple to Socrates, whoſe leſſons and example checked, for a while, his vicious propenſities. In the Peloponneſian wars he encouraged the Athenians to make an expedition againſt Syracuſe. He was choſen general in that war, and in his abſence, his enemies accuſed him of impiety, and confiſcated his goods. Upon this he fled, ſtirred up the Spartans to make war againſt Athens; and when this did not ſucceed, he retired to Tiſſaphernes, the Perſian general. Being recalled by the Athenians, he obliged the Lacedæmonians to ſue for peace, made ſeveral conqueſts in Aſia, and was received in triumph at Athens. His popularity was of ſhort duration; the failure of an expedition againſt Cyme, expoſed him again to the reſentment of the people, and he fled to Pharnabazus, whom he almoſt induced to make war upon Lacedæmon. This was told to Lyſander, the Spartan general, who prevailed upon Pharnabazus to murder Alcibiades. Two ſervants were ſent for that purpoſe, and they ſet on fire the cottage where he was, and killed him with darts as he attempted to make his eſcape. He died in the 46th year of his age, 404 B. C. after a life of perpetual difficulties. If the fickleneſs of his countrymen had known how to retain among them the talents of a man who diſtinguiſhed himſelf, and was admired wherever he went, they might have riſen to greater ſplendor, and to the ſovereignty of Greece. His character has been cleared from the aſperſions of malevolence, by the writings of Thucydides, Timæus, and Theopompus; and he is known to us as a hero, who, to the principles of the debauchee, added the intelligence and ſagacity of the ſtateſman, the cool intrepidity of the general, and the humanity of the philoſopher. Plut. & C. Nep. in Alcib.—Thucyd. 5, 6 & 7.—Xenoph. Hiſt. Græc. 1, &c.—Diod. 12.

ALCMÆON, was ſon of the prophet Amphiaraus and Eriphyle. His father going to the Theban war, where he was to periſh, charged him to revenge his death upon Eriphyle, who had betrayed him. [Vid. Eriphyle.] As ſoon as he heard of his father's death, he murdered his mother, for which crime the Furies perſecuted him till Phlegeus purified him and gave him his daughter Alpheſibœa in marriage. Alcmæon gave her the fatal collar which his mother had received to betray his father, and afterwards divorced her, and married Callirhoe the daughter of Achelous, to whom he promiſed the necklace he had given to Alpheſibœa. When he attempted to recover it, Alpheſibœa's brothers murdered him on account of the treatment he had ſhown their ſiſter, and left his body a prey to wild beaſts. Alcmæon's children by Callirhoe revenged their father's death by killing his murderers. [*Vid. He came to Athens, and from him the Alcmæonidæ are deſcended. Pauſ. 1, c. 18.

ALCMÆONĬDÆ, a noble family of Athens, deſcended from Alcmæon. They undertook for 300 talents to rebuild the temple of Delphi, which had been burnt, and they finiſhed the work in a more ſplendid manner than was required, in conſequence of which they gained popularity, and by their influence the Pythia prevailed upon the Lacedæmonians to deliver their country from the tyranny of the Piſiſtratidæ. Herodot. 5 & 6.—Thucyd. 6, c. 59.—Plut. in Solon.

ALCMAN, a very ancient Lyric poet, born in Sardinia, and not at Lacedæmon, as ſome ſuppoſe. He wrote, in the Doric dialect, 6 books of verſes, beſides a play called Colymboſas. He floriſhed B. C. 670, and died of the louſy diſeaſe. Pauſ. 1, c. 41. l. 3, c. 15.—Ariſtot. Hiſt. Anim. 5, c. 31.

ALCMĒNA, was daughter of Electryon king of Argos, by Anaxo, whom Plut. de Reb. Græc. calls Lyſidice, and Diod. l. 2, Eurymede. Her father promiſed his crown and his daughter to Amphitryon, if he would revenge the death of his ſons, who had been all killed, except Licymnius, by the Teleboans, a people of Ætolia. While Amphitryon was gone againſt the Ætolians, Jupiter, who was enamoured of Alcmena, reſolved to introduce himſelf into her bed. The more effectually to inſure ſucceſs in his amour, he aſſumed the form of Amphitryon, declared that he had obtained a victory over Alcmena's enemies, and even preſented her with a cup, which he ſaid he had preſerved from the ſpoils for her ſake. Alcmena yielded to her lover what ſhe had promiſed to her future huſband; and Jupiter, to delay the return of Amphitryon, ordered his meſſenger, Mercury, to ſtop the riſing of Phœbus, or the ſun, ſo that the night he paſſed with Alcmena was prolonged to three long nights. Amphitryon returned the next day; and after complaining of the coldneſs with which he was received, Alcmena acquainted him with the reception of a falſe lover the preceding night, and even ſhowed him the cup which ſhe had received. Amphitryon was perplexed at the relation, and more ſo upon miſſing the cup from among his ſpoils. He went to the prophet Tireſias, who told him of Jupiter's intrigue; and he returned to his wife, proud of the dignity of his rival. Alcmena became pregnant by Jupiter, and afterwards by her huſband; and when ſhe was going to bring forth, Jupiter boaſted in heaven, that a child was to be born that day, to whom he would give abſolute power over his neighbours, and even over all the children of his own blood. Juno, who was jealous of Jupiter's amours with Alcmena, made him ſwear by the Styx, and immediately prolonged the travails of Alcmena, and haſtened the bringing forth of the wife of Sthenelus king of Argos, who, after a pregnancy of ſeven months, had a ſon called Euryſtheus. Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 5, &c. ſays, that Juno was aſſiſted by Lucina to put off the bringing forth of Alcmena, and that Lucina, in the form of an old woman, ſat before the door of Amphitryon with her legs and arms croſſed. This poſture was the cauſe of infinite torment to Alcmena, till her ſervant, Galanthis, ſuppoſing the old woman to be a witch, and to be the cauſe of the pains of her miſtreſs, told her that ſhe had brought forth. Lucina retired from her poſture, and immediately Alcmena brought forth twins, Hercules conceived by Jupiter, and Iphiclus by Amphitryon. Euryſtheus was already born, and therefore Hercules was ſubjected to his power. After Amphitryon's death, Alcmena married Rhadamanthus, and retired to Ocalea in Bœotia. This marriage, according to ſome authors, was celebrated in the iſland of Leuce. The people of Megara ſaid that ſhe had been buried in the temple of Jupiter Olympius. Pauſ. 1, c. 41. l. 5, c. 18. l. 9, c. 16.—Plut. in Theſ. & Romul.—Homer. Od. 11. Il. 19.—*Pindar. ALEXANDER 1ſt, ſon of Amyntas, was the tenth king of Macedonia. He killed the Perſian ambaſſadors for their immodeſt behaviour to the women of his father's court, and was the firſt who raiſed the reputation of the Macedonians. He reigned 43 years, and died 451 B. C. Juſtin. 7, c. 3.—Herodot. 5, 7, 8 & 9.

ALEXANDER 2d, ſon of Amyntas 2d, king of Macedonia, was treacherouſly murdered, B. C. 370, by his younger brother Ptolemy, who held the kingdom for four years, and made way for Perdiccas and Philip. Juſtin. 7, c. 5, ſays Eurydice, the wife of Amyntas, was the cauſe of his murder.

ALEXANDER 3d, ſurnamed the Great, was ſon of Philip and Olympias. He was born B. C. 355, that night on which the famous temple of Diana at Epheſus was burnt by Eroſtratus. This event, according to the magicians, was an early prognoſtic of his future greatneſs, as well as the taming of Bucephalus, a horſe whom none of the king's courtiers could manage; upon which Philip ſaid with tears in his eyes, that his ſon muſt ſeek another kingdom, as that of Macedonia would not be ſufficiently large for the diſplay of his greatneſs. Olympias during her pregnancy declared, that ſhe was with child by a dragon; and the day that Alexander was born, two eagles perched for ſome time on the houſe of Philip, as if foretelling that his ſon would become maſter of Europe and Aſia. He was pupil to Ariſtotle during five years, and he received his learned preceptor's inſtructions with becoming deference and pleaſure, and ever reſpected his abilities. When Philip went to war, Alexander, in his 15th year, was left governor of Macedonia, where he quelled a dangerous ſedition and ſoon after followed his father to the field, and ſaved his life in a battle. He was highly offended when Philip divorced Olympias to marry Cleopatra, and even cauſed the death of Attalus, the new queen's brother. After this he retired from court to his mother Olympias, but was recalled; and when Philip was aſſaſſinated, he puniſhed his murderers; and, by his prudence and moderation, gained the affection of his ſubjects. He conquered Thrace and Illyricum, and deſtroyed Thebes; and after he had been choſen chief commander of all the forces of Greece, he declared war againſt the Perſians, who under Darius and Xerxes had laid waſte and plundered the nobleſt of the Grecian cities. With 32,000 foot and 5,000 horſe, he invaded Aſia, and after the defeat of Darius at the Granicus, he conquered all the provinces of Aſia Minor. He obtained two other celebrated victories over Darius at Iſſus and Arbela, took Tyre after an obſtinate ſiege of ſeven months, and the ſlaughter of 2000 of the inhabitants in cool blood, and made himſelf maſter of Egypt, Media, Syria, and Perſia. From Egypt he viſited the temple of Jupiter Ammon, and bribed the prieſts, who ſaluted him as the ſon of their god, and enjoined his army to pay him divine honors. He built a town which he called Alexandria, on the weſtern ſide of the Nile, near the coaſt of the Mediterranean, an eligible ſituation which his penetrating eye marked as beſt entitled to become the future capital of his immenſe dominions, and to extend the commerce of his ſubjects from the Mediterranean to the Ganges. His conqueſts were ſpread over India, where he fought with Porus, a powerful king of the country; and after he had invaded Scythia, and viſited the Indian ocean, he retired to Babylon, loaded with the ſpoils of the eaſt. His entering the city was foretold by the magicians as fatal, and their prediction was fulfilled. He died at Babylon the 21ſt of April, in the 32d year of his age, after a reign of 12 years and 8 months of brilliant and continued ſucceſs, 323 B. C. His death was ſo premature that ſome have attributed it to the effects of poiſon, and exceſs of drinking. Antipater has been accuſed of cauſing the fatal poiſon to be given him at a feaſt; and perhaps the reſentment of the Macedonians, whoſe ſervices he ſeemed to forget, by entruſting the guard of his body to the Perſians, was the cauſe of his death. He was ſo univerſally regretted, that Babylon was filled with tears and lamentations; and the Medes and Macedonians declared, that no one was able or worthy to ſucceed him. Many conſpiracies were formed againſt him by the officers of his army, but they were all ſeaſonably ſuppreſſed. His tender treatment of the wife and mother of king Darius, who were taken priſoners, has been greatly praiſed; and the latter, who had ſurvived the death of her ſon, killed herſelf when ſhe heard that Alexander was dead. His great intrepidity more than once endangered his life; he always fought as if ſure of victory, and the terror of his name was often more powerfully effectual than his arms. He was always forward in every engagement, and bore the labors of the field as well as the meaneſt of his ſoldiers. During his conqueſts in Aſia, he founded many cities, which he called Alexandria, after his own name. When he had conquered Darius, he ordered himſelf to be worſhipped as a god; and Calliſthenes, who refuſed to do it, was ſhamefully put to death. He murdered, at a banquet, his friend Clitus, who had once ſaved his life in a battle, becauſe he enlarged upon the virtues and exploits of Philip, and preferred them to thoſe of his ſon. His victories and ſucceſs encreaſed his pride; he dreſſed himſelf in the Perſian manner, and gave himſelf up to pleaſure and diſſipation. He ſet on fire the town of Perſepolis, in a fit of madneſs and intoxication, encouraged by the courtezan Thais. Yet among all his extravagancies, he was fond of candor and of truth; and when one of his officers read to him, as he ſailed on the Hydaſpes, an hiſtory which he had compoſed of the wars with Porus, and in which he had too liberally panegyrized him, Alexander ſnatched the book from his hand, and threw it into the river, ſaying, "what need is there of ſuch flattery? are not the exploits of Alexander ſufficiently meritorious in themſelves, without the colorings of falſehood?" He in like manner rejected a ſtatuary, who offered to cut mount Athos like him, and repreſent him as holding a town in one hand, and pouring a river from the other. He forbade any ſtatuary to make his ſtatue except Lyſippus, and any painter to draw his picture except Apelles. On his death-bed he gave his ring to Perdiccas, and it was ſuppoſed that by this ſingular preſent, he wiſhed to make him his ſucceſſor. Some time before his death, his officers aſked him whom he appointed to ſucceed him on the throne? and he anſwered, the worthieſt among you; but I am afraid, added he, my beſt friends will perform my funeral obſequies with bloody hands. Alexander, with all his pride, was humane and liberal, eaſy and familiar with his friends, a great patron of learning, as may be collected from his aſſiſting Ariſtotle with a purſe of money to effect the completion of his natural hiſtory. He was brave often to raſhneſs; he frequently lamented that his father conquered every thing, and left him nothing to do; and and exclaimed, in all the pride of regal dignity, Give me kings for competitors, and I will enter the lists at Olympia. All his family and infant children were put to death by Cassander. The first deliberation that was made after his decease, among his generals, was to appoint his brother Philip Aridæus successor, until Roxane, who was then pregnant by him, brought into the world a legitimate heir. Perdiccas wished to be supreme regent, as Aridæus wanted capacity; and, more strongly to establish himself, he married Cleopatra, Alexander's sister, and made alliance with Eumenes. As he endeavoured to deprive Ptolemy of Egypt, he was defeated in a battle by Seleucus and Antigonus, on the banks of the river Nile, and assassinated by his own cavalry. Perdiccas was the first of Alexander's generals who took up arms against his fellow soldiers, and he was the first who fell a sacrifice to his rashness and cruelty. To defend himself against him, Ptolemy made a treaty of alliance with some generals, among whom was Antipater, who had strengthened himself by giving his daughter Phila, an ambitious and aspiring woman, in marriage to Craterus, another of the generals of Alexander. After many dissensions and bloody wars among themselves, the generals of Alexander laid the foundations of several great empires in the three quarters of the globe. Ptolemy seized Egypt, where he firmly established himself, and where his successors were called Ptolemies, in honor of the founder of their empire, which subsisted till the time of Augustus. Seleucus and his posterity reigned in Babylon and Syria. Antigonus at first established himself in Asia Minor, and Antipater in Macedonia. The descendants of Antipater were conquered by the successors of Antigonus, who reigned in Macedonia till it was reduced by the Romans in the time of king Perseus. Lysimachus made himself master of Thrace; and Leonatus, who had taken possession of Phrygia, meditated for a while to drive Antipater from Macedonia. Eumenes established himself in Cappadocia, but was soon overpowered by the combinations of his rival Antigonus, and starved to death. During his life-time, Eumenes appeared so formidable to the successors of Alexander, that none of them dared to assume the title of king. *Curt. ALEXANDRĪA, the name of ſeveral cities which were founded by Alexander, during his conqueſts in Aſia; the moſt famous are —A great and extenſive city, built B. C. 332, by Alexander, on the weſtern ſide of the Delta. The illuſtrious founder intended it not only for the capital of Egypt, but of his immenſe conqueſts, and the commercial advantages which its ſituation commanded continued to improve from the time of Alexander till the invaſion of the Saracens in the 7th century. The commodities of India were brought there, and thence diſperſed to the different countries around the Mediterranean. Alexandria is famous, among other curioſities, for the large library which the pride or learning of the Ptolemies had collected there, at a vaſt expence, from all parts of the earth. This valuable repoſitory was burnt by the orders of the caliph Omar, A. D. 642; and it is ſaid, that during 6 months, the numerous volumes ſupplied fuel for the 4000 baths, which contributed to the health and convenience of the populous capital of Egypt. Alexandria has likewiſe been diſtinguiſhed for its ſchools, not only of theology and philoſophy, but of phyſic, where once to have ſtudied, was a ſufficient recommendation to diſtant countries. The aſtronomical ſchool, founded by Philadelphus, maintained its ſuperior reputation for 10 centuries till the time of the Saracens. The modern town of Scanderoon has been erected upon the ruins of Alexandria, and, as if it were an inſult to its former greatneſs, it ſcarce contains 6000 inhabitants. Curt. 4, c. 8.—Strab. 17.—Plin. 5, c. 10. ——Another in Albania, at the foot of mount Caucaſus.——Another in Arachoſia, in India.——The capital of Aria, between Hecatompylon and Bactra.——Another of Carmania.——Another in Cilicia, on the confines of Syria.——Another, the capital of Margiana.——Another of Troas, &c. Curt. 7.—Plin. 6, c. 16, 23, 25.

ALMO, a ſmall river near Rome, falling into the Tiber. Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 387.—Lucan. 1, v. 600.

ALMON, the eldeſt of the ſons of Tyrrhus. He was the firſt Rutulian killed by the Trojans; and from the ſkirmiſh which happened before and after his death, aroſe the the enmities which ended in the fall of Turnus. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 532.

ALŌA, feſtivals at Athens in honor of Bacchus and Ceres, by whoſe beneficence the huſbandmen received the recompence of their labors. The oblations were the fruits of the earth. Ceres has been called, from this, Aloas and Alois.

ALOĒUS, a giant, ſon of Titan and Terra. He married Iphimedia, by whom Neptune had two ſons, Othus and Ephialtus. Aloeus educated them as his own, and from that circumſtance they have been called Aloides. They made war againſt the gods, and were killed by Apollo and Diana. They grew up nine inches every month, and were only nine years old when they undertook their war. They built the town of Aſcra, at the foot of mount Helicon. Pauſ. 9, c. 29.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 582.—Homer. Il. 5, Od. 11.

ALOĪDES & ALOIDÆ, the ſons of Aloeus. Vid. Aloeus.

ALŎPE, daughter of Cercyon, king of Eleuſis, had a child by Neptune, whom ſhe expoſed in the woods, covered with a piece of her gown. The child was preſerved, and carried to Alope's father, who, upon knowing the gown, ordered his daughter to be put to death. Neptune, who could not ſave his miſtreſs, changed her into a fountain. The child was called Hippothoon, and placed by Theſeus upon his grandfather's throne. Pauſ. 1, c. 5 & 39. —Hygin. fab. 187.——One of the Harpies. Hygin. fab. 14.——A town of Theſſaly. Plin. 4, c. 7 —*Homer. ALOPIUS, a ſon of Hercules and Antiope. Apollod.

ALOS, a town of Achaia. Strab. 9.—Plin. 4, c. 7.

ALOTIA, feſtivals in Arcadia, in commemoration of a victory gained over Lacedæmon by the Arcadians.

ALPĒNUS, the capital of Locris, at the north of Thermopylæ. Herodot. 7, c. 176, &c.

ALPES, mountains that ſeparate Italy from Spain, Gaul, Rhætia, and Germany; conſidered as the higheſt ground in Europe. From them ariſe ſeveral rivers which after watering the neighbouring countries diſcharge themſelves into the German, Mediterranean and Euxine ſeas. The Alps are covered with perpetual ſnows, and diſtinguiſhed, according to their ſituation, by the different names of Cottiæ, Carnicæ, Graiæ, Noricæ, Juliæ, Maritimæ, Pannoniæ, Penninæ, Pænæ, Rhæticæ, Tridentinæ, Venetæ. A traveller is generally five days in reaching the top in ſome parts. They were ſuppoſed for a long time to be impaſſable. Hannibal marched his army over them, and made his way through rocks, by ſoftening and breaking them with vinegar. They were inhabited by fierce uncivilized nations, who were unſubdued till the age of Auguſtus, who, to eternize the victory he had obtained over them, erected a pillar in their territory. Strab. 4 & 5.—Liv. 21, c. 35.—Juv. 10, v. 151.—Horat. 2, Sat. 5, v. 41.—Lucan. 1, v. 183.—*Tacit. ALPHĒNUS. Vid. Alfenus.

ALPHESIBŒA, daughter of the river Phlegeus, married Alcmæon, ſon of Amphiaraus, who had fled to her father's court after the murder of his mother. [Vid. Alcmæon.] She received as a bridal preſent, the famous necklace which Polynices had given to Eriphyle, to induce her to betray her huſband Amphiaraus. Alcmæon, being perſecuted by the manes of his mother, left his wife by order of the oracle, and retired near the Achelous, whoſe daughter Callirhoe he married. Callirhoe had two ſons by him, and begged of him, as a preſent, the necklace which was then in the hands of Alphesibœa. He endeavoured to obtain it, and was killed by Temenus and Axion, Alphesibœa's brothers, who thus revenged their ſiſter, who had been ſo innocently abandoned. Hygin. fab. 244.—Propert. 1, el. 15, v. 15.—Pauſ. 8, c. 24.

ALPHESIBŒUS, a ſhepherd, often mentioned in Virgil's eclogues.

ALPHĒUS, a famous river of Peloponneſus, which riſes in Arcadia, and after paſſing through Elis and Achaia, falls into the ſea. The god of this river fell in love with the nymph Arethuſa, and purſued her till ſhe was changed into a fountain by Diana. The fountain Arethuſa is in Ortygia, a ſmall iſland near Syracuſe; and the ancients affirm, that the river Alpheus paſſes under the ſea from Peloponneſus, and without without mingling itſelf with the ſalt waters, riſes again in Ortygia, and joins the ſtream of Arethuſa. If any thing is thrown into the Alpheus in Elis, according to their traditions, it will re-appear, after ſome time ſwimming on the waters of Arethuſa near Sicily. Hercules made uſe of the Alpheus to clean the ſtables of Augias. Strab. 6.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 694.—Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 10.—Lucan. 3, v. 176.—*Stat. ALTHÆA, daughter of Theſtius and Eurythemis, married Œneus, king of Calydon, by whom ſhe had many children, among whom was Meleager. When Althæa brought forth Meleager, the Parcæ placed a log of wood in the fire, and ſaid, that as long as it was preſerved, ſo long would the life of the child juſt born, be prolonged. The mother ſaved the wood from the flames, and kept it very carefully; but when Meleager killed his two uncles, Althea's brothers, Althæa, to revenge their death, threw the log into the fire, and as ſoon as it was burnt, Meleager expired. She was afterwards ſo ſorry for the death which ſhe had cauſed, that ſhe killed herſelf, unable to ſurvive her ſon. Vid. Meleager.—Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 4.—Homer. Il. 9.—Pauſ. 8, c. 45, l. 10, c. 31.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.

ALTHÆMĔNES, a ſon of Creteus king of Crete. Hearing that either he or his brothers were to be their father's murderer, he fled to Rhodes, where he made a ſettlement to avoid becoming a parricide. After the death of all his other ſons, Creteus went after his ſon Althæmenes; when he landed in Rhodes, the inhabitants attacked him, ſuppoſing him to be an enemy, and he was killed by the hand of his own ſon. When Althæmenes knew that he had killed his father, he entreated the gods to remove him, and the earth immediately opened, and ſwallowed him up. Apollod. 3, c. 2.

ALTĪNUM, a flouriſhing city near Aquileia. Plin. 3, c. 18.

AMASIA, a city of Pontus, where Mithridates the great, and Strabo the geographer, were born. Strab. 12.

AMĀSIS, a man who, from a common ſoldier, became king of Egypt. He made war againſt Arabia, and died before the invaſion of his country by Cambyſes king of Perſia. He made a law, that every one of his ſubjects ſhould yearly give an account to the public magiſtrates, of the manner in which he ſupported himſelf. He refuſed to continue in alliance with Polycrates the tyrant of Samos, on account of his uncommon proſperity. When Cambyſes came into Egypt, he ordered the body of Amaſis to be dug up, and to be inſulted and burnt; an action which was very offenſive to the religious notions of the Egyptians. Herodot. 1, 2, 3.——A man who led the Perſians againſt the inhabitants of Barce. Herodot. 4, c. 201, &c.

AMAXIA or AMAXĪTA, an ancient town of Troas.——A place of Cilicia abounding with wood fit for building ſhips. Plin. 5, c. 9.—Strab. 14.

AMAZĒNES or MAZĒNES, a prince of the iſland Oractus, who ſailed for ſome time with the Macedonians and Nearchus in Alexander's expedition into the eaſt. Arrian. in Indic.

AMAZŎNES or AMAZŎNĪDES, a nation of famous women who lived near the river Thermodon in Cappadocia. All their life was employed in wars and manly exerciſes. They never had any commerce with the other ſex; but, only for the ſake of propagation, they viſited the inhabitants of the neighbouring country for a few days, and the male children which they brought forth were given to the fathers. According to Juſtin, they were ſtrangled as ſoon as born, and Diodorus ſays that they maimed them and diſtorted their limbs. The females were carefully educated with their mothers, in the labors of the field; their right breaſt was burnt off, that they might hurl a javelin with more force, and make a better uſe of the bow; from that circumſtance, therefore, their name is derived (α non, μαζα mamma). They founded an extenſive empire in Aſia Minor, along the the ſhores of the Euxine, and near the Thermodon. They were defeated in a battle near the Thermodon, by the Greeks; and ſome of them migrated beyond the Tanais, and extended their territories as far as the Caſpian ſea. Themyſcyra was the moſt capital of their towns. Smyrna, Magneſia, Thyatira, and Epheſus, according to ſome authors, were built by them. Diodorus I. 3, mentions a nation of Amazons in Africa, more ancient than thoſe of Aſia. Some authors, among whom is Strabo, deny the exiſtence of the Amazons, but Juſtin and Diodorus particularly ſupport it; and the latter ſays, that Penthefilea, one of their queens, came to the Trojan war on the ſide of Priam, and that ſhe was killed by Achilles, and from that time the glory and character of the Amazons gradually decayed, and was totally forgotten. The Amazons of Africa floriſhed long before the Trojan war, and many of their actions have been attributed to thoſe of Aſia. It is ſaid, that after they had almoſt ſubdued all Aſia, they invaded Attica, and were conquered by Theſeus. Their moſt famous actions were their expedition againſt Priam, and afterwards the aſſiſtance they gave him during the Trojan war; and their invaſion of Attica, to puniſh Theſeus, who had carried away Antiope, one of their queens. They were alſo conquered by Bellerophon and Hercules. Among their queens, Hippolyte, Antiope, Lampeto, Marpeſia, &c. are famous. Curtius ſays, that Thaleſtris, one of their queens, came to Alexander whilſt he was purſuing his conqueſts in Aſia, for the ſake of raiſing children from a man of ſuch military reputation; and that after ſhe had remained 13 days with him, ſhe retired into her country. The Amazons were ſuch expert archers, that, to denote the goodneſs of a bow or quiver, it was uſual to call it Amazonian. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 311.—Jornand. de Reb. Get. c. 7.—Philoſtr. Icon. 2, c. 5.—Juſtin. 2, c. 4.—Curt. 6, c. 5.—Plin. 6, c. 7, l. 14, c. 8, l. 36, c. 5.—Herodot. 4, c. 110.—Strab. 11.—Diod. 2.—*Dionyſ. AMBRŎSIA, feſtivals obſerved in honor of Bacchus, in ſome cities in Greece. They were the ſame as the Brumalia of the Romans.—— mans.——One of the daughters of Atlas, changed into a conſtellation after death.—— The food of the gods was called ambroſia, and their drink nectar. The word ſignifies immortal. It had the power of giving immortality to all thoſe who eat it. It was ſweeter than honey, and of a moſt odoriferous ſmell; and it is ſaid, that Berenice the wife of Ptolemy Soter, was ſaved from death by eating ambroſia given her by Venus. Titonus was made immortal by Aurora, by eating ambroſia; and in like manner Tantalus and Pelops, who, on account of their impiety had been driven from heaven, and compelled to die upon earth. It had the power of healing wounds, and therefore Apollo, in Homer's Iliad, ſaves Sarpedon's body from putrefaction, by rubbing it with ambroſia; and Venus alſo heals the wounds of her ſon, in Virgil's Æneid, with it. The gods uſed generally to perfume their hair with ambroſia, as Juno when ſhe adorned herſelf to captivate Jupiter, and Venus when ſhe appeared to Æneas. *Homer. When the Athenians were afraid of Alexander, Amilcar went to his camp, gained his confidence, and ſecretly tranſmitted an account of all his ſchemes to Athens. Trogus. 21, c. 6.——A Carthaginian, whom the Syracuſans called to their aſſiſtance againſt the tyrant Agathocles, who beſieged their city. Amilcar ſoon after favored the intereſt of Agathocles, for which he was accuſed at Carthage. He died in Syracuſe, B. C. 309. Diod. 20.—Juſtin. 22, c. 2 & 3.——A Carthaginian, ſirnamed Barcas, father to the celebrated Annibal. He was general in Sicily during the firſt Punic war; and after a peace had been made with the Romans, he quelled a rebellion of ſlaves, who had beſieged Carthage, and taken many towns of Africa, and rendered themſelves ſo formidable to the Carthaginians that they begged and obtained aſſiſtance from Rome. After this, he paſſed into Spain with his ſon Annibal, who was but nine years of age, and laid the foundation of the town of Barcelona. He was killed in a battle againſt the Vettones B. C. 237. He had formed the plan of an invaſion of Italy, by croſſing the Alps, which his ſon afterwards carried into execution. His great enmity to the Romans was the cauſe of the ſecond Punic war. He uſed to ſay of his three ſons, that he kept three lions to devour the Roman power. *C. AMMĀLO, a feſtival in honor of Jupiter in Greece.

AMMIĀNUS. Vid. Marcellinus.

AMMON & HAMMON, a name of Jupiter, worſhipped in Libya. He appeared under the form of a ram to Bacchus, who, with his army, ſuffered the greateſt extremities for want of water, in the deſerts of Africa, and ſhewed him a fountain. Upon this, Bacchus erected a temple to his father, under the name of Jupiter Ammon, i. e. ſandy, with the horns of a ram. The ram, according to ſome, was made a conſtellation. The temple of Jupiter Ammon was in the deſerts of Libya, nine days journey from Alexandria. It had a famous oracle, which, according to ancient tradition, was eſtabliſhed about 18 centuries before the time of Auguſtus, by two doves which flew away from Thebais in Egypt, and came one to Dodona, and the other to Libya, where the people were ſoon informed of their divine miſſion. The oracle of Hammon was conſulted by Hercules, Perſeus, and others; but when it pronounced Alexander to be the ſon of Jupiter, ſuch flattery deſtroyed its long eſtabliſhed reputation, and in the age of Plutarch it was ſcarce known. The ſituation of the temple was pleaſant; and according to Ovid. Met. 15, v. 310.—Lucret. 6, v. 847.—Herodot. in Melpom.—Curt. 4, c. 7. there was near it a fountain whoſe waters were cold at noon and midnight, and warm in the morning and evening. There were above 100 prieſts in the temple, but only the elders delivered oracles. There was alſo an oracle of Jupiter Ammon in Æthiopia. Plin. 6, c. 29.—Strab. 1. 11 & 17. —Plut. cur orac. edi deſierant, & in Iſid.—Curt. 6, c. 10. l. 10, c. 5.—Herodot. 1, c. 6, l. 2, c. 32 & 55. l. 4, c. 44.—Pauſ. 3, c. 18. l. 4, c. 23—Hygin. fab. 133. Poet. aſtr. 2, c. 20.—Juſtin. 1, c. 9. l. 11, c. 11.——A king of Libya, father to Bacchus. Amphiānax, a king of Lycia in the time of Acriſius & Prœtus. Apollod. 2, c. 2.

Amphiarāus, ſon of Oicleus, or according to others, of Apollo, by Hypermneſtra, was at the chace of the Calydonian boar, and accompanied the Argonauts in their expedition. He was famous for his knowledge of futurity. He married Eriphyle, the ſiſter of Adraſtus king of Argos, by whom he had two ſons, Alcmæon and Amphilochus. When Adraſtus, at the requeſt of Polynices, declared war againſt Thebes, Amphiaraus ſecreted himſelf, not to accompany his brother-in-law in an expedition in which he knew he was to periſh. But Eriphyle, who knew where he had concealed himſelf, was prevailed upon to betray him by Polynices, who gave her as a reward for her perfidy, a famous golden necklace ſet with diamonds. Amphiaraus being thus diſcovered, went to the war, but previouſly charged his ſon Alcmæon to put to death his mother Eriphyle, as ſoon as he was informed that he was killed. The Theban war was fatal to the Argives, and Amphiaraus was ſwallowed up in his chariot by the earth as he attempted to retire from the battle. The news of his death was brought to Alcmæon, who immediately executed his father's command, and murdered Eriphyle. Amphiaraus received divine honors after death, and had a celebrated temple and oracle at Oropos in Attica. His ſtatue was made of white marble, and near his temple was a fountain, whoſe waters were ever held ſacred. They only who had conſulted his oracle, or had been delivered from a diſeaſe, were permitted to bathe in it, after which they threw pieces of gold and ſilver into the ſtream. Thoſe who conſulted the oracle of Amphiaraus, firſt purified themſelves, and abſtained from food for 24 hours, and three days from wine, after which they ſacrificed a ram to the prophet, and ſpread the ſkin upon the ground, upon which they ſlept in expectation of receiving in a dream the anſwer of the oracle. Plutarch de orac. defect. mentions, that the oracle of Amphiaraus was once conſulted in the time of Xerxes, by one of the ſervants of Mardonius, for his maſter, who was then with an army in Greece; and that the ſervant, when aſleep, ſaw in a dream the prieſt of the temple, who upbraided him, and drove him away, and even threw ſtones at his head when he refuſed to comply. This oracle was verified in the death of Mardonius, who was actually killed by the blow of a ſtone he received on the head. Cic. de Div. 1, c. 40.—Philoſtr. in vit. Apollon. 2, c. 11.—*Homer. Amphicrātes, an hiſtorian who wrote the lives of illuſtrious men. Diog.

Amphictyon, ſon of Deucalion & Pyrrha, reigned at Athens after Cranaus, and firſt attempted to give the interpretation of dreams, and to draw omens. Some ſay that the deluge happened in his age. Juſtin. 2, c. 6.——The ſon of Helenus, who firſt eſtabliſhed the celebrated council of the Amphictyons, compoſed of the wiſeſt and moſt virtuous men of ſome cities of Greece. This auguſt aſſembly conſiſted of 12 perſons, originally ſent by the following ſtates; the Ionians, Dorians, Perhæbians, Bœotians, Magneſians, Phthians, Locrians, Malians, Phocians, Theſſalians, Dolopes, and the people of Œta. Other cities in proceſs of time ſent alſo ſome of their citizens to the council of the Amphictyons, and in the age of Antoninus Pius, they were encreaſed to the number of 30. They generally met twice every year at Delphi, and ſometimes ſat at Thermopylæ. They took into conſideration all matters of difference which might exiſt between the different ſtates of Greece. When the Phocians plundered the temple of Delphi, the Amphictyons declared war againſt them, and this war was ſupported by all the ſtates of Greece, and laſted 10 years. The Phocians, with their allies, the Lacedæmonians, were deprived of the privilege of ſitting in the council of the Amphictyons, and the Macedonians were admitted in their place, for their ſervices in ſupport of the war. About 60 years after, when Brennus, with the Gauls, invaded Greece, the Phocians behaved with ſuch courage, that they were reinſtated in all their former privileges. Before they proceeded to buſineſs, the Amphictyons ſacrificed an ox to the god of Delphi, and cut his fleſh into ſmall pieces, intimating that union and unanimity prevailed in the ſeveral cities which they repreſented. Their deciſions were held ſacred and inviolable, and even arms were taken up to inforce them. Pauſ. in Phocic. & Achaic.

AMPHĪON, was son of Jupiter, by Antiope daughter of Nycteus, who had married Lycus, and had been repudiated by him when he married Dirce. Amphion was born at the same birth as Zethus, on mount Citheron, where Antiope had fled to avoid the resentment of Dirce; and the two children were exposed in the woods, but preserved by a shepherd. [Vid. Antiope.] When Amphion grew up, he cultivated poetry, and made such an uncommon progress in music, that he is said to have been the inventor of it, and to have built the walls of Thebes at the sound of his lyre. Mercury taught him music, and gave him the lyre. He was the first who raised an altar to this god. Zethus and Amphion united to avenge the wrongs which their mother had suffered from the cruelties of Dirce. They besieged and took Thebes, put Lycus to death, and tied his wife to the tail of a wild bull, who dragged her through precipices till she expired. The fable of Amphion's moving stones and raising the walls of Thebes at the sound of his lyre, has been explained by supposing that he persuaded by his eloquence, a wild and uncivilized people, to unite together and build a town to protect themselves against the attacks of their enemies. Homer. Theb. 1, v. 10.——A son of Jasus king of Orchomenos, by Persephone daughter of Mius. He married Niobe, daughter of Tantalus, by whom he had many children, among whom was Chloris the wife of Neleus. He has been confounded by mythologists with the son of Antiope, though Homer, in his Odyssey, speaks of them both, and distinguishes them beyond contradiction. The number of Amphion's children, according to Homer, was 12, six of each sex; according to Ælian, 20; and according to Ovid 14, seven males and seven females. When Niobe boasted herself greater, and more deserving of immortality than Latona, all her children, except Chloris, were destroyed by the arrows of Apollo and Diana; Niobe herself was changed into a stone, and Amphion killed himself in a fit of despair. *Homer. Amphĭtryon, a Theban prince, ſon of Alcæus and Hipponome. His ſiſter Anaxo had married Electryon king of Mycenæ, whoſe ſons were killed in a battle by the Teleboans. Electryon promiſed his crown, and daughter Alcmena, to him who could revenge the death of his ſons upon the Teleboans; and Amphitryon offered himſelf, and was received, on condition that he ſhould not approach Alcmena before he had obtained a victory. Jupiter, who was captivated with the charms of Alcmena, borrowed the features of Amphitryon, when he was gone to the war, and introduced himſelf to Electryon's daughter, as her huſband returned victorious. Alcmena became pregnant of Hercules by Jupiter, and of Iphiclus by Amphitryon, after his return. [Vid. Alcmena.] When Amphitryon returned from the war, he brought back to Electryon, the herds which the Teleboans had taken from him. One of the cows having ſtrayed from the reſt, Amphitryon, to bring them together, threw a ſtick, which ſtruck the horns of the cow, and rebounded with ſuch violence upon Electryon that he died on the ſpot. After this accidental murder, Sthenelus, Electryon's brother, ſeized the kingdom of Mycenæ, and obliged Amphitryon to leave Argolis, and retire to Thebes with Alcmena. Creon, king of Thebes, purified him of the murder. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 213.—Propert. 4, el. 10, v. 1.—Heſiod. in Scut. Herc.—Hygin. fab. 29.—Pauſ. 8, c. 14.

AMŪLIUS, king of Alba, was ſon of Procas, and youngeſt brother to Numitor. The crown belonged to Numitor by right of birth; but Amulius diſpoſſeſſed him of it, and even put to death his ſon Lauſus, and conſecrated his daughter Rhea Sylvia to the ſervice of Veſta, to prevent her ever becoming a mother. Yet, in ſpite of all theſe precautions, Rhea became pregnant by the god Mars, and brought forth twins, Romulus and Remus. Amulius, who was informed of this, ordered the mother to be buried alive for violating the laws of Veſta, which enjoined perpetual chaſtity, and the two children to be thrown into the river. They were providentially ſaved by ſome ſhepherds, or, as others ſay, by a ſhe-wolf; and when they had attained the years of manhood, they put to death the uſurper, Amulius, and reſtored the crown to their grandfather. *Ovid. AMŸCLÆ, a town of Italy between Caieta and Tarracina, built by the companions of Caſtor and Pollux. The inhabitants were ſtrict followers of the precepts of Pythagoras, and therefore abſtained from fleſh. They were killed by ſerpents, which they thought impious to deſtroy, though in their own defence. Plin. 8, c. 29. Once a report prevailed in Amyclæ, that the enemies were coming to ſtorm it; upon which the inhabitants made a law, that forbade ſuch a report to be credited, and when the enemy really arrived, no one mentioned it, or took up arms in his own defence, and the town was eaſily taken. From this circumſtance the epithet of tacitæ has been given to Amyclæ. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 564.—Sil. 8, v. 529.——A city of Peloponneſus, built by Amyclas. Caſtor and Pollux were born there. Æn.* 1, v. 225. l. 9, v. 772.——Another likewiſe killed by Turnus. Ib. 12, v. 509.——A ſon of Ixion and the cloud. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 245.

AMŸDON, a city of Macedonia, which ſent auxiliaries to Priam during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2.

AMŸMŌNE, daughter of Danaus and Europa, married Enceladus, ſon of Ægyptus, whom ſhe murdered the firſt night of her nuptials. She wounded a ſatyr with an arrow which ſhe had aimed at a ſtag. The ſatyr purſued her, and even offered her violence, but Neptune delivered her. It was ſaid, that ſhe was the only one of the 50 ſiſters who was not condemned to fill a leaky tub with water in hell, becauſe ſhe had been continually employed, by order of her father, in ſupplying the city of Argos with water, in a great drought. Neptune ſaw her in this employment, and was enamoured of her. He carried her away, and in the place where ſhe ſtood, he raiſed a fountain, by ſtriking a rock. The fountain has been called Amymone. She had Nauplius by Neptune. Apollod. 2.—Strab. 8.—Pauſ. 2, c. 37.—Ovid. Amor. 1, v. 515.—Hygin. fab. 169.——A fountain and rivulet of Peloponneſus, flowing through Argolis into the lake of Lerna. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 240.

Amyntas 1ſt, was king of Macedonia after his father Alcetas. His ſon Alexander murdered the ambaſſadors of Megabyzus, for their wanton and inſolent behaviour to the ladies of his father's court. Bubares, a Perſian general, was ſent with an army to revenge the death of the ambaſſadors; but inſtead of making war, he married the king's daughter, and defended his poſſeſſions. Juſtin. 7, c. 3.—Herodot. 5, 7 & 8.——The ſecond of that name was ſon of Menelaus, and king of Macedonia, after his murder of Pauſanias. He was expelled by the Illyrians, and reſtored by the Theſſalians and Spartans. He made war againſt the Illyrians and Olynthians, and lived to a great age. His wife, Eurydice, conſpired againſt his life; but her ſnares were ſeaſonably diſcovered by one of his daughters by a former wife. He had Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip, Alexander the Great's father, by his firſt wife; and by the other he had Archelaus, Aridæus, and Menelaus. He reigned 24 years; and ſoon after his death, his ſon Philip murdered all his brothers, and aſcended the throne. Juſtin. 7, c. 4 & 9.—Diod. 14, &—C. Nep. & Plut. in Pelopid.—There is another king of Macedonia of the ſame name, but of his life few particulars are recorded in hiſtory.—A man who ſucceeded Dejotarus, in the kingdom of Gallogræcia. After his death it became a Roman province under Auguſtus. Strab. 12.——One of Alexander's officers.—Another officer who deſerted to Darius, and was killed as he attempted to ſeize Egypt. Curt. 3, c. 9.——A ſon of Antiochus, who withdrew himſelf from Macedonia, becauſe he hated Alexander.—An officer in Alexander's cavalry. He had two brothers called Simmias and Polemon. He was accuſed of conſpiracy againſt the king, on account of his great intimacy with Philotas, and acquitted. Curt. 4, c. 15. l. 6, c. 9. l. 8. c. 12.——A ſhepherd's name in Virgil's Eclog.—A Greek writer who compoſed ſeveral works quoted by Athenæus.

Amyntianus, an hiſtorian in the age of Antoninus, who wrote a treatiſe in commendation of Philip, Olympias, and Alexander.

Amyntor, a king of Argos, ſon of Phraſtor. He deprived his ſon Phœnix of his eyes, to puniſh him for the violence he had offered to Clytia his concubine. Hygin. fab. 173.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 307.—Apollod. 3. Homer. Il. 9.——A general of the Dolopes. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 364.——A ſon of Ægyptus, killed by Damone the firſt night of his marriage. Hygin. fab. 170.

Amyris, a man of Sybaris, who conſulted the oracle of Delphi concerning the probable duration of his country's proſperity, &c.

Amyricus Campus, a plain of Theſſaly. Polyb. 3.

Amȳrus, a town of Theſſaly.—A river mentioned by Val. Flacc. 2, v. 11.

Amystis, a river of India falling into the Ganges. Arrian in Indic.

Amythāon, a ſon of Cretheus king of Iolchos, by Tyro. He married Idomene, by whom he had Bias and Melampus. After his father's death, he eſtabliſhed himſelf in Meſſenia, with his brother Neleus, and re-eſtabliſhed or regulated the Olympic games.—Melampus is called Amythaonius, from his father Amythaon. Virg. G. 3, v. 550.—Diod. 4.—Apollod. 1.—Homer. Od. 11.——A ſon of Hippaſus, who aſſiſted Priam in the Trojan war, and was killed by Lycomedes. Homer. Il. 17.

Amytis, a daughter of Aſtyages, whom Cyrus married. Cteſias.——A daughter of Xerxes, who married Megabyzus, and diſgraced herſelf by her debaucheries.

Anăces or Anactes, a name given to Caſtor and Pollux. Their feſtivals were called Anaceia. Plut. in Theſ.

Anacharsis, a Scythian philoſopher, 592 B. C. who, on account of his wiſdom, temperance, and extenſive knowledge, has been called one of the ſeven wiſe men. Like his countrymen, he made uſe of a cart inſtead of a houſe. He was wont to compare laws to cobwebs, which can ſtop only ſmall flies, and are unable to reſiſt the ſuperior force of large inſects. When he returned to Scythia, from Athens, where he had ſpent ſome time in ſtudy, and in the friendſhip of Solon, he attempted to introduce there the laws of the Athenians, which ſo irritated his brother, who was then on the throne, that he killed him with an arrow. Anacharſis has rendered himſelf famous among the ancients by his writings and his poems on war, the laws of Scythia, &c.—Two of his letters to Cræſus and Hanno are ſtill extant. Later authors have attributed to him the invention of tinder, of anchors, and the potter's wheel. Herodot. 4, c. 46, 47 & 48.—Plut. in Conviv. Cic. Tuſc. 5, c. 32.—Strab. 7.

Anacium, a mountain with a temple ſacred to the Anaces in Peloponneſus. Pauſ. lyæn. 1, c. 21.

Anacreon, a famous lyric poet of Teos in Ionia, highly favored by Polycrates and Hipparchus

Hipparchus ſon of Philoſtratus. He was of a laſcivious and intemperate diſpoſition, much given to drinking, and deeply enamoured of a youth called Bathyllus. His odes are ſtill extant, and the uncommon ſweetneſs and elegance of his poetry have been the admiration of every age and country. He lived to his 85th year, and after much pleaſure and debauchery, choaked himſelf with a grape ſtone, and expired. Plato ſays, that he was deſcended from an illuſtrious family, and that Codrus, the laſt king of Athens, was one of his progenitors. His ſtatue was placed in the citadel of Athens, repreſenting him as an old drunken man, ſinging, with every mark of diſſipation and intemperance. Anacreon floriſhed 532 B. C. All that he wrote is not extant; his odes were firſt publiſhed by H. Stephens, with an elegant tranſlation. The beſt editions of Anacreon are, that of Maittaire, 4to. London 1725, of which only one hundred copies were printed, and the very correct one of Barnes, 12mo, Cantab. 1721, to which may be added that of Brunck, 12mo, Argentor. 1778. Pauſ. 1, c. 2. 25.—Strab. 14.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 4.—Cic. in Tuſc. 4, c. 33.—Horat. epod. 14, v. 20.—Plin. 7, c. 7.—Herodot. 3, c. 121.

ANACTORIA & ANACTORIUM, a town of Epirus, in a peninſula towards the gulph of Ambracia. It was founded by a Corinthian colony, and was the cauſe of many quarrels between the Corcyreans and Corinthians.—Auguſtus carried the inhabitants to the city of Nicopolis, after the battle of Actium. Strab. 10.—Thucyd. 1, c. 55.—Plin. 4, c. 1, l. 5, c. 29.——An ancient name of Miletus.

ANACTŎRIE, a woman of Leſbos, wantonly loved by Sappho. Ovid. Her. 15, v. 17.

ANADYOMĔNE, a valuable painting of Venus riſing from the ſea, by Apelles. Auguſtus bought it, and placed it in the temple of J. Cæſar. The lower part of it was a little defaced, and there were found no painters in Rome able to repair it. Plin. 35, c. 10.

ANAGNIA, a city of the Hernici in Latium, where Antony ſtruck a medal when he divorced Octavia and married Cleopatra. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 684.—Strab. 5.—Ital. 8, v. 392.

ANAĪTIS, a goddeſs of Armenia. The virgins who were conſecrated to her ſervice, eſteemed themſelves more dignified by public proſtitution. The feſtivals of the deity were called Sacarum Feſta; and when they were celebrated, both ſexes aſſiſted at the ceremony, and inebriated themſelves to ſuch a degree, that the whole was concluded by a ſcene of the greateſt laſciviouſneſs and intemperance. They were firſt inſtituted by Cyrus, when he marched againſt the Sacæ, and covered tables, with the moſt exquiſite dainties, that he might detain the enemy by the novelty and ſweetneſs of food to which they were unaccuſtomed, and thus eaſily deſtroy them. Strab. 11.——Diana is alſo worſhipped under this name by the Lydians. Plin. 33, c. 4.

ANAGYRONTUM, a ſmall village of Attica. Herodot.

ANANIAS, an Iambic poet. Athen.

ANĂPHE, an iſland that roſe out of the Cretan ſea, and received this name from the Argonauts, who, in the middle of a ſtorm, ſuddenly ſaw the new moon. Apollo was worſhipped there, and called Anaphæus. Apollonius.

ANAPHLYSTUS, an Athenian tribe called after an ancient hero of the ſame name, who was ſon of Troezen.——A ſmall village near Athens.

ANĂPUS, a river of Epirus. Thucyd. 2, c. 82.——Of Sicily. Id. 6, c. 96.

ANARTES, a people of lower Pannonia. Cæſ. 6, bell. G. c. 25.

ANAS, a river of Spain, now called Guadiana. Strab. 3.

ANATŎLE, one of the Horæ. Hygin. fab. 183.——A mountain near the Ganges, where Apollo raviſhed a nymph called Anaxibia.

ANAUCHĬDAS, a Samian wreſtler. Pauſ. 5, c. 27.

ANAURUS, a river of Theſſaly, near the foot of mount Pelion.——A river of Troas near Ida. Coluth.

ANAUSIS, one of Medea's ſuitors, killed by Styrus. Val. Flacc. 6, v. 43.

ANAX, a ſon of Cœlus and Terra, from whom Miletus has been called Anactoria. Pauſ. 1, c. 36. l. 7, c. 2.

ANAXAGŎRAS ſucceeded his father Megapenthes on the throne of Argos. He ſhared the ſovereign power with Bias and Melampus, who had cured the women of Argos of madneſs. Pauſ. 2, c. 18.——A Clazomenian philoſopher, ſon of Hegeſibulus, diſciple to Anaximenes, and preceptor to Socrates, and Euripides. He diſregarded wealth and honors, to indulge his fondneſs for meditation and philoſophy. He applied himſelf to aſtronomy, was acquainted with eclipſes, and predicted that one day a ſtone would fall from the ſun, which it is ſaid really fell into the river Ægos. Anaxagoras travelled into Egypt for improvement, and uſed to ſay that he preferred a grain of wiſdom to heaps of gold. Pericles was in the number of his pupils, and often conſulted him in matters of ſtate; and once diſſuaded him from ſtarving himſelf to death. The ideas of Anaxagoras, concerning the heavens, were wild and extravagant. He ſuppoſed that the ſun was inflammable matter, about the bigneſs of Peloponneſus; and that the moon was inhabited. The heavens he believed to be of ſtone, and the earth of ſimiliar materials. He was accuſed of impiety, and condemned to die; but he ridiculed the ſentence, and ſaid it had long been pronounced upon him by nature. Being aſked whether his body ſhould be carried into his own country, he anſwered no, as the road that led to the other ſide of the grave was as long from one place as the other. His ſcholar Pericles pleaded eloquently and ſucceſsfully for him, and the ſentence of death was exchanged for baniſhment. In priſon, the philoſopher is ſaid to have attempted to ſquare the circle, or determine exactly the proportion of its diameter to the circumference. When the people of Lampſacus aſked him before his death, whether he wiſhed any thing to be done in commemoration of him, Yes, ſays he, let the boys be allowed to play on the anniverſary of my death. This was carefully obſerved, and that time dedicated to relaxation, was called Anaxagoreia. He died at Lampſacus in his 72d year, 428 B. C. His writings were not much eſteemed by his pupil Socrates. Diog. in vita.—Plut. in Nicâ & Pericl.—Cic. Acad. Q. 4, c. 23. Tuſc. 1, c. 43.——A ſtatuary of Ægina. Pauſ. 5, c. 23.——A grammarian, diſciple to Zenodotus. Diog.——An orator, diſciple to Socrates. Diog.——A ſon of Echeanax, who, with his brothers Codrus and Diodorus, deſtroyed Hegeſias, tyrant of Epheſus.

ANAXANDER, of the family of the Heraclidæ, was ſon of Eurycrates, and king of Sparta. The ſecond Meſſenian war began in his reign, in which Ariſtomenes ſo egregiouſly ſignalized himſelf. Herodot. 7, c. 204.—Plut. in Apoph.—Pauſ. 3, c. 3. l. 4, c. 15 & 16.——A general of Megalopolis, taken by the Thebans.

ANAXANDRĬDES, ſon of Leon, and father to Cleomenes 1ſt, and Leonidas, was king of Sparta. By the order of the Ephori, he divorced his wife, of whom he was extremely fond, on account of her barrenneſs; and he was the firſt Lacedæmonian who had two wives. Herodot. 1, 5 & 7.—Plut. in Apoph. 1.—Pauſ. 3, c. 3, &c.——A ſon of Theopompus. Herodot. 8, c. 131.——A comic poet of Rhodes in the age of Philip and Alexander. He was the firſt poet who introduced intrigues and rapes upon the ſtage. He was of ſuch a paſſionate diſpoſition that he tore to pieces all his compoſitions which met with no ſucceſs. He compoſed about a hundred plays, of which ten obtained the prize. Some fragments of his poetry remain in Athenæus. He was ſtarved to death by order of the Athenians, for ſatyrizing their government. Ariſtot. 3, Rhet.

ANAXARCHUS, a philoſopher of Abdera, one of the followers of Democritus, and the friend of Alexander. When the monarch had been wounded in a battle, the philoſopher pointed to the place, adding, that is human blood, and not the blood of a god. The freedom of Anaxarchus offended Nicocreon at Alexander's table, and the tyrant, in revenge, ſeized the philoſopher, and pounded him in a ſtone mortar with iron hammers. He bore this with much reſignation, and exclaimed, "Pound the body of Anaxarchus, for thou doſt not pound his ſoul." Upon this, Nicocreon threatened to cut his tongue, and Anaxarchus bit it off with his teeth, and ſpit it out into the tyrant's face. Ovid. in Ib. v. 571.—Plut. in Symp. 7.—Diog. in Vitâ.—Cic. in Tuſc. 2, c. 22.——A Theban general. Thucyd. 8, c. 100.

ANAXARĔTE, a girl of Salamis, who ſo arrogantly deſpiſed the addreſſes of Iphis, a youth of ignoble birth, that the lover hung himſelf at her door. She ſaw this ſad ſpectacle without emotion or pity, and was changed into a ſtone. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 748.

ANAXĒNOR, a muſician, whom M. Antony greatly honored, and preſented with the tribute of four cities. Strab. 14.

ANAXIAS, a Theban general. Pauſ. 2, c. 22.

ANAXIBIA, a ſiſter of Agamemnon. Pauſ. 2, c. 29.—A daughter of Bias, brother to the phyſician Melampus. She married Pelias, king of Iolchos, by whom ſhe had Acaſtus, and four daughters, Piſidice, Pelopea, Hippothoe, and Alceſte. Apollod. 1, c. 9. She is called daughter of Dymas, by Hygin. fab. 14.

ANAXICRĂTES, an Athenian archon. Pauſ. 10, c. 23.

ANAXIDĂMUS, ſucceeded his father Zeuxidamus on the throne of Sparta Pauſ. 3, c. 7, l. 4, c. 15.

ANAXĬLAS & ANAXĬLĀUS, a Meſſenian, tyrant of Rhegium. He took Zancle, and was ſo mild and popular during his reign, that when he died, 476 B. C. he left his infant ſons to the care of one of his ſervants, and the citizens choſe rather to obey a ſlave than revolt from their benevolent ſovereign's children. Juſtin. 3, c. 2.—Pauſ. 4, c. 23. l. 5, c. 26.—Thucyd. 6, c. 5.—Herodot. 6, c. 23, l. 7, c. 167.——A magician of Lariſſa, baniſhed from Italy by Auguſtus.——A Pythagorean philoſopher.——A phyſician.——An hiſtorian, who began his hiſtory with bitter invectives againſt former writers. Dionyſ. Hal.——A Lacedæmonian. Plut. in Alcib.——A comic writer, about the 100 olympiad.

ANAXILĪDES, wrote ſome treatiſes concerning philoſophers, and mentioned that Plato's Plato's mother became pregnant by a phantom of the god Apollo, from which circumſtance her ſon was called the prince of wiſdom. Diog. in Plut.

ANAXIMANDER, a Mileſian philoſopher, the companion and diſciple of Thales. He was the firſt who conſtructed ſpheres, aſſerted that the earth was of a cylindrical form, and taught that men were born of earth and water mixed together, and heated by the beams of the ſun; that the earth moved, and that the moon received light from the ſun, which he conſidered as a circle of fire like a wheel about 28 times bigger than the earth. He made the firſt geographical maps and ſun-dials. He died in the 64th year of his age, B. C. 547. Cic. acad. Quæſt. 4, c. 37.—Diog. in vit.—Plin. 2, c. 79.—Plut. Ph. He had a ſon who bore his name. Strab. 1.

ANAXIMĔNES, a philoſopher, ſon of Eraſiſtratus. He was the diſciple of Anaximander, and ſucceeded him in his ſchool. He ſaid that the air was the cauſe of every created being, and a ſelf-exiſtent divinity, and that the ſun, the moon, and the ſtars, had been made from the earth. He conſidered the earth as a plain, and the heavens as a ſolid concave ſphere, on which the ſtars were fixed like nails, an opinion prevalent at that time, and from which originated the proverb, τι ει ουρανος εμπεσοι, if the heavens ſhould fall? to which Horace has alluded, 3. Od. 3, v. 7. He died 504 years B. C. Cic. acad. Quæſt. 4, c. 37, de Nat. D. 1, c. 10.—Plut. Ph.—Plin. 2, c. 76. ——A native of Lampſacus, ſon of Ariſtocles. He was pupil to Diogenes the Cynic, and preceptor to Alexander the Great, of whoſe life, and that of Philip, he wrote the hiſtory. When Alexander, in a fit of anger, threatened to put to death all the inhabitants of Lampſacus, becauſe they had maintained a long ſiege againſt him, Anaximenes was ſent by his countrymen to appeaſe the king, who, as ſoon as he ſaw him, ſwore he would not grant the favor he was going to aſk. Upon this, Anaximenes begged the king to deſtroy the city, and enſlave the inhabitants, and by this artful requeſt the city of Lampſacus was ſaved from deſtruction. Beſides the life of Philip and his ſon, he wrote an hiſtory of Greece in 12 books, all now loſt. His nephew bore the ſame name, and wrote an account of ancient paintings. Pauſ. 6, c. 18. —Val. Max. 7, c. 3.

ANAXIPŎLIS, a comic poet of Thaſos. Plin. 14, c. 14.——A writer on agriculture, likewiſe of Thaſos.

ANAXIPPUS, a comic writer, in the age of Demetrius. He uſed to ſay, that philoſophers were wiſe only in their ſpeeches, but fools in their actions. Athen.

ANAXIRHOE, a daughter of Coronus, who married Epeus. Pauſ. 5, c. 1.

ANAXIS, a Bœotian hiſtorian, who wrote an hiſtory down to the age of Philip ſon of Amyntas. Diod. 25.

ANAXO, a virgin of Trœzene carried away by Theſeus. Plut. in Theſ.

ANCÆUS, the ſon of Lycurgus and Antinoe, was in the expedition of the Argonauts. He was at the chace of the Calydonian boar, in which he periſhed. Hygin. fab. 173 & 248.—Ovid. Met. 8.——The ſon of Neptune and Aſtypalæa. He went with the Argonauts, and ſucceeded Tiphis as pilot of the ſhip Argo. He reigned in Ionia, where he married Samia, daughter of the Mæander, by whom he had four ſons, Perilas, Enudus, Samus, Alitherſus, and one daughter called Parthenope. Orpheus Argon. He was once told by one of his ſervants, whom he preſſed with hard labor in his vineyard, that he never would taſte of the produce of his vines. He had already the cup in his hand, and called the prophet to convince him of his falſehood; when the ſervant, yet firm in his prediction, uttered this well known proverb, Πολλα μεταξυ πελει κυλικος και χειλεος ακρου.

Multa cadunt inter calicem ſupremaque labra.

And that very moment Ancæus was told that a wild boar had entered his vineyard; upon which, he threw down the cup, and ran to drive away the wild beaſt. He was killed in the attempt.

ANCALĪTES, a people of Britain near the Trinobantes. Cæſ. bell. G. 5, c. 21.

ANCARIUS, a god of the Jews. Vid. Anchialus.

ANCHARIA, a family of Rome.——The name of Octavia's mother. Plut. in Anton.

ANCHARIUS, a noble Roman killed by the partizans of Marius during his civil wars with Sylla. Plut. in Mario.

ANCHEMŎLUS, ſon of Rhœtus, king of the Marrubii in Italy, raviſhed his mother-in-law, Caſperia, for which he was expelled by his father. He fled to Turnus, and was killed by Pallas, ſon of Evander, in the wars of Æneas againſt the Latins. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 389.

ANCHION. Vid. Chion.

ANCHĪSE, a city of Italy. Dionyſ. Hal.

ANCHĪSES, a ſon of Capys by Themis, daughter of Ilus. He was of ſuch a beautiful complexion, that Venus came down from heaven on mount Ida to enjoy his company. The goddeſs became pregnant, and forbade Anchiſes ever to mention the favors he had received, on pain of being ſtruck with thunder. The child which Venus brought forth, was called Æneas; he was educated as ſoon as born by the nymphs of Ida, and, when of a proper age, was entruſted to the care of Chiron the centaur. When Troy was taken, Anchiſes was become ſo infirm that Æneas, to whom the Greeks permitted to take away whatever he eſteemed moſt, carried him through the flames upon his ſhoulders, and thus ſaved his life. He accompanied his ſon in his voyage towards Italy, and died in Sicily in the 80th year of his age. He was buried on mount Eryx, by Æneas and Aceſtes, king of the country, and the anniverſary of his death was afterwards celebrated by his ſon and the Trojans on his tomb. Some authors have maintained, that Anchiſes had forgot the injunctions of Venus, and boaſted at a feaſt, that he enjoyed her favors on mount Ida, upon which he was killed with thunder. Others ſay, that the wounds he received from the thunder were not mortal, and that they only weakened and diſfigured his body. Virgil, in the 6th book of the Æneid, introduces him in the Elyſian fields, relating to his ſon the fates that were to attend him, and the fortune of his deſcendants, the Romans. [Vid. Æneas.] Virg. Æn. 1, 2, &c.—Hygin. fab. 94, 254, 260, 270.—Heſiod. Theog. v. 1010.—Apollod. 3.—Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 34.—Homer. Il. 20. & Hymn. in Vener.—*Xenoph. ANCHĪSIA, a mountain of Arcadia, at the bottom of which is a monument of Anchiſes. Pauſ. 8, c. 12 & 13.

ANCHĪSIĂDES, a patronymic of Æneas, as being ſon of Anchiſes. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 348, &c.

ANCHOE, a place near the mouth of the Cephiſus, where there is a lake of the ſame name. Strab.

ANCHŎRA, a fortified place in Galatia.

ANCHŪRUS, a ſon of Midas, king of Phrygia, who ſacrificed himſelf for the good of his country, when the earth had opened and ſwallowed up many buildings. The oracle had been conſulted, and gave for anſwer, that the gulph would never cloſe, if Midas did not throw into it whatever he had moſt precious. Though the king had parted with many things of immenſe value, yet the gulf continued open, till Anchurus, thinking himſelf the moſt precious of his father's poſſeſſions, took a tender leave of his wife and family, and leaped into the earth, which cloſed immediately over his head. Midas erected there an altar of ſtones to Jupiter, and that altar was the firſt object which he turned into gold, when he had received his fatal gift from the gods. This unpoliſhed lump of gold exiſted ſtill in the age of Plutarch. Plut. in Parall.

ANCĪLE & ANCŸLE, a ſacred ſhield, which, according to the Roman authors, fell from heaven in the reign of Numa, when the Roman people labored under a peſtilence. Upon the preſervation of this ſhield depended the fate of the Roman empire, and therefore Numa ordered 11 of the ſame ſize and form to be made, that if ever any attempt was made to carry them away, the plunderer might find it difficult to diſtinguiſh the true one. They were made with ſuch exactneſs, that the king promiſed Veterius Mamurius, the artiſt, whatever reward he deſired. [Vid. Mamurius.] They were kept in the temple of Veſta, and an order of prieſts was choſen to watch over their ſafety. Theſe prieſts were called Salii, and were twelve in number; they carried every year, on the firſt of March, the ſhields in a ſolemn proceſſion round the walls of Rome, dancing and ſinging praiſes to the god Mars. This ſacred feſtival continued three days, during which every important buſineſs was ſtopped. It was deemed unfortunate to be married on thoſe days, or to undertake any expedition, and Tacitus in 1 Hiſt. has attributed the unſucceſsful campaign of the emperor Otho againſt Vitellius, to his leaving Rome during the celebration of the Ancyliorium feſtum. Theſe two verſes of Ovid explain the origin of the word Ancyle, which is applied to theſe ſhields:

Idque ancyle vocat, quod ab omni parte reciſum eſt,
Quemque notes oculis, angulus omnis abeſt.

ANCON & ANCŌNA, a town of Picenum, built by the Sicilians, with a harbour in the form of a creſcent, on the ſhores of the Adriatic. Near this place is the famous chapel of Loretto, ſuppoſed by monkiſh hiſtorians to have been brought through the air by angels, Auguſt 10, A. D. 1291, from Judæa, where it was a cottage, inhabited by the virgin Mary. The reputed ſanctity of the place has often brought 100,000 pilgrims in one day to Loretto. Plin. 3, c. 13.—Lucan. 2, v. 402.—Ital. 8, v. 437.

ANCUS MARTIUS, the 4th king of Rome, was grandſon to Numa, by his daughter. He waged a ſucceſsful war againſt the Latins, Veientes, Fidenates, Volſci, and Sabines, and joined mount Janiculum to the city by a bridge, and incloſed mount Martius and the Aventine within the walls of the city. He extended the confines of the Roman territories to the ſea, where he built the town of Oſtia, at the mouth of the Tiber. He inherited the valor of Romulus with the moderation of Numa. He died B. C. 616, after a reign of 24 years, and was ſucceeded by Tarquin the elder. Dionyſ. Hal. 3, c. 9.—Liv. 1, c. 32, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 815.

ANDRICLUS, a mountain of Cilicia. Strab. 14.——A river of Troas, falling into the Scamander. Plin. 5, c. 27.

ANDRISCUS, a man who wrote an hiſtory of Naxos. Athen. 1.——A worthleſs perſon called Pſeudophilippus, on account of the likeneſs of his features to king Philip. He incited the Macedonians to revolt againſt Rome, and was conquered and led in triumph by Metellus, 152 B. C. Flor. 2, c. 14.

ANDROBIUS, a famous painter. Plin. 35, c. 11.

ANDROCLĒA, a daughter of Antipoenus of Thebes. She, with her ſiſter Alcida, ſacrificed herſelf in the ſervice of her country, when the oracle had promiſed the victory to her countrymen, who were engaged in a war againſt Orchomenos, if any one of noble birth devoted himſelf for the glory of his nation. Antipoenus refuſed to do it, and his daughters chearfully accepted it, and received great honors after death. Hercules, who fought on the ſide of Thebes, dedicated to them the image of a lion in the temple of Diana. Pauſ. 9, c. 17.

ANDRŌCLES, a ſon of Phintas who reigned in Meſſenia. Pauſ. 4, c. 5, &c.——A man who wrote an hiſtory of Cyprus.

ANDRŎGEOS, a Greek, killed by Æneas and his friends, whom he took to be his countrymen. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 371.

ANDRŎGEUS, ſon of Minos & Paſiphae, was famous for his ſkill in wreſtling. He overcame every antagoniſt at Athens, and became ſuch a favorite of the people, that Ægeus king of the country grew jealous of his popularity, and cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated as he was going to Thebes. Some ſay that he was killed by the wild bull of Marathon. Minos declared war againſt Athens to revenge the death of his ſon, and peace was at laſt re-eſtabliſhed on condition that Ægeus ſent yearly ſeven boys and ſeven girls from Athens to Crete to be devoured by the minotaur. [Vid. Minotaurus.] The Athenians eſtabliſhed feſtivals by order of Minos, in honor of his ſon, and called them Androgeia. Hygin. fab. 41.—Diod. 4.—*Virg. ANDROGŸNÆ, a nation of Africa, beyond the Naſamones. Every one of them bore the characteriſtics of the male and female ſex; and one of their breaſts was that of a man, and the other that of a woman. Plin. 7, c. 2.

ANDRŎMĂCHE, a daughter of Eetion, king of Thebes in Cilicia, married Hector ſon of Priam king of Troy, by whom ſhe had Aſtyanax. She was ſo fond of her huſband that ſhe even fed his horſes with her own hand. During the Trojan war ſhe remained at home employed in her domeſtic concerns. Her parting with Hector, who was going to a battle, in which he periſhed, has always been deemed the beſt, moſt tender and pathetic of all the paſſages in Homer's Iliad. She received the news of her huſband's death with extreme ſorrow; and after the taking of Troy, ſhe had the misfortune to ſee her only ſon Aſtyanax, after ſhe had ſaved him from the flames, thrown headlong from the walls of the city, by the hands of the man whoſe father had killed her huſband. (Senec. in Troad.) Andromache, in the diviſion of the priſoners by the Greeks, fell to the ſhare of Neoptolemus, who treated her as his wife, and carried her to Epirus. He had by her three ſons, Moloſſus, Piclus, & Pergamus, and afterwards repudiated her. After this divorce ſhe married Helenus ſon of Priam, who, as herſelf, was a captive of Pyrrhus. She reigned with him over part of the country, and became mother by him of Ceſtrinus. Some ſay that Aſtyanax was killed by Ulyſſes, and Euripides ſays that Menelaus put him to death. *Homer. ANDROMACHIDÆ, a nation who preſented to their king all the virgins who were of nubile years, and permitted him to uſe them as he pleaſed.

ANDROMĂCHUS, an opulent perſon of Sicily, father to the hiſtorian Timæus. Diod. 16. He aſſiſted Timoleon in recovering the liberty of the Syracuſans.—A general of Alexander, to whom Parmenio gave the government of Syria. He was burnt alive by the Samaritans. Curt. 4, c. 5 & 8.——An officer of Seleucus the younger. Polyæn. 4.——A poet of Byzantium.——A phyſician of Crete in the age of Nero.——A ſophiſt of Naples, in the age of Diocleſian.

ANDROMĂDAS or ANDRODAMUS, a native of Rhegium, who made laws for the Thracians concerning the puniſhment of homicide, &c. Ariſtot.

ANDRŎMĔDA, a daughter of Cepheus king of Æthiopia, by Caſſiope. She was promiſed in marriage to Phineus, her uncle, when Neptune drowned the kingdom, and ſent a ſea monſter to ravage the country, becauſe Caſſiope had boaſted herſelf fairer than Juno and the Nereides. The oracle of Jupiter Ammon was conſulted, and nothing could ſtop the reſentment of Neptune, if Andromeda was not expoſed to the ſea monſter. She was accordingly tied naked on a rock, and at the moment that the monſter was going to devour her, Perſeus, who returned through the air from the conqueſt of the Gorgons, ſaw her, and was captivated with her beauty. He promiſed to deliver her and deſtroy the monſter, if he received her in marriage as a reward for his trouble. Cepheus conſented, and Perſeus changed the ſea monſter into a rock, by ſhewing him Meduſa's head, and untied Andromeda and married her. He had by her many children, among whom were Sthenelus, Ancæus, and Electryon. The marriage of Andromeda with Perſeus was oppoſed by Phineus, who after a bloody battle was changed into a ſtone by Perſeus. Some ſay that Minerva made Andromeda a conſtellation in heaven after her death. Vid. Meduſa, Perſeus. Hygin. fab. 64.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 43.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Manil. 5, v. 533.—Propert. 3, el. 21.——

According

According to Pliny, l. 5, c. 31, it was at Joppa in Judæa that Andromeda was tied on a rock. He mentions that the ſkeleton of the huge ſea monſter, to whom ſhe had been expoſed, was brought to Rome by Scaurus, and carefully preſerved. The fable of Andromeda and the ſea monſter has been explained, by ſuppoſing that ſhe was courted by the captain of a ſhip, who attempted to carry her away, but was prevented by the interpoſition of another more faithful lover.

ANNA, a goddeſs, in whoſe honor the Romans inſtituted feſtivals. She was, according to ſome, Anna the daughter of Belus and ſiſter of Dido, who, after her ſiſter's death, fled from Carthage, which Jarbas had beſieged, and came to Italy, where Æneas met her, as he walked on the banks of the Tiber, and gave her an honorable reception, for the kindneſſes ſhe had ſhewn him when he was at Carthage. Lavinia, the wife of Æneas, was jealous of the tender treatment which was ſhewn to Anna, and meditated her ruin. Anna was apprized of this by her ſiſter in a dream, and ſhe fled to the river Numicus, of which ſhe became a deity, and ordered the inhabitants of the country to call her Anna Perenna, becauſe ſhe would remain for ever under the waters. Her feſtivals were performed with many rejoicings, and the females often, in the midſt of their chearfulneſs, forgot their natural decency. They were introduced into Rome, and celebrated the 15th of March. The Romans generally ſacrificed to her, to obtain a long and happy life: and hence the words Annare & Perennare. Some have ſuppoſed Anna to be the moon, quia menſibus impleat annum; others call her Themis, or Io, the daughter of Inachus, and ſometimes Maia. Another more received opinion maintains, that Anna was an old induſtrious woman of Bovillæ, who, when the Roman populace had fled from the city to mount Sacer, brought them cakes every day; for which kind treatment the Romans, when peace was re-eſtabliſhed, decreed immortal honors to her whom they called Perenna, ab perennitate cultûs, and who, as they ſuppoſe, was become one of their deities. Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 653, &c.—Sil. 8, v. 79.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 9, 20, 421, & 500.

ANNA COMMENA, a princeſs of Conſtantinople, known to the world for the Greek hiſtory, which ſhe wrote, of her father Alexius emperor of the eaſt. The character of this hiſtory is not very high either for authenticity or beauty of compoſition: the hiſtorian is loſt in the daughter; and inſtead of ſimplicity of ſtyle and narrative, as Gibbon ſays, an elaborate affectation of rhetoric and ſcience betrays in every page the vanity of a female author. The beſt edition of Anna Commena, is that of Paris, folio, 1651.

ANNĀLES, a chronological hiſtory which gives an account of all the important events of every year in a ſtate, without entering into the cauſes which produced them. The annals of Tacitus may be conſidered in this light. In the firſt ages of Rome, the writing of the annals was one of the duties and privileges of the high-prieſt; whence they have been called Annales Maximi, from the prieſt Pontifex Maximus, who conſecrated them, and gave them as truly genuine and authentic.

ANNĀLIS LEX ſettled the age at which, among the Romans, a citizen could be admitted to exerciſe the offices of the ſtate. This law originated in Athens, and was introduced in Rome. No man could be a knight before 18 years of age, nor be inveſted with the conſular power before he had arrived to his 25th year.

ANNIĀNUS, a poet in the age of Trajan.

ANNĬBAL, a celebrated Carthaginian general, ſon of Amilcar. He was educated in his father's camp, and inured from his early years to the labors of the field. He paſſed into Spain when nine years old, and at the requeſt of his father, took a ſolemn oath he never would be at peace with the Romans. After his father's death, he was appointed over the cavalry in Spain; and ſome time after, upon the death of Aſdrubal, he was inveſted with the command of all the armies of Carthage, though not yet in the 25th year of his age. In three years of continual ſucceſs, he ſubdued all the nations of Spain which oppoſed the Carthaginian power, and took Saguntum after a ſiege of eight months. This city was in alliance with the Romans, and its fall was the cauſe of the ſecond Punic war, which Annibal prepared to ſupport ſupport with all the courage and prudence of a conſummate general. He levied three large armies, one of which he ſent to Africa, he left another in Spain, and marched at the head of the third towards Italy. This army ſome have calculated at 20,000 foot and 6,000 horſe; others ſay that it conſiſted of 100,000 foot and 20,000 horſe. Liv. 21, c. 38. He came to the Alps, which were deemed almoſt inacceſſible, and had never been paſſed over before him but by Hercules, and after much trouble gained the top in nine days. He conquered the uncivilized inhabitants that oppoſed his paſſage, and after the amazing loſs of 30,000 men, made his way ſo eaſy, by ſoftening the rocks with fire and vinegar, that even his armed elephants deſcended the mountains without danger or difficulty, where a man, diſincumbered of his arms, could not walk before in ſafety. He was oppoſed by the Romans as ſoon as he entered Italy; and after he had defeated P. Corn. Scipio and Sempronius, near the Rhone, the Po, and the Trebia, he croſſed the Apennines, and invaded Etruria. He defeated the army of the conſul Flaminius near the lake Traſimenus, and ſoon after met the two conſuls C. Terentius and L. Æmilius at Cannæ. His army conſiſted of 40,000 foot and 10,000 horſe, when he engaged the Romans at the celebrated battle of Cannæ. The ſlaughter was ſo great that no leſs than 40,000 Romans were killed, and the conqueror made a bridge with the dead carcaſes; and as a ſign of his victory, he ſent to Carthage three buſhels of gold rings which had been taken from 5630 Roman knights ſlain in the battle. Had Annibal, immediately after the battle, marched his army to the gates of Rome, it muſt have yielded amidſt the general conſternation, if we believe the opinions of ſome writers; but his delay gave the enemy ſpirit and boldneſs, and when at laſt he approached the walls, he was informed that the piece of ground on which his army then ſtood, was ſelling at a high price in the Roman forum. After hovering for ſome time round the city, he retired to Capua, where the Carthaginian ſoldiers ſoon forgot to conquer in the pleaſures and riot of this luxurious city. From that circumſtance it has been ſaid, and with propriety, that Capua was a Cannæ to Annibal. After the battle of Cannæ the Romans became more cautious, and when the dictator Fabius Maximus had defied the artifice as well as the valor of Annibal, they began to look for better times. Marcellus who ſucceeded Fabius in the field, firſt taught the Romans that Annibal was not invincible. After many important debates in the ſenate, it was decreed, that war ſhould be carried into Africa, to remove Annibal from the gates of Rome, and Scipio, who was the firſt propoſer of the plan, was empowered to put it into execution. When Carthage ſaw the enemy on her coaſts, ſhe recalled Annibal from Italy; and that great general is ſaid to have left, with tears in his eyes, a country, which during ſixteen years he had kept under continual alarms, and which he could almoſt call his own. He and Scipio met near Carthage, and after a parley, in which neither would give the preference to his enemy, they determined to come to a general engagement. The battle was fought near Zama: Scipio made a great ſlaughter of the enemy, 20,000 were killed, and the ſame number made priſoners. Annibal, after he had loſt the day, fled to Adrumetum. Soon after this deciſive battle, the Romans granted peace to Carthage, on hard conditions; and afterwards Annibal, who was jealous and apprehenſive of the Roman power, fled to Syria, to king Antiochus, whom he adviſed to make war againſt Rome, and lead an army into the heart of Italy. Antiochus diſtruſted the fidelity of Annibal, and was conquered by the Romans, who granted him peace on the condition of his delivering their immortal enemy into their hands. Annibal, who was apprized of this, left the court of Antiochus, and fled to Pruſias, king of Bithynia. He encouraged him to declare war againſt Rome, and even aſſiſted him in weakening the power of Eumenes, king of Pergamus, who was in alliance with the Romans. The ſenate received intelligence that Annibal was in Bithynia, and immediately ſent ambaſſadors, amongſt whom was L. Q. Flaminius, to demand him of Pruſias. The king was unwilling to betray Annibal, and violate the laws of hoſpitality, but at the ſame time he dreaded the power of Rome. Annibal extricated him from his embarraſſment, and when he heard that his houſe was beſieged on every ſide, and all means of eſcape fruitleſs, he took a doſe of poiſon, which he always carried with him in a ring on his finger, and as he breathed his laſt, he exclaimed, Solvamus diuturnâ curâ populum Romanum, quando mortem ſenis expectare longum cenſet. He died in his 70th year, according to ſome, about 182 years B. C. That year was famous for the death of the three greateſt generals of the age, Annnibal, Scipio, and Philopœmen. The death of ſo formidable a rival was the cauſe of great rejoicings in Rome; he had always been a profeſſed enemy to the Roman name, and ever endeavoured to deſtroy its power. If he ſhone in the field, he alſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſtudies. He was taught Greek

Greek by Sofilus a Lacedæmonian, and he even wrote ſome books in that language on different ſubjects. It is remarkable, that the life of Annibal, whom the Romans wiſhed ſo many times to deſtroy by perfidy, was never attempted by any of his ſoldiers or countrymen. He made himſelf as conſpicuous in the government of the ſtate, as at the head of armies; and though his enemies reproached him with the rudeneſs of laughing in the Carthaginian ſenate, while every ſenator was bathed in tears for the misfortunes of the country, Annibal defended himſelf by ſaying, that he, who had been bred all his life in a camp, ought to be diſpenſed with all the more poliſhed feelings of a capital. He was ſo apprehenſive for his ſafety, that when he was in Bithynia, his houſe was fortified like a caſtle, and on every ſide there were ſecret doors which could give immediate eſcape if his life was ever attempted. When he quitted Italy, and embarked on board a veſſel for Africa, he ſo ſtrongly ſuſpected the fidelity of his pilot, who told him that the lofty mountain which appeared at a diſtance was a promontory of Sicily, that he killed him on the ſpot; and when he was convinced of his fatal error, he gave a magnificent burial to the man whom he had ſo falſely murdered, and called the promontory by his name. The labors which he ſuſtained, and the inclemency of the weather to which he expoſed himſelf in croſſing the Alps, ſo weakened one of his eyes, that he ever after loſt the uſe of it. The Romans have celebrated the humanity of Annibal, who, after the battle of Cannæ, ſought the body of the fallen conſul amidſt the heaps of ſlain, and honored it with a funeral becoming the dignity of Rome. He performed the ſame friendly offices to the remains of Marcellus and Tib. Gracchus, who had fallen in battle. He often blamed the unſettled meaſures of his country; and when the enemy had thrown into his camp the head of his brother Aſdrubal, who had been conquered as he came from Spain with a reinforcement into Italy, Annibal ſaid that the Carthaginian arms would no longer meet with their uſual ſucceſs. Juvenal, in ſpeaking of Annibal, obſerves, that the ring which cauſed his death made a due atonement to the Romans for the many thouſand rings which had been ſent to Carthage from the battle of Cannæ. Annibal, when in Spain, married a woman of Caſtulo. The Romans entertained ſuch a high opinion of him as a commander, that Scipio who conquered him, calls him the greateſt general that ever lived, and gives the ſecond rank to Pyrrhus the Epirot, and places himſelf the next to theſe in merit and abilities. It is plain that the failure of Annibal's expedition in Italy, did not ariſe from his neglect, but from that of his countrymen, who gave him no aſſiſtance; far from imitating their enemies of Rome, who even raiſed in one year 18 legions to oppoſe the formidable Carthaginian. Livy has painted the character of Annibal like an enemy, and it is much to be lamented that a great hiſtorian has withheld the tribute due to the merits and virtues of the greateſt of generals. C. Nep. in vitâ.—Liv. 21, 22, &c.—Plut. in Flamin. &c.—Juſtin. 32, c. 4.—Sil. Ital. 1, &c. —Appian.—Florus 2 & 3.—Polyb.—Diod. —Juv. 10, v. 159, &c.—Val. Hiſt. Græc.——A ſon of Giſcon, and grandſon of Amilcar, ſent by the Carthaginians to the aſſiſtance of Ægiſta, a town of Sicily. He was overpowered by Hermocrates, an exiled Syracuſan. Juſtin. 22 & 23.——A Carthaginian, ſirnamed Senior. He was conquered by the conſul, C. Sulpit. Paterculus, in Sardinia, and hung on a croſs by his countrymen for his ill ſucceſs.

Annicĕris, an excellent charioteer of Cyrene, who exhibited his ſkill in driving a chariot before Plato and the academy. When the philoſopher was wantonly ſold by Dionyſius, Anniceris ranſomed his friend, and he ſhewed further his reſpect for learning, by eſtabliſhing a ſect at Cyrene, called after his name, which ſupported that all good conſiſted in pleaſure. Cic. de off. 3. Diog. in Plat. & Ariſt. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 27.

Annius Scapula, a Roman of great dignity, put to death for conſpiring againſt Caſſius. Hirt. Alex. 55.

Annon & Hanno, a Carthaginian general conquered in Spain by Scipio, and ſent to Rome. He was ſon of Bomilcar, whom Annibal ſent privately over to the Rhone to conquer the Gauls. Liv. 21, c. 27.—— A Carthaginian who taught birds to ſing "Annon is a god," after which he reſtored them to their native liberty; but the birds loſt with their ſlavery what they had been taught. Ælian. V. H. ult. lib. c. 30.——A Carthaginian who wrote, in the Punic language, the account of a voyage he had made round Africa. This book was tranſlated into Greek, and is ſtill extant.——Another baniſhed from Carthage for taming a lion for his own amuſement, which was interpreted as if he wiſhed to aſpire aſpire to ſovereign power. Plin. 8, c. 16.—This name has been common to many Carthaginians who have ſignalized themſelves among their countrymen during the Punic wars againſt Rome, and in their wars againſt the Sicilians. Liv. 26, 27, &c.

ANOPÆA, a mountain and road near the river Aſopus. Herodot. 7, c. 216.

ANSER, a Roman poet, whom Ovid, Triſt. 3, el. 1, v. 425, calls bold and impertinent.

ANSIBARII, a people of Germany. Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 55.

ANTÆA, the wife of Proteus. Homer. Il.——A goddeſs worſhipped by the inhabitants of Antium.

ANTÆAS, a king of Scythia, who ſaid that the neighing of a horſe was far preferable to the muſic of Iſmenias, a famous muſician who had been taken captive. Plut.

ANTÆUS, a giant of Libya, ſon of Terra and Neptune. He was ſo ſtrong in wreſtling, that he boaſted that he would erect a temple to his father with the ſkulls of his conquered antagoniſts. Hercules attacked him, and as he received new ſtrength from his mother as often as he touched the ground, the hero lifted him up in the air, and ſqueezed him to death in his arms. Lucan. 4, v. 598.—Stat. 6. Theb. v. 893.—Juv. 3, v. 88.——A ſervant of Atticus. Cic. ad Attic. 13, ep. 44.——A friend of Turnus, killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 561.

ANTAGŎRAS, a man of Cos. Pauſ. 3, c. 5.——A Rhodian poet, much admired by Antigonus, Id. 1, c. 2. One day as he was cooking ſome fiſh, the king aſked him whether Homer ever dreſſed any meals when he was recording the actions of Agamemnon? And do you think, replied the poet, that he ὡ λαοι τ' επιτετραφαται και τοσσα μιμηλε, ever enquired whether any individual dreſſed fiſh in his army? Plut. Symp. & Apoph.

ANTALCĬDAS of Sparta, ſon of Leon, was ſent into Perſia, where he made a peace with Artaxerxes very diſadvantageous to his country, by which, B. C. 387, the Greek cities of Aſia became tributary to the Perſian monarch. Pauſ. 9, c. 1, &c.—Diod. 14. Plut. in Artax.

ANTANDER, a general of Meſſenia, againſt the Spartans. Pauſ. 4, c. 7.——A brother of Agathocles, tyrant of Sicily. Juſtin. 22, c. 7.

ANTANDROS, a city of Troas, inhabited by the Leleges, near which Æneas built his fleet after the deſtruction of Troy. It has been called Edonis, Cimmeris, Aſſos, and Apollonia. There is a hill in its neighbourhood called Alexandreia, where Paris ſat, as ſome ſuppoſe, when the three rival goddeſſes appeared before him when contending for the prize of beauty. Strab. 13.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 6.—Mela. 1, c. 18.

ANTERBROGIUS, an ambaſſador to Cæſar from the Rhemi, a nation of Gaul. Cæſ. bel. Gall. 2, c. 3.

ANTEIUS PUBLIUS was appointed over Syria by Nero. He was accuſed of ſedition and conſpiracy, and drank poiſon, which operating ſlowly, obliged him to open his veins. Tacit. An. 13, &c.

ANTEMNÆ, a city of the Sabines between Rome and the Anio. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 631.—Dionyſ. Hal.

ANTĒNOR, a Trojan prince related to Priam. It is ſaid that during the Trojan war, he always kept a ſecret correſpondence with the Greeks, and chiefly with Menelaus and Ulyſſes. In the council of Priam, Homer introduces him as adviſing the Trojans to reſtore Helen, and conclude the war. He adviſed Ulyſſes to carry away the Trojan palladium, and encouraged the Greeks to make the wooden horſe, which, at his perſuaſion, was brought into the city of Troy by a breach made in the walls. Æneas has been accuſed of being a partner of his guilt; and the night that Troy was taken, they had a number of Greeks ſtationed at the doors of their houſes to protect them from harm. After the deſtruction of his country, Antenor migrated to Italy near the Adriatic, where he built the town of Padua. His children were alſo concerned in the Trojan war, and diſplayed much valor againſt the Greeks. Their names were Polybius, Acamas, Agenor, and according to others, Polydamas & Helicaon. Liv. 1. c. 1.—Plin. 3, c. 13.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 242.—Tacit. 16, c. 21.—Homer. Il. 3, 7, 8, 11.—*Ovid. ANTENORĬDES, a patronymic given to the three ſons of Antenor, all killed during the Trojan war. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 484.

ANTĔROS, (αντι ερως, againſt love) a ſon of Mars and Venus. He was not, as the derivation of his name implies, a deity that preſided over an oppoſition to love, but he was the god of mutual love and of mutual tenderneſs. Venus had complained to Themis, that her ſon Cupid always continued a child, and was told, that if he had another brother, he would grow up in a ſhort ſpace of time. As ſoon as Anteros was born, Cupid felt his ſtrength increaſe, and his wings enlarge; but if ever his brother was at a diſtance from him, he found himſelf reduced to his ancient ſhape. From this circumſtance it is ſeen, that return of paſſion gives vigor to love. Anteros had a temple at Athens raiſed to his honor, when Meles had experienced the coldneſs and diſdain of Timagoras, whom he paſſionately eſteemed, and for whom he had killed himſelf. [Vid. Meles.] Cupid and Anteros are often repreſented ſtriving to ſeize a palm-tree from one another, to teach us that true love always endeavours to overcome by kindneſs and gratitude. They were always painted in the Greek academies, to inform the ſcholars that it is their immediate duty to be grateful to their teachers, and to reward their trouble with love and reverence. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 23.—Pauſ. 1, c. 30. l. 6, c. 23.——A grammarian of Alexandria, in the age of the emperor Claudius.——A freedman of Atticus. Cic. ad Attic. 9, ep. 14.

ANTHĒA, a town of Achaia. Pauſ. 7, c. 18.——Of Meſſenia. Id. 4, c. 31.—Of Trœzene. Id. 2, c. 30.

ANTHEAS, a ſon of Eumelus, killed in attempting to ſow corn from the chariot of Triptolemus drawn by dragons. Pauſ. 7, c. 18.

ANTHĔDON, a city of Bœotia, which receives its name from the flowery plains that ſurround it, or Anthedon, a certain nymph. Pauſ. 7, c. 10. l. 9, c. 22.—It was formerly inhabited by Thracians. Homer. Il. 2.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 905.——A port of Peloponneſus. Plin. 4, c. 5.

ANTHĒLA, a town near the Aſopus, near which Ceres and Amphictyon had a temple. Herodot. 7, c. 176.

ANTHĔMIS, an iſland in the Mediterranean, the ſame as the Ionian Samos. Strab. 10.

ANTHEMON, a Trojan. Homer. Il. 4.

ANTHĒNE, a town of Peloponneſus. Thucyd. 5, c. 41.

ANTHERMUS, a Chian ſculptor, ſon of Micciades, and grandſon to Malas. He and his brother Bupalus made a ſtatue of the poet Hipponax, which cauſed univerſal laughter, on account of the deformity of its countenance. The poet was ſo incenſed upon this, and inveighed with ſo much bitterneſs againſt the ſtatuaries, that they hung themſelves, according to the opinion of ſome authors. Plin. 36, c. 5.

ANTHES, a native of Anthedon, who firſt invented hymns. Plut. de Muſ.——A ſon of Neptune.

ANTHESPHORIA, feſtivals celebrated in Sicily, in honor of Proſerpine, who was carried away by Pluto as ſhe was gathering flowers. Claudian de Rapt. Proſ.—Feſtivals of the ſame name were alſo obſerved at Argos in honor of Juno, who was called Antheia. Pauſ. Corinth.—Pollux. Onom. 1, c. 1.

ANTHESTERIA, feſtivals in honor of Bacchus among the Greeks. They were celebrated in the month of February, called Anthesterion, whence the name is derived, and continued 3 days. The firſt day was called Πιθοιγια, απο του πιθους οιγειν, becauſe they tapped their barrels of liquor. The ſecond day was called Χοες, from the meaſure χοα, becauſe every individual drank of his own veſſel, in commemoration of the arrival of Oreſtes, who, after the murder of his mother, came, without being purified, to Demophoon, or Pandion, king of Athens, and was obliged, with all the Athenians, to drink by himſelf, for fear of polluting the people by drinking with them before he was purified of the parricide. It was uſual on that day, to ride out in chariots, and ridicule thoſe that paſſed by. The beſt drinker was rewarded with a crown of leaves, or rather of gold, and with a caſk of wine. The third day was called χυτροι, from χυτρα, a veſſel brought out full of all ſorts of ſeed and herbs, deemed ſacred to Mercury, and therefore not touched. The ſlaves had the permiſſion of being merry and free during theſe feſtivals; and at the end of the ſolemnity a herald proclaimed, Θυραζε, Καρες, ουκ ετ' Ανθεστηρια; i. e. Depart, ye Carian ſlaves, the feſtivals are at an end. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 41.

ANTHEUS, a ſon of Antenor, much eſteemed by Paris.——One of the companions of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 514.

ANTHĪA, a ſiſter of Priam, ſeized by the Greeks. She compelled the people of Pallene to burn their ſhips, and build Scione. Polyæn. 7, c. 47.——A town. Vid. Anthea.——A daughter of Theſpius, miſtreſs to Hercules. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

ANTHIAS. Vid. Antheas.

ANTHIUM, a town of Thrace, afterwards called Apollonia. Plin. 4, c. 11.——A city of Italy.

ANTHIUS, (flowery), a name of Bacchus worſhipped at Athens. He had alſo a ſtatue at Patræ.

ANTHO, a daughter of Amulius, king of Alba.

ANTHŌRES, a companion of Hercules, who followed Evander, and ſettled in Italy. He was killed in the war of Turnus againſt Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 778.

ANTHRACIA, a nymph. Pauſ. 8, c. 37.

ANTHROPINUS, Tiſarchus, and Diocles, three perſons who laid ſnares for Agathocles tyrant of Sicily. Polyæn. 5, c. 3.

ANTHROPOPHĂGI,

ANTHROPOPHĂGI, a people of Scythia that fed on human flesh. They lived near the country of the Messagetæ. Plin. 4, c. 12. l. 6, c. 30.—Mela. 2, c. 1.

ANTHYLLA, a city of Egypt on the Canopic mouth of the Nile. It maintained the queens of the country in shoes, or, according to Athenæus 1, in girdles. Herodot. 2, c. 98.

ANTIA LEX was made for the suppression of luxury at Rome. Its particulars are not known. The enactor was Antius Restio, who afterwards never supped abroad for fear of being himself a witness of the profusion and extravagance which his law meant to destroy, but without effect. Macrob. 3, c. 17.

ANTIANĪRA, the mother of Echion.

ANTIAS, the goddess of fortune, chiefly worshipped at Antium.

ANTICLĒA, a daughter of Autolycus and Amphithea. Her father, who was a famous robber, permitted Sisyphus, son of Æolus, to enjoy the favors of his daughter, and Anticlea was really pregnant of Ulysses when she married Laertes king of Ithaca. Laertes was nevertheless the reputed father of Ulysses. Ulysses is reproached by Ajax in Ovid. Met. as being the son of Sisyphus. It is said that Anticlea killed herself when she heard a false report of her son's death. Homer. Od. 11, 19.—Hygin. fab. 201, 243.—Paus. 10, c. 29.——A woman who had Periphetes by Vulcan. Apollod. 3.——A daughter of Diocles, who married Machaon the son of Æsculapius, by whom she had Nicomachus and Gorgasus. Paus. 4, c. 30.

ANTĬCLES, an athenian archon.——A man who conspired against Alexander with Hermolaus. Curt. 8, c. 6.——An Athenian victor at Olympia.

ANTICLĪDES, a Greek historian, whose works are now lost. They are often quoted by Atheneus. & Plut. in Alex.

ANTICRĂGUS, a mountain of Lycia, opposite mount Cragus. Strab. 4.

ANTICRĂTES, a Spartan, who stabbed Epaminondas, the Theban general, at the battle of Mantinea. Plut. in Ages.

ANTICȲRA, two towns of Greece, the one in Phocis, and the other near mount Oeta, both famous for the ellebore which they produced. This plant was of infinite service to cure diseases, and particularly insanity; hence the proverb Naviget Anticyram. The Anticyra of Phocis was anciently called Cyparissa. It had a temple of Neptune, who was represented holding a trident in one hand and resting the other on his side, with one of his feet on a dolphin. Some writers, especially Horace (Art. P. 300), speak of three islands of this name, but this seems to be a mistake. Paus. 10, c. 36.—Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 166. De Art. Poet. v. 300.—Persius, 4, v. 16.—Strab. 9.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Ovid. Pont. 4, ep. 3, v. 53.——A mistress of Demetrius. Plut. in Demetr.

ANTIDŎTUS, an excellent painter, pupil of Euphranor. Plin. 35, c. 11.

ANTIGĔNES, one of Alexander's generals, publicly rewarded for his valor. Curt. 5, c. 14.

ANTIGENĪDAS, a famous musician of Thebes, disciple to Philoxenus. He taught his pupil Ismenias to despise the judgment of the populace. Cic. in Brut.

ANTIGŎNA, daughter of Berenice, was wife to king Pyrrhus. Plut. in Pyrrh.

ANTIGŎNE, a daughter of Œdipus, king of Thebes, by his mother Iocasta. She buried by night her brother Polynices, against the positive orders of Creon, who, when he heard of it, ordered her to be buried alive. She however killed herself before the sentence was executed; and Hæmon, the king's son, who was passionately fond of her, and had not been able to obtain her pardon, killed himself on her grave. The death of Antigone is the subject of one of the tragedies of Sophocles. The Athenians were so pleased with it at the first representation, that they presented the author with the government of Samos. This tragedy was represented 32 times at Athens without interruption Sophocl. in Antig.—Hygin. fab. 67, 72. 243, 254.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Ovid Trist. 3, el. 3.—Philostrat. 2, c. 29.—Stat. Theb. 12.——A daughter of Eurytion king of Phthia in Thessaly. Apollod.——A daughter of Laomedon. She was the sister of Priam, and was changed into a stork for comparing herself to Juno. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 93.

ANTIGŎNIA, an inland town of Epirus. Plin. 4, c. 1.——One of Macedonia, founded by Antigonus, son of Gonatas. Id. 4, c. 10.——One in Syria on the borders of the Orontes. Strab. 16.——Another in Bithynia, called also Nicæa. Id. 12.——Another in Arcadia, anciently called Mantinea. Paus. 8, c. 8.——One of Troas in Asia Minor. Strab. 13.

ANTIGŎNUS, one of Alexander's generals, universally supposed to be the illegitimate son of Philip, Alexander's father. In the division of the provinces after the king's death, he received Pamphylia, Lycia, and Phrygia. He united with Antipater and Ptolemy, to destroy Perdiccas and Eumenes; and after the death of Perdiccas, he made continual war against Eumenes, whom, after three years of various fortune, he took prisoner, and ordered to be starved.

He afterwards declared war againſt Caſſander, whom he conquered, and had ſeveral engagements by his generals with Lyſimachus. He obliged Seleucus to retire from Syria, and fly for refuge and ſafety to Egypt. Ptolemy, who had eſtabliſhed himſelf in Egypt, promiſed to defend Seleucus, and from that time all friendſhip ceaſed between Ptolemy and Antigonus, and a new war was begun, in which Demetrius, the ſon of Antigonus, conquered the fleet of Ptolemy near the iſland of Cyprus, and took 16,000 men priſoners, and ſunk 200 ſhips. After this famous naval battle, which happened 26 years after Alexander's death, Antigonus and his ſon aſſumed the title of kings, and their example was followed by all the reſt of Alexander's generals. The power of Antigonus was now become ſo formidable, that Ptolemy, Seleucus, Caſſander, and Lyſimachus, combined together to deſtroy him; yet Antigonus deſpiſed them, ſaying, that he would diſperſe them as birds. He attempted to enter Egypt in vain, though he gained ſeveral victories over his opponents, and he at laſt received ſo many wounds in a battle that he could not ſurvive them, and died in the 80th year of his age, 301 B. C. During his life, he was maſter of all Aſia Minor, as far as Syria; but after his death, his ſon Demetrius loſt Aſia, and eſtabliſhed himſelf in Macedonia after the death of Caſſander, and ſome time after attempted to recover his former poſſeſſions, but died in captivity, in the court of his ſon-in-law, Seleucus. Antigonus was concerned in the different intrigues of the Greeks. He made a treaty of alliance with the Ætolians, and was highly reſpected by the Athenians, to whom he ſhewed himſelf very liberal and indulgent. Antigonus diſcharged ſome of his officers becauſe they ſpent their time in taverns, and he gave their commiſſions to common ſoldiers, who performed their duty with punctuality. A certain poet called him divine; but the king deſpiſed his flattery, and bade him go and enquire of his ſervants whether he was really what he ſuppoſed him. Strab. 13.—Diod. 17, &c.—Pauſ. 1, c. 6, &c.—Juſtin. 13, 14 & 15.—C. Nep. in Eumen.—Plut. in Demetr. Eumen. & Arat.——Gonatas, ſon of Demetrius, and grandſon to Antigonus, was king of Macedonia. He reſtored the Armenians to liberty, conquered the Gauls, and at laſt was expelled by Pyrrhus, who ſeized his kingdom. After the death of Pyrrhus, he recovered Macedonia, and died after a reign of 34 years, leaving his ſon Demetrius to ſucceed, B. C. 243. Juſtin. 21 & 25.—Polyb.—Plut. in Demetr.——The guardian of his nephew, Philip, the ſon of Demetrius, who married the widow of Demetrius, and uſurped the kingdom. He was called Doſon, from his promiſing much and giving nothing. He conquered Cleomenes king of Sparta, and obliged him to retire into Egypt, becauſe he favored the Ætolians againſt the Greeks. He died B. C. 221, after a reign of 11 years, leaving his crown to the lawful poſſeſſor, Philip, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his cruelties and the war he made againſt the Romans. Juſtin. 28 & 29.—Polyb. 2.—Plut. in Cleom.——A ſon of Ariſtobulus king of Judæa, who obtained an army from the king of Parthia, by promiſing him 1000 talents and 500 women. With theſe foreign troops he attacked his country, and cut the ears of Hyrcanus to make him unfit for the prieſthood. Herod, with the aid of the Romans, took him priſoner, and he was put to death by Antony. Joſeph. 14. Dion. & Plut. in Anton.——Caryſtius, an hiſtorian in the age of Philadelphus, who wrote the lives of ſome of the ancient philoſophers. Diog.—Athen.——A writer on agriculture.——A ſtatuary who wrote on his profeſſion.

ANTILCO, a tyrant of Chalcis. After his death, oligarchy prevailed in that city. Ariſtot. 5, Polit.

ANTILIBĂNUS, a mountain of Syria oppoſite mount Libanus; near which the Orontes flows. Strab.—Plin. 5, c. 20.

ANTILŎCHUS, a king of Meſſenia.—The eldeſt ſon of Neſtor by Eurydice. He went to the Trojan war with his father, and was killed by Memnon the ſon of Aurora. Homer. Od. 4. Ovid Heroid. ſays he was killed by Hector.—A poet who wrote a panegyric upon Lyſander, and received a hat filled with ſilver. Plut. in Lyſ.——An hiſtorian commended by Dionyſ. Hal.

ANTIMĂCHUS, a laſcivious perſon.—An hiſtorian.—A Greek poet of Ionia in the age of Socrates. He wrote a treatiſe on the age and genealogy of Homer, and proved him to be a native of Colophon. He repeated one of his compoſitions before a large audience, but his diction was ſo obſcure and unintelligible that all retired except Plato; upon which he ſaid, Legam nihilominus, Plato unus mihi eſt inſtar omnium. He was reckoned the next to Homer in excellence, and the emperor Adrian was ſo fond of his poetry that he preferred him to Homer. He wrote a poem upon the Theban war; and before he had brought his heroes to the city of Thebes, he had filled 24 volumes. He was ſirnamed Clarius from Claros, a mountain near Colophon, where he was born. Pauſ. 9, c. 35.—Plut. in Lyſand. & Timol.—Propert. 2, el. 34, v. 45.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.——Another poet of the ſame name, ſirnamed Pſecas, becauſe he praiſed himſelf.—A Trojan, whom Paris bribed to oppoſe the reſtoring of Helen to Menelaus and Ulyſſes, who had come as ambaſſadors to recover her. His ſons, Hippolochus and Piſander, were killed by Agamemnon. Homer. Il. 11 & 12.——A ſon of Hercules by a daughter of Theſtius. Apollod. 2 & 3.——A native of Heliopolis, who wrote a poem on the creation of the world, in 3780 verſes.

ANTIMĔNES, a ſon of Deiphon. Pauſ. 2, c. 28.

ANTINOEIA, annual ſacrifices and quinquennial games in honor of Antinous, inſtituted by the emperor Adrian at Mantinea, where Antinous was worſhipped as a divinity.

ANTINOPŎLIS, a town of Egypt, built in honor of Antinous.

ANTINOUS, a youth of Bithynia, of whom the emperor Adrian was ſo extremely fond, that at his death he erected a temple to him, and wiſhed it to be believed that he had been changed into a conſtellation. Some writers ſuppoſe that Antinous was drowned in the Nile, while others maintain that he offered himſelf at a ſacrifice as a victim, in honor of the emperor.——A native of Ithaca, ſon of Eupeithes and one of Penelope's ſuitors. He was brutal and cruel in his manners; and excited his companions to deſtroy Telemachus, whoſe advice comforted his mother Penelope. When Ulyſſes returned home, he came to the palace in a beggar's dreſs, and begged for bread, which Antinous refuſed, and even ſtruck him. After Ulyſſes had diſcovered himſelf to Telemachus and Eumæus, he attacked the ſuitors, who were ignorant who he was, and killed Antinous among the firſt. Homer. Od. 1, 16, 17 & 22.—Propert. 2, el. 5.

ANTIŎCHIA, the name of a Syrian province. Mela. 1, c. 14.——A city of Syria, once the third city of the world for beauty, greatneſs, and population. It was built by Antiochus and Seleucus Nicanor, partly on a hill, and partly in a plain. It has the river Orontes in its neighbourhood, with a celebrated grove called Daphne; whence, for the ſake of diſtinction, it has been called Antiochia near Daphne. Dionyſ. Piereg.——A city called alſo Niſibis, in Meſopotamia, built by Seleucus, ſon of Antiochus.—The capital of Piſidia, 92 miles at the eaſt of Epheſus.—A city on mount Cragus.—Another near the river Tragus, 25 leagues from Seleucia, on the weſt.—Another in Margiana, called Alexandria & Seleucia.—Another near mount Taurus, on the confines of Syria.—Another of Caria, on the river Meander.

ANTIŎCHIS, the name of the mother of Antiochus the ſon of Seleucus.—A tribe of Athens.

ANTIŎCHUS, ſirnamed Soter, was ſon of Seleucus, and king of Syria and Aſia. He made a treaty of alliance with Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt. He fell into a lingering diſeaſe, which none of his father's phyſicians could cure for ſome time, till it was diſcovered that his pulſe was more irregular than uſual when Stratonice his ſtepmother entered his room, and tha tlove for her was the cauſe of his illneſs. This was told to the father, who willingly gave Stratonice to his ſon, that his immoderate love might not cauſe his death. He died 291 B. C. after a reign of 19 years. Juſtin. 17, c. 2, &c.—Val. Max. 5.—Polyb. 4.—Appian.——The ſecond of that name, ſirnamed Theos (God) by the Mileſians, becauſe he put to death their tyrant Timarchus, was ſon and ſucceſſor of Antiochus Soter. He put an end to the war which had been begun with Ptolemy; and, to ſtrengthen the peace, he married Berenice, the daughter of the Egyptian king. This ſo offended his former wife Laodice, by whom he had two ſons, that ſhe poiſoned him, and ſuborned Artemon, whoſe features were ſimilar to his, to repreſent him as king. Artemon, ſubſervient to her will, pretended to be indiſpoſed, and, as king, called all the miniſters, and recommended to them Seleucus, ſirnamed Callinicus, ſon of Laodice, as his ſucceſſor. After this ridiculous impoſture, it was made public that the king had died a natural death, and Laodice placed her ſon on the throne, and diſpatched Berenice and her ſon, 246 years before the Chriſtian era. Appian.——The third of that name, ſirnamed the Great, brother to Seleucus Ceraunus, was king of Syria and Aſia, and reigned 36 years. He was defeated by Ptolemy Philopater at Raphia, after which he made war againſt Perſia, and took Sardes. After the death of Philopater, he endeavoured to cruſh his infant ſon Epiphanes; but his guardians ſolicited the aid of the Romans, and Antiochus was compelled to reſign his pretenſions. He conquered the greateſt part of Greece, of which ſome cities implored the aid of Rome; and Annibal, who had taken refuge at his court, encouraged him to make war againſt Italy. He was glad to find himſelf ſupported by the abilities of ſuch a general; but his meaſures were dilatory, and not agreeable to the advice of Annibal, and he was conquered and obliged to retire beyond mount Taurus, and pay a yearly fine of 2000 talents to the Romans. His revenues being unable to pay the fine, he attempted to plunder the temple of Belus in Suſiana, which ſo incenſed the inhabitants, that they killed him with his followers, 187 years before the Chriſtian era. In his character of king, Antiochus was humane and liberal, the patron of learning, and the friend of merit; and he publiſhed an edict, ordering his ſubjects never to obey except his commands were conſiſtent with the laws of the country. He had three ſons, Seleucus Philopater, Antiochus Epiphanes, and Demetrius. The firſt ſucceeded him, and the two others were kept as hoſtages by the Romans. Juſtin. 31 & 32.—Strab. 16.—Liv. 34, c. 59.—Flor. 2, c. 1.—Appian. bell. Syr.——The fourth Antiochus, ſirnamed Epiphanes, or Illuſtrious, was king of Syria, after the death of his brother Seleucus, and reigned eleven years. He deſtroyed Jeruſalem, and was ſo cruel to the Jews, that they called him Epimanes, or Furious, and not Epiphanes. He attempted to plunder Perſepolis without effect. He was of a voracious appetite, and fond of childiſh diverſions; he uſed for his pleaſure to empty bags of money in the ſtreets, to ſee the people's eagerneſs to gather it; he bathed in the public baths with the populace, and was fond of perfuming himſelf to exceſs. He invited all the Greeks he could at Antioch, and waited upon them as a ſervant, and danced with ſuch indecency among the ſtage-players, that even the moſt diſſipate and ſhameleſs bluſhed at the ſight. Polybius. Juſtin. 34, c. 3.——The fifth, ſirnamed Eupator, ſucceeded his father Epiphanes on the throne of Syria, 164 B. C. He made a peace with the Jews, and in the ſecond year of his reign was aſſaſſinated by his uncle Demetrius, who ſaid that the crown was lawfully his own, and that it had been ſeized from his father. Juſtin 34.—Joſeph. 12.——The ſixth, king of Syria, was ſirnamed Enthcus, or noble. His father Alexander Bala, entruſted him to the care of Malcus, an Arabian; and he received the crown from Tryphon, in oppoſition to his brother Demetrius, whom the people hated. Before he had been a year on the throne, Tryphon murdered him 143 B. C. and reigned in his place for three years. Joſeph. 13.——The ſeventh, called Sidetes, reigned nine years. In the beginning of his reign, he was afraid of Tryphon, and concealed himſelf, but he ſoon obtained the means of deſtroying his enemy. He made war againſt Phraates king of Parthia, and he fell in the battle which was ſoon after fought about 130 years before the Chriſtian era. Juſtin. 36, c. 1.—Appian. bell. Syr.——The eighth, ſirnamed Grypus, from his aquiline noſe, was ſon of Demetrius Nicanor by Cleopatra. His brother Seleucus was deſtroyed by Cleopatra, and he himſelf would have ſhared the ſame fate, had not he diſcovered his mother's artifice, and compelled her to drink the poiſon which was prepared for himſelf. He killed Alexander Zebina, whom Ptolemy had ſet to oppoſe him on the throne of Syria, and was at laſt aſſaſſinated, B. C. 112, after a reign of eleven years. Juſtin. 39, &c.—Joſeph, Appian.——The ninth, ſirnamed Cyzenicus, from the city of Cyzicus, where he received his education, was ſon of Antiochus Sidetes, by Cleopatra. He diſputed the kingdom with his brother Grypus, who ceded to him Cœloſyria, part of his patrimony. He was at laſt conquered by his nephew Seleucus near Antioch, and rather than to continue priſoner in his hands, he killed himſelf, B. C. 93. While a private man, he ſeemed worthy to reign; but when on the throne, he was diſſolute and tyrannical. He was fond of mechanics, and invented ſome uſeful military engines. Appian. Joſeph.——The tenth, was ironically ſirnamed Pius, becauſe he married Selena, the wife of his father and of his uncle. He was the ſon of Antiochus ninth, and he expelled Seleucus the ſon of Grypus from Syria, and was killed in a battle he fought againſt the Parthians, in the cauſe of the Galatians. Joſeph. Appian.——After his death, the kingdom of Syria was torn to pieces by the factions of the royal family or uſurpers, who, under a good or falſe title, under the name of Antiochus or his relations, eſtabliſhed themſelves for a little time either as ſovereigns of Syria, or Damaſcus, or other dependent provinces. At laſt Antiochus, ſirnamed Aſiaticus, the ſon of Antiochus the ninth, was reſtored to his paternal throne by the influence of Lucullus the Roman general, on the expulſion of Tigranes king of Armenia from the Syrian dominions; but four years after, Pompey depoſed him, and obſerved, that he who hid himſelf while an uſurper ſat upon his throne, ought not to be a king. From that time, B. C. 65, Syria became a Roman province, and the race of Antiochus was extinguiſhed. Juſtin. 40.——A philoſopher of Aſcalon, famous for his writings, and the reſpect with which he was treated by his pupils, Lucullus, Cicero, and Brutus. Plut. in Lucull.——An hiſtorian of Syracuſe, ſon of Xenophanes, who wrote an hiſtory of Sicily, in nine books, in which he began at the age of king Cocalus. Strab.—Diod. 12.——A rich king, tributary to the Romans in the age of Veſpaſian. Tacit. Hiſt. 2, c. 81.——A ſophiſt who refuſed to take upon himſelf the government of a ſtate, on account of the vehemence of his paſſions.——A king conquered by Antony, &c Cæſ. 3, bell. civ. 4.——A king of Meſſenia. Pauſ. 4.——A commander of the Athenian fleet, under Alcibiades, conquered by Lyſander. Xenoph. Hiſt. Græc.——A writer of Alexandria, who publiſhed a treatiſe on comic poets. Athen.——A ſceptic of Laodicea. Diog. in Pyrrh.——A learned ſophiſt.

phiſt. Philoſtra.——A ſervant of Atticus. Cic. ad Attic. 13, ep. 33.——A hair-dreſſer mentioned by Martial, 11, ep. 85.——A ſon of Hercules by Medea. Apollod. 2, c. 7.——A ſtage player. Juv. 3, v. 98.

ANTIŎPE, daughter of Nycteus king of Thebes, by Polyxo, was beloved by Jupiter, who, to deceive her, changed himſelf into a ſatyr. She became pregnant, and, to avoid the reſentment of her father, ſhe fled to mount Cithæron, where ſhe brought forth twins, Amphion and Zethus. She expoſed them to prevent diſcovery, but they were preſerved. After this ſhe fled to Epopeus, king of Sicyon, who married her. Some ſay that Epopeus carried her away, for which action Nycteus made war againſt him, and at his death left his crown to his brother Lycus, entreating him to continue the war and puniſh the raviſher of his daughter. Lycus obeyed his injunctions, killed Epopeus, and recovered Antiope, whom he loved, and married though his neice. His firſt wife, Dirce, was jealous of his new connection; ſhe prevailed upon her huſband, and Antiope was delivered into her hands, and confined in a priſon, where ſhe was daily tormented. Antiope, after many years of impriſonment, obtained means to eſcape, and went after her ſons, who undertook to avenge her wrongs upon Lycus and his wife Dirce. They took Thebes, put the king to death, and tied Dirce to the tail of a wild bull, who dragged her till ſhe died. Bacchus changed her into a fountain, and deprived Antiope of the uſe of her ſenſes. In this forlorn ſituation ſhe wandered all over Greece, and at laſt found relief from Phocus, ſon of Ornytion, who cured her of her diſorder, and married her. Hyginus, fab. 7, ſays that Antiope was divorced by Lycus, becauſe ſhe had been raviſhed by Epopeus, whom he calls Epaphus, and that after her repudiation ſhe became pregnant by Jupiter. Mean while Lycus married Dirce, who ſuſpected that her huſband ſtill kept the company of Antiope, upon which he impriſoned her. Antiope however eſcaped from her confinement, and brought forth on mount Cithæron. Some authors have called her daughter of Aſopus, becauſe ſhe was born on the banks of that river. The ſcholiaſt on Apollon. 1, v. 735, maintains, that there were two perſons of that name, one the daughter of Nycteus, and the other of Aſopus, and mother of Amphion and Zethus. Pauſ. 2, c. 6. l. 9, c. 17.—Ovid. 6. Met. v. 110.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Propert. 3, el. 15.—Homer. Od. 11, v. 259.—Hygin. fab. 7, 8, & 155.——A daughter of Theſpius or Theſtius, mother of Alopius by Hercules. Apollod. 2, c. 7.——A daughter of Mars, queen of the Amazons, taken priſoner by Hercules, and given in marriage to Theſeus. She is alſo called Hippolyte. Vid. Hippolyte.——A daughter of Æolus, mother of Bœotus and Hellen, by Neptune. Hygin. fab. 157.——A daughter of Pilon, who married Eurytus. Id. fab. 14.

ANTIŌRUS, a ſon of Lycurgus. Plut. in Lycurg.

ANTIPĂTER, ſon of Iolaus, was ſoldier under king Philip, and raiſed to the rank of a general under Alexander the Great. When Alexander went to invade Aſia, he left Antipater ſupreme governor of Macedonia, and of all Greece. Antipater exerted himſelf in the cauſe of his king; he made war againſt Sparta, and was ſoon after called into Perſia with a reinforcement by Alexander. He has been ſuſpected of giving poiſon to Alexander, to raiſe himſelf to power.—After Alexander's death, his generals divided the empire among themſelves, and Macedonia was allotted to Antipater. The wars which Greece, and chiefly Athens, had meditated during Alexander's life, now burſt forth with uncommon fury as ſoon as the news of his death was received. The Athenians levied an army of 30,000 men, and equipped 200 ſhips againſt Antipater, who was maſter of Macedonia. Their expedition was attended with much ſucceſs, Antipater was routed in Theſſaly, and even beſieged in the town of Lamia. But when Leoſthenes the Athenian general was mortally wounded under the walls of Lamia, the fortune of the war was changed, Antipater obliged the enemy to raiſe the ſiege, and ſoon after received a reinforcement from Craterus from Aſia, with which he conquered the Athenians at Cranon in Theſſaly. After this defeat, Antipater and Craterus marched into Bœotia, and conquered the Ætolians, and granted peace to the Athenians, on the conditions which Leoſthenes had propoſed to Antipater when beſieged in Lamia, i. e. that he ſhould be abſolute maſter over them. Beſides this, he demanded from their ambaſſadors, Demades, Phocion, and Xenocrates, that they ſhould deliver into his hands the orators Demoſthenes and Hyperides, whoſe eloquence had inflamed the minds of their countrymen, and had been the primary cauſes of the war. The conditions were accepted, a Macedonian garriſon was ſtationed in Athens, but the inhabitants ſtill were permitted the free uſe of their laws and privileges. Antipater and Craterus were the firſt who made hoſtile preparations againſt Perdiccas; and during that time, Polyperchon was appointed over Macedonia. Polyperchon defeated the Ætolians, who had made an invaſion upon Macedonia.

Antipater gave assistance to Eumenes, in Asia, against Antigonus, according to Justin. 14, c. 2. At his death, B. C. 319. Antipater appointed Polyperchon master of all his possessions; and as he was the oldest of all the generals and successors of Alexander, he recommended that he might be the supreme ruler in their councils, that every thing might be done according to his judgment. As for his son Cassander, he left him in a subordinate station under Polyperchon. But Cassander was of too aspiring a disposition tamely to obey his father's injunctions. He recovered Macedonia, and made himself absolute. Curt. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 & 10.—Justin. 11, 12, 13, &c.—Diod. 17, 18, &c.—C. Nep. in Phoc. & Eumen.—Plut. in Eumen. Alexand. &c.——A son of Cassander, king of Macedonia, and son-in-law of Lysimachus. He killed his mother because she wished his brother Alexander to succeed to the throne. Alexander, to revenge the death of his mother, solicited the assistance of Demetrius; but peace was re-established between the two brothers by the advice of Lysimachus, and soon after Demetrius killed Antipater, and made himself king of Macedonia, 294 B. C. Justin. 26, c. 1.——A king of Macedonia, who reigned only 45 days, 277 B. C.—A king of Cilicia.——A powerful prince, father to Herod. He was appointed governor of Judæa, by Cæsar, whom he had assisted in the Alexandrine war. Joseph.——An Athenian archon.——One of Alexander's soldiers, who conspired against his life with Hermolaus. Curt. 8, c. 6.——A celebrated sophist of Hieropolis, preceptor to the children of the emperor Severus.——A Stoic philosopher of Tarsus, 144 years B. C. —A poet of Sidon, who could compose a number of verses extempore, upon any subject. He ranked Sappho among the muses, in one of his epigrams. He had a fever every year on the day of his birth, of which at last he died. He flourished about 80 years B. C. Some of his epigrams are preserved in the anthologia. Plin. 7, c. 51.—Val. Max. 1, c. 10.—Cic. de Orat. 3, de Offic. 3, de Quæst. Acad. 4.——A philosopher of Phœnicia, preceptor to Cato of Utica. Plut. in Cat. ——A Stoic philosopher, disciple to Diogenes of Babylon. He wrote two books on divination, and died at Athens. Cic. de Div. 1, c. 3. Ac. Quæst. 4, c. 6. De offic. 3. c. 12.——A disciple of Aristotle, who wrote two books of letters.——A poet of Thessalonica, in the age of Augustus.

Alex.* —Athen.

ANTIPHĂTES, a king of the Læstrygones, descended from Lamus, who founded Formiæ. Ulysses returning from Troy, came upon his coasts, and sent three men to examine the country. Antiphates devoured one of them, and pursued the others, and sunk the fleet of Ulysses with stones, except the ship in which Ulysses was. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 232.——A son of Sarpedon. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 696.——The grandfather of Amphiaraus. Homer. Od.——A man killed in the Trojan war. Homer. Il.

ANTIPHĬLI PORTUS, a harbour on the African side of the Red Sea. Strab. 16.

ANTIPHĬLUS, an Athenian who succeeded Leosthenes at the siege of Lamia against Antipater. Diod. 18.——A noble painter who represented a youth leaning over a fire and blowing it, from which the whole house seemed to be illuminated. He was an Egyptian by birth: he imitated Apelles, and was disciple to Ctesidemus. Plin. 35, c. 10.

ANTIPHON, a poet.—A native of Rhamnusia, called Nestor, for his eloquence and prudence. The 16 orations that are extant under his name, are supposititious.—An orator who promised Philip, king of Macedonia, that he would set on fire the citadel of Athens, for which he was put to death at the instigation of Demosthenes. Cic. de Div. 2.—Plut. in Alcib. & Demost. ——A poet who wrote on agriculture. Athen.——An author who wrote a treatise on peacocks.——A rich man introduced by Xenophon as disputing with Socrates.——An Athenian who interpreted dreams, and wrote an history of his art. Cic. de Div. 1 & 2.——A foolish rhetorician.—A poet of Attica, who wrote tragedies, epic poems, and orations. Dionysius put him to death because he refused to praise his compositions. Being once asked by the tyrant, what brass was the best? he answered, that with which the statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton are made. Plut.—Aristot.

ANTIPHŎNUS, a son of Priam, who went with his father to the tent of Achilles to redeem Hector. Homer. Il. 24.

ANTĬPHUS, a son of Priam, killed by Agamemnon during the Trojan war.—A son of Thessalus, grandson to Hercules. He went to the Trojan war in 30 ships. Homer. Il.——An intimate friend of Ulysses. Homer. Od. 17.——A brother of Ctimenus, was was ſon of Ganyctor the Naupactian. Theſe two brothers murdered the poet Heſiod, on the falſe ſuſpicion that he had offered violence to their ſiſter, and threw his body into the ſea. The poet's dog diſcovered them, and they were ſeized and convicted of the murder. Plut. de Solert. Anim.

ANTIPŒNUS, a noble Theban, whoſe daughters ſacrificed themſelves for the public ſafety. Vid. Androclea.

ANTIPŎLIS, a city of Gaul, built by the people of Marſeilles. Tacit. 2, Hiſt. c. 15.

ANTISSA, a city at the north of Leſbos. —An iſland near it. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 287. —Plin. 2, c. 89.

ANTISTHĔNES, a philoſopher, born of an Athenian father, and of a Phrygian mother. He taught rhetoric, and had among his pupils the famous Diogenes; but when he had heard Socrates, he ſhut up his ſchool, and told his pupils, "Go ſeek for yourſelves a maſter, I have now found one." He was the head of the ſect of the Cynic philoſophers. One of his pupils aſked him, what philoſophy had taught him? "To live with myſelf," ſaid he. He ſold his all, and preſerved only a very ragged coat, which drew the attention of Socrates, and tempted him to ſay to the Cynic, who carried his contempt of dreſs too far, "Antiſthenes, I ſee thy vanity through the holes of thy coat." Antiſthenes taught the unity of God, but he recommended ſuicide. Some of his letters are extant. His doctrines of auſterity were followed as long as he was himſelf an example of the Cynical character, but after his death they were all forgotten. Antiſthenes floriſhed 396 years B.C. Cic. de Orat. 3, c. 35.—Diog. 6.—Plut. in Lyc.——A diſciple of Heraclitus.—An hiſtorian of Rhodes. Diog.

ANTITHEUS, an Athenian archon. Pauſ. 7, c. 17.

ANTIUM, a maritime town of Italy, built by Aſcanius, or, according to others, by a ſon of Ulyſſes and Circe, upon a promontory 32 miles from Oſtium. It was the capital of the Volſci, who made war againſt the Romans for above 200 years. Camillus took it, and carried all the beaks of their ſhips to Rome, and placed them in the Forum on a tribunal, which from thence was called Roſtrum. This town was dedicated to the goddeſs of Fortune, whoſe ſtatues, when conſulted, gave oracles by a nodding of the head, or other different ſigns. Nero was born there. Cic. de Div. 1.—Horat. 1, od. 35.

ANTOMĔNES, the laſt king of Corinth. After his death, magiſtrates with regal authority were annually choſen.

ANTŌNIA LEX was enacted by M. Antony, the conſul, A. U. C. 708. It abrogated the lex Atia, and renewed the lex Cornelia, by taking away from the people the privilege of chuſing prieſts, and reſtoring it to the college of prieſts, to which it originally belonged. Dio. 44.——Another by the ſame, A. U. C. 703. It ordained that a new decury of judges ſhould be added to the two former, and that they ſhould be choſen from the centurions. Cic. in Philip. 1 & 5.——Another by the ſame. It allowed an appeal to the people, to thoſe who were condemned de majeſtate, or of perfidious meaſures againſt the ſtate.—Another by the ſame, during his triumvirate. It made it a capital offence to propoſe ever after, the election of a dictator, and for any perſon to accept of the office. Appian. de bell. civ. 3.

ANTŌNIA, a daughter of M. Antony, by Octavia. She married Domitius Ænobarbus, and was mother of Nero, and two daughters.—A ſiſter of Germanicus.—A daughter of Claudius and Ælia Petina. She was of the family of the Tubero's, and was repudiated for her levity. Sueton. in Claud. 1.—Tacit. Ann. 11.——The wife of Druſus the ſon of Livia, and brother of Tiberius. She became mother of three children, Germanicus, Caligula's father; Claudius the emperor, and the debauched Livia. Her huſband died very early, and ſhe never would marry again, but ſpent her time in the education of her children. Some people ſuppoſe her grandſon Caligula ordered her to be poiſoned, A. D. 38. Val. Max. 4, c. 3.——A caſtle of Jeruſalem, which received this name in honor of M. Antony.

ANTŌNII, a patrician and plebeian family, which were ſaid to derive their origin from Antones, a ſon of Hercules, as Plut. in Anton. informs us.

ANTONĪNA, the wife of Beliſarius, &c.

ANTONĪNUS, ſirnamed Pius, was adopted by the emperor Adrian, to whom he ſucceeded. This prince is remarkable for all the virtues that can form a perfect ſtateſman, philoſopher, and king. He rebuilt whatever cities had been deſtroyed by wars in former reigns. In caſes of famine or inundation, undation, he relieved the diſtreſſed, and ſupplied their wants with his own money. He ſuffered the governors of the provinces to remain long in the adminiſtration, that no opportunity of extortion might be given to new comers. In his conduct towards his ſubjects, he behaved with affability and humanity, and liſtened with patience to every complaint brought before him. When told of conquering heroes, he ſaid with Scipio, I prefer the life and preſervation of a citizen, to the death of 100 enemies. He did not perſecute the Chriſtians like his predeceſſors, but his life was a ſcene of univerſal benevolence. His laſt moments were eaſy, though preceded by a lingering illneſs. When conſul of Aſia, he lodged at Smyrna in the houſe of a ſophiſt, who in civility obliged the governor to change his houſe at night. The ſophiſt, when Antoninus became emperor, viſited Rome, and was jocoſely deſired to uſe the palace as his own houſe, without any apprehenſion of being turned out at night. He extended the boundaries of the Roman province in Britain, by raiſing a rampart between the friths of Clyde and Forth; but he waged no wars during his reign, and only repulſed the enemies of the empire who appeared in the field. He died in the 75th year of his age, after a reign of 23 years, A. D. 161. He was ſucceeded by his adopted ſon M. Aurelius Antoninus, ſirnamed the philoſopher, a prince as virtuous as his father. He raiſed to the imperial dignity his brother L. Verus, whoſe voluptuouſneſs and diſſipation were as conſpicuous as the moderation of the philoſopher. During their reign, the Quadi, Parthians, and Marcomanni were defeated. Antoninus wrote a book in Greek, intitled, τα καθ' ἑαυτον, concerning himſelf. The beſt editions of which are the 4to Cantab. 1652, and the 8vo. Oxon. 1704. After the war with the Quadi had been finiſhed, Verus died of an apoplexy, and Antoninus ſurvived him eight years, and died in his 61ſt year, after a reign of 19 years and ten days. Dio. Caſſius.——Baſſiānus Caracalla, was ſon of the emperor Septimus Severus, celebrated for his cruelties. He killed his brother Geta in his mother's arms, and attempted to deſtroy the writings of Ariſtotle, obſerving that Ariſtotle was one of thoſe who ſent poiſon to Alexander. He married his mother, and publicly lived with her, which gave occaſion to the people of Alexandria to ſay that he was an Œdipus and his wife a Jocaſta. This joke was fatal to them; and the emperor, to puniſh their ill language, ſlaughtered many thouſands in Alexandria. After aſſuming the name and dreſs of Achilles, and ſtiling himſelf the conqueror of provinces he had never ſeen, he was aſſaſſinated at Edeſſa by Macrinus, April 8, in the 43d year of his age, A. D. 217. His body was ſent to his wife Julia, who ſtabbed herſelf at the ſight.——There is extant a Greek itinerary, and another book called Iter Britannicum, which ſome have attributed to the emperor Antoninus, though it was more probably written by a perſon of that name whoſe age is unknown.

ANTONIOPŎLIS, a city of Meſopotamia. Marcell. 8.

M. ANTŌNIUS GNIPHO, a poet of Gaul who taught rhetoric at Rome; Cicero and other illuſtrious men frequented his ſchool. He never aſked any thing for his lectures, whence he received more from the liberality of his pupils. Sueton. de Illuſt. Gr. 7.—— An orator, grandfather to the triumvir of the ſame name. He was killed in the civil wars of Marius, and his head was hung in the Forum. Val. Max. 9, c. 2.—Lucan. 2, v. 121.——Marcus, the eldeſt ſon of the orator of the ſame name, by means of Cotta and Cethegus, obtained from the ſenate the office of managing the corn on the maritime coaſts of the Mediterranean with unlimited power. This gave him many opportunities of plundering the provinces and enriching himſelf. He died of a broken heart. Salluſt. Frag.——Caius, a ſon of the orator of that name, who obtained a troop of horſe from Sylla, and plundered Achaia. He was carried before the pretor M. Lucullus, and baniſhed from the ſenate by the cenſors, for pillaging the allies, and refuſing to appear when ſummoned before juſtice.——Caius, ſon of Antonius Caius, was conſul with Cicero, and aſſiſted him to deſtroy the conſpiracy of Catiline in Gaul. He went to Macedonia, as his province, and fought with ill ſucceſs againſt the Dardani. He was accuſed at his return, and baniſhed.——Marcus, the triumvir, was grandſon to the orator M. Antonius, and ſon of Antonius, ſirnamed Cretenſis, from his wars in Crete. He was augur and tribune of the people, in which he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ambitious views. He always entertained a ſecret reſentment againſt Cicero, which aroſe from Cicero's having put to death Corn. Lentulus, who was concerned in Catiline's conſpiracy. This Lentulus had married Antonius's mother after his father's death. When the ſenate was torn by the factions of Pompey's and Cæſar's adherents, Antony propoſed that both ſhould lay aſide the command of their armies in the provinces; but as this propoſition met not with ſucceſs, he privately retired from Rome to the camp of Cæſar and adviſed him to march his army to Rome. In ſupport of his attachment, he commanded the left wing of his army at Pharſalia, and according according to a premeditated ſcheme, offered him a diadem in the preſence of the Roman people. When Cæſar was aſſaſſinated in the ſenate houſe, his friend Antony ſpoke an oration over his body, and to ingratiate himſelf and his party with the populace, he reminded them of the liberal treatment they had received from Cæſar. He beſieged Mutina, which had been allotted to D. Brutus, for which the ſenate judged him an enemy to the republic, at the remonſtration of Cicero. He was conquered by the conſuls Hirtius and Panſa, and by young Cæſar, who ſoon after joined his intereſt with that of Antony, and formed the celebrated triumvirate, which was eſtabliſhed with ſuch cruel proſcriptions that Antony did not even ſpare his own uncle that he might ſtrike off the head of his enemy Cicero. The triumvirate divided the Roman empire among themſelves; Lepidus was ſet over all Italy, Auguſtus had the weſt, and Antony returned into the eaſt, where he enlarged his dominions by different conqueſts. Antony had married Fulvia, whom he repudiated to marry Octavia the ſiſter of Auguſtus, and by this connection to ſtrengthen the triumvirate. He aſſiſted Auguſtus at the battle of Philippi againſt the murderers of J. Cæſar, and he buried the body of M. Brutus, his enemy, in a moſt magnificent manner. During his reſidence in the eaſt, he became enamoured of the fair Cleopatra queen of Egypt, and repudiated Octavia to marry her. This divorce incenſed Auguſtus, who now prepared to deprive Antony of all his power. Antony, in the mean time aſſembled all the forces of the eaſt, and with Cleopatra marched againſt Octavius Cæſar. Theſe two enemies met at Actium, where a naval engagement ſoon began, and Cleopatra, by flying with 60 ſails, drew Antony from the battle, and ruined his cauſe. After the battle of Actium, Antony followed Cleopatra into Egypt, where he was ſoon informed of the defection of all his allies and adherents, and ſaw the conqueror on his ſhores. He ſtabbed himſelf, and Cleopatra likewiſe killed herſelf with the bite of an aſp. Antony died in the 56th year of his age, B. C. 30, and the conqueror ſhed tears when he was informed that his enemy was no more. Antony left ſeven children by his three wives. He has been blamed for his great effeminacy, for his uncommon love of pleaſures, and his fondneſs of drinking. It is ſaid that he wrote a book in praiſe of drunkenneſs. He was fond of imitating Hercules, from whom, according to ſome accounts, he was deſcended; and he is often repreſented as Hercules, with Cleopatra in the form of Omphale, dreſſed in the arms of her ſubmiſſive lover, and beating him with her ſandals. In his public character, Antony was brave and courageous, but with the intrepidity of Cæſar, he poſſeſſed all his voluptuous inclinations. He was prodigal to a degree, and did not ſcruple to call, from vanity, his ſons by Cleopatra, kings of kings. His fondneſs for low company, and his debauchery, form the beſt parts of Cicero's Philippics. It is ſaid, that the night of Cæſar's murder, Caſſius ſupped with Antony; and being aſked whether he had a dagger with him, anſwered, yes, if you, Antony, aſpire to ſovereign power. Plutarch has written an account of his life. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 685.—Horat. ep. 9.—Juv. 10, v. 122.—C. Nep. in Attic.—Cic. in Philip.—Juſtin. 41. & 42.——Julius, ſon of Antony the triumvir, by Fulvia, was conſul with Paulus Fabius Maximus. He was ſirnamed Africanus, and put to death by order of Auguſtus. Some ſay that he killed himſelf. It is ſuppoſed that he wrote an heroic poem on Diomede, in 12 books. Horace dedicated his 4 Od. 2, to him. Tacit. 4, Ann. c. 44.—— Lucius, the triumvir's brother, was beſieged in Peluſium by Auguſtus, and obliged to ſurrender himſelf with 300 men by famine. The conqueror ſpared his life. Some ſay that he was killed at the ſhrine of Cæſar. ——A noble, but unfortunate youth. His father, Julius, was put to death by Auguſtus, for his criminal converſation with Julia, and he himſelf was removed by the emperor to Marſeilles, on pretence of finiſhing his education. Tacit. 4, An. c. 44.——Felix, a freedman of Claudius, appointed governor of Judea. He married Druſilla, the daughter of Antony and Cleopatra. Tacit. 4, Hiſt. 9. ——Flamma, a Roman, condemned for extortion, under Veſpaſian. Tacit. Hiſt. 4, c. 45.——Muſa, a phyſician of Auguſtus. Plin. 29, c. 1.——Merenda, a decemvir at Rome, A. U. C. 303. Liv. 3, c. 35.—— Q. Merenda, a military tribune, A.U.C. 333. Liv. 4, c. 42.

ANTYLLA. Vid. Anthylla.

ANUBIS, an Egyptian deity, repreſented under the form of a man with the head of a dog, becauſe when Oſiris went in his expedition againſt India, Anubis accompanied him, and clothed himſelf in a ſheep's ſkin. His worſhip was introduced from Egypt into Greece and Italy. He is ſuppoſed by ſome to be Mercury, becauſe he is ſometimes repreſented with a caduceus. Some make him ſon of Oſiris, others, his brother. Diod. 1.—Lucan. 8, v. 331.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 686.—Plut. de Iſid. & Oſirid.—Herodot. 4.——Virg. Æn. 8, v. 698.

ANXIUS, a river of Armenia, falling into the Euphrates.

ANXUR,

ANXUR, a city of the Volſci, taken by the Romans, A. U. C. 348. It was ſacred to Jupiter, who is called Jupiter Anxur. Liv. 4, c. 59.—Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 26.—Lucan. 3, v. 84.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 799.

ANYTA, a Greek woman, ſome of whoſe elegant verſes are ſtill extant.

ANȲTUS, an Athenian rhetorician, who, with Melitus and Lycon, accuſed Socrates of impiety, and was the cauſe of his condemnation. Theſe falſe accuſers were afterwards put to death by the Athenians. Diog.—Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 13.—Horat. 2. Sat. 4, v. 3.—Plut. in Alcib.

ANZĀBE, a river near the Tigris. Marcel. 18.

AOLLIUS, a ſon of Romulus by Herſilia, afterwards called Abillius.

AON, a ſon of Neptune, who came to Eubœa and Bœotia, from Apulia, where he collected the inhabitants into cities, and reigned over them. They were called Aones, and the country Aonia, from him.

AŎNES, the inhabitants of Aonia, called afterwards Bœotia. They came there in the age of Cadmus, and obtained his leave to ſettle with the Phœnicians. The muſes have been called Aonides, becauſe Aonia was more particularly frequented by them. Pauſ. 9, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 3, 7, 10, 13. Triſt. el. 5, v. 10. Faſt. 3, v. 456. l. 4, v. 245.—Virg. G. 3, v. 11.

AŌRIS, a famous hunter, ſon of Aras king of Corinth. He was ſo fond of his ſiſter Arathyræa, that he called part of the country by her name. Pauſ. 2, c. 12.——The wife of Neleus, called more commonly Chloris. Id. 9, c. 36.

AORNOS, Aornus, Aornis, a lofty rock in India, taken by Alexander. Hercules had beſieged it, but was never able to conquer it. Curt. 8, c. 11.—Arrian. 4.—Strab. 15.—Plut. in Alex.——A place in Epirus, with an oracle. Pauſ. 9, c. 80.——A certain lake near Tarteſſus.——Another near Baiæ and Puteoli. It was alſo called Avernus.

AŌTI, a people of Thrace near the Getæ on the Iſter. Plin. 4.

APAĬTÆ, a people of Aſia Minor. Strab.

APĀMA, a daughter of Artaxerxes, who married Pharnabazus ſatrap of Ionia.——A daughter of Antiochus. Pauſ. 1, c. 8.

APĀME, the mother of Nicomedes by Pruſias king of Bithynia.——The mother of Antiochus Soter, by Seleucus Nicanor. Soter founded a city which he called by his mother's name.

APAMĪA, Apamēa, a city of Phrygia, on the Marſyas.——A city of Bithynia.——Of Media.——Meſopotamia.——Another near the Tigris.

APARNI, a nation of ſhepherds near the Caſpian ſea. Strab.

APATŪRIA, a feſtival at Athens which received its name from απατη, deceit, becauſe it was inſtituted in memory of a ſtratagem by which Xanthus king of Bœotia was killed by Melanthus king of Athens, upon the following occaſion: when a war aroſe between the Bœotians and Athenians about a piece of ground which divided their territories, Xanthus made a propoſal to the Athenian king to decide the battle by ſingle combat. Thymœtes, who was then on the throne of Athens, refuſed, and his ſucceſſor Melanthus accepted the challenge. When they began the engagement, Melanthus exclaimed, that his antagoniſt had ſome perſon behind him to ſupport him; upon which Xanthus looked behind, and was killed by Melanthus. From this ſucceſs, Jupiter was called απατηνωρ deceiver, and Bacchus, who was ſuppoſed to be behind Xanthus, was called Μελαναιγις, clothed in the ſkin of a black goat. Some derive the word from απατορια, i. e. ομοτορια, becauſe on the day of the feſtival, the children accompanied their fathers to be regiſtered among the citizens. The feſtival laſted three days, the firſt day was called δορπια, becauſe ſuppers δορποι were prepared for each ſeparate tribe. The ſecond day was called αναρρυσις απο του ανω ερυειν, becauſe ſacrifices were offered to Jupiter and Minerva, and the head of the victims was generally turned up towards the heavens. The third was called Κουρεωτις from κουρος a youth, or κουρα ſhaving, becauſe the young men had their hair cut off before they were regiſtered, when their parents ſwore that they were free-born Athenians. They generally ſacrificed two ewes and a ſhe-goat to Diana. This feſtival was adopted by the Ionians, except the inhabitants of Epheſus and Colophon.——A ſirname of Minerva——of Venus.

APEAUROS, a mountain in Peloponneſus. Polyb. 4.

APELLA, a word, Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 10, which has given much trouble to critics and commentators. Some ſuppoſe it to mean circumciſed, (ſine pelle), an epithet highly applicable to a Jew. Others maintain that it is a proper name, upon the authority of Cicero ad Attic. 12, ep. 19, who mentions a perſon of the ſame name.

APELLES, a celebrated painter of Cos, or, as others ſay, of Epheſus, ſon of Pithius. He lived in the age of Alexander the Great, who honored him ſo much that he forbade any man but Apelles to draw his picture. He was ſo attentive to his profeſſion, that he never ſpent a day without employing his pencil, whence the proverb of Nulla dies ſine linea. His moſt perfect picture was Venus Anadyomene, which was not totally finiſhed when the painter died. He made a paint-a painting of Alexander holding thunder in his hand, ſo much like life, that Pliny, who ſaw it, ſays that the hand of the king with the thunder ſeemed to come out of the picture. This picture was placed in Diana's temple at Epheſus. He made another of Alexander, but the king expreſſed not much ſatisfaction at the ſight of it; and at that moment a horſe paſſing by, neighed at the horſe which was repreſented in the piece, ſuppoſing it to be alive; upon which the painter ſaid, "one would imagine that the horſe is a better judge of painting than your majeſty." When Alexander ordered him to draw the picture of Campaſpe, one of his miſtreſſes, Apelles became enamoured of her, and the king permitted him to marry her. He wrote three volumes upon painting, which were ſtill extant in the age of Pliny. It is ſaid that he was accuſed in Egypt of conſpiring againſt the life of Ptolemy, and that he would have been put to death had not the real conſpirator diſcovered himſelf, and ſaved the painter. Apelles never put his name to any pictures but three; a ſleeping Venus, Venus Anadyomene, and an Alexander. The proverb of Ne ſutor ultra crepidam, is applied to him by ſome. Plin. 35, c. 10.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 238.—Cic. in Famil. 1, ep. 9.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 3, v. 401.—Val. Max. 8, c. 11.——A tragic writer. Suet. Calig. 33.——Macedonian general, &c.

Apellĭcon, a Teian Peripatetic philoſopher, whoſe fondneſs for books was ſo great that he is accuſed of ſtealing them, when he could not obtain them with money. He bought the works of Ariſtotle and Theophraſtus, but greatly diſfigured them by his frequent interpolations. The extenſive library which he had collected at Athens, was carried to Rome when Sylla had conquered the capital of Attica, and among the valuable books was found an original manuſcript of Ariſtotle. He died about 86 years before Chriſt. Strab. 13.

Apennīnus, a ridge of high mountains which run through the middle of Italy, from Liguria to Ariminum. They are joined to the Alps. Some have ſuppoſed that they ran acroſs Sicily by Rhegium before Italy was ſeparated from Sicily. Lucan. 2, v. 306.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 226.—Ital. 4, v. 743.—Strab. 2.—Mela. 2, c. 4.

Aper, Marcus, a Latin orator of Gaul, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a politician, as well as by his genius. The dialogue of the orators, inſerted with the works of Tacitus and Quintilian, is attributed to him. He died A. D. 85.——Another. Vid. Numerianus.

Aperopia, a ſmall iſland on the coaſt of Argolis. Pauſ. 2, c. 34.

Apĕsus, Apeſas, or Apeſantus, a mountain of Peloponneſus, near Lerna. Stat. in Theb. 3. v, 461.

Aphaca, a town of Paleſtine, where Venus was worſhipped.

Aphæa, a name of Diana, who had a temple in Ægina. Pauſ. 2, c. 30.

Aphar, the capital city of Arabia, near the Red Sea. Arrian. in Peripl.

Apharētus, fell in love with Marpeſſa, daughter of Œnomaus, and carried her away.

Aphareus, a king of Meſſenia, who married Arene daughter of Œbalus, by whom he had three ſons. Pauſ. 3, c. 1.——A relation of Iſocrates, who wrote 37 tragedies.

Aphas, a river of Greece, which falls into the bay of Ambracia. Plin. 4, c. 1.

Aphellas, a king of Cyrene, who, with the aid of Agathocles, endeavoured to reduce all Africa under his power. Juſtin. 22, c. 7.

Aphĕsas, a mountain in Peloponneſus, whence, as the poets have imagined, Perſeus attempted to fly to heaven. Stat. 3, Theb. v. 461.

Aphĕtæ, a city of Magneſia, where the ſhip Argo was launched. Apollod.

Aphīdas, a ſon of Arcas king of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8.

Aphidnus, a friend of Æneas, killed by Turnus. Virg Æn. 9, v. 702.

Aphœbētus, one of the conſpirators againſt Alexander. Curt. 6, c. 7.

Aphrīces, an Indian prince, who defended the rock Aornus with 20,000 foot and 15 elephants. He was killed by his troops, and his head ſent to Alexander.

Aphrodisia, an iſland in the Perſian gulf, where Venus is worſhipped.—Feſtivals in honor of Venus, celebrated in different parts of Greece, but chiefly in Cyprus. They were firſt inſtituted by Cinyras, from whoſe family the prieſts of the goddeſs were always choſen. All thoſe that were initiated offered a piece of money to Venus, as a harlot, and received as a mark of the favors of the goddeſs, a meaſure of ſalt and a φαλλος; the ſalt, becauſe Venus aroſe from the ſea, the φαλλος, becauſe ſhe is the goddeſs of wantonneſs. They were celebrated at Corinth by harlots, and in every part of Greece they were very much frequented. Strab. 14. Athen.

Aphrodīsum, a city on the eaſtern parts of Cyprus, nine miles from Salamis.——A promontory with an iſland of the ſame name on the coaſt of Spain. Plin. 3, c. 3.

Aphrodīte, the Grecian name of Venus, from from ἀφρὸς froth, becauſe Venus is ſaid to have been born from the froth of the ocean.

Aphȳte or Aphytis, a city of Thrace, near Pallena, where Jupiter Ammon was worſhipped. Lyſander beſieged the town; but the god of the place appeared to him in a dream, and adviſed him to raiſe the ſiege, which he immediately did. Pauſ. 3, c. 18.

Apia, an ancient name of Peloponneſus, which it received from king Apis. It was afterwards called Ægialea, Pelaſgia, Argia, and at laſt Peloponneſus, or the iſland of Pelops. Homer. Il. 1, v. 270.——Alſo the name of the earth, worſhipped among the Lydians as a powerful deity. Herodot. 4, c. 59.

Apiānus, or Apion, was born at Oaſis in Egypt, whence he went to Alexandria, of which he was deemed a citizen. He ſucceeded Theus in the profeſſion of rhetoric in the reign of Tiberius, and wrote a book againſt the Jews, which Joſephus refuted. He was at the head of an embaſſy which the people of Alexandria ſent to Caligula, to complain of the Jews.—Seneca. ep. 88. —Plin. præf. Hiſt.

Apicāta, married Sejanus, by whom ſhe had three children. She was repudiated. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 3.

Apicius, a famous glutton in Rome. There were three of the ſame name, all famous for their voracious appetite. The firſt lived in the time of the republic, the ſecond in the reign of Auguſtus and Tiberius, and the third under Trajan. The ſecond was the moſt famous, as he wrote a book on the pleaſures and incitements of eating. He hanged himſelf after he had conſumed the greateſt part of his eſtate. The beſt edition of Apicius Cælius de arte coquinariâ, is that of Amſt. 12mo, 1709. Juv. 11, v. 3.—Martial. 2, ep. 69.

Apiŏla & Apiolæ, a town of Italy, taken by Tarquin the Proud. The Roman capitol was begun with the ſpoils taken from that city. Plin. 3, c. 5.

Apion, a ſirname of Ptolemy, one of the deſcendants of Ptolemy Lagus.——A grammarian. [Vid. Apianus.]

Apis, one of the ancient kings of Peloponneſus, ſon of Phoroneus and Laodice. Some ſay that Apollo was his father, and that he was king of Argos, while others call him king of Sicyon, and fix the time of his reign above 200 years earlier, which is enough to ſhew he is but obſcurely known, if known at all. He was a native of Naupactum, and deſcended from Inachus. He received divine honors after death, as he had been munificent and humane to his ſubjects. The country where he reigned was called Apia; afterwards it received the name of Pelaſgia, Argia, or Argolis, and at laſt that of Peloponneſus, from Pelops. Some amongſt whom is Varro, and St. Auguſtine, have imagined that Apis went to Egypt with a colony of Greeks, and that he civilized the inhabitants, and poliſhed their manners, for which they made him a god after death, and paid divine honors to him under the name of Serapis. This tradition, according to ſome of the moderns, is without foundation. Æſchyl. in Suppl.—Auguſt. de Civ. Dei, 18, c. 5.—Pauſ. 2, c. 5.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.——A ſon of Jaſon, born in Arcadia; he was killed by the horſes of Ætolus. Pauſ. 5, c. 1.——A town of Egypt, on the lake Mareotis.——A god of the Egyptians, worſhipped under the form of an ox. Some ſay that Iſis and Oſiris are the deities worſhipped under this name, becauſe during their reign they taught the Egyptians agriculture. The Egyptians believed that the ſoul of Oſiris was really departed into the ox, where it wiſhed to dwell, becauſe that animal had been of the moſt eſſential ſervice in the cultivation of the ground, which Oſiris had introduced into Egypt. The ox that was choſen, was always diſtinguiſhed by particular marks; his body was black; he had a ſquare white ſpot upon the forehead, the figure of an eagle upon the back, a knot under the tongue like a beetle, the hairs of his tail were double, and his right ſide was marked with a whitiſh ſpot, reſembling the creſcent of the moon. Without theſe, an ox could not be taken as the god Apis; and it is to be imagined that the prieſts gave theſe diſtinguiſhing characteriſtics to the animal, on which their credit and even proſperity depended. The feſtival of Apis laſted ſeven days; the ox was led in a ſolemn proceſſion by the prieſts, and every one was anxious to receive him into his houſe, and it was believed that the children who ſmelt his breath received the knowledge of futurity. The ox was conducted to the banks of the Nile with much ceremony, and if he had lived to the time which their ſacred books allowed, they drowned him in the river, and embalmed his body, and buried it in ſolemn ſtate in the city of Memphis. After his death, which ſometimes was natural, the greateſt cries and lamentations were heard in Egypt, as if Oſiris was juſt dead; the prieſts ſhaved their their heads, which was a ſign of the deepeſt mourning. This continued till another ox appeared with the proper characteriſtics to ſucceed as the deity, which was followed with the greateſt acclamations as if Oſiris was returned to life. This ox, which was found to repreſent Apis, was left 40 days in the city of the Nile before he was carried to Memphis, during which time none but women were permitted to appear before him, and this they performed according to their ſuperſtitious notions, in a wanton and indecent manner. There was alſo an ox worſhipped at Heliopolis, under the name of Mnevis; ſome ſuppoſe that he was Oſiris, but others maintain that the Apis of Memphis was ſacred to Oſiris, and Mnevis to Iſis. When Cambyſes came into Egypt, the people were celebrating the feſtivals of Apis with every mark of joy and triumph, which the conqueror interpreted as an inſult upon himſelf. He called the prieſts of Apis, and ordered the deity itſelf to come before him. When he ſaw that an ox was the object of their veneration, and the cauſe of ſuch rejoicings, he wounded it on the thigh, ordered the prieſts to be chaſtiſed, and commanded his ſoldiers to ſlaughter ſuch as were found celebrating ſuch riotous feſtivals. The god Apis had generally two ſtables, or rather temples. If he eat from the hand, it was a favorable omen; but if he refuſed the food that was offered him, it was interpreted as unlucky. From this, Germanicus, when he viſited Egypt, drew the omens of his approaching death. When his oracle was conſulted, incenſe was burnt on an altar, and a piece of money placed upon it, after which the people that wiſhed to know futurity, applied their ear to the mouth of the God, and immediately retired, ſtopping their ears till they had departed from the temple. The firſt ſounds that were heard, were taken as the anſwer of the oracle to their queſtions. Pauſ. 7, c. 22.—Herodot. 2 & 3.—Plin. 8, c. 38, &c.—Strab. 7. Plut. in Iſid. & Oſir.—Apollod. 1, c. 7, l. 2, c. 1.—Mela. 1, c. 9.—Plin. 8. c. 39, &c.—Strab. 7.—Ælian. V. H. 4 & 6.—Diod. 1.

Apitius Galba, a celebrated buffoon in the time of Tiberius. Juv. 5, v. 4.

Apollinares ludi, games celebrated at Rome in honor of Apollo. They originated from the following circumſtance: an old prophetic poem informed the Romans that if they inſtituted yearly games to Apollo, and made a collection of money for his ſervice, they would be able to repel the enemy whoſe approach already ſignified their deſtruction. The firſt time they were celebrated, Rome was alarmed by the approach of the enemy, and inſtantly the people ruſhed out of the city, and ſaw a cloud of arrows diſcharged from the ſky on the troops of the enemy. With this heavenly aſſiſtance they eaſily obtained the victory. The people generally ſat crowned with laurel at the repreſentation of theſe games, which were uſually celebrated at the option of the pretor, till the year U. C. 545, when a law was paſſed to ſettle the celebration yearly on the ſame day about the nones of July. When this alteration happened, Rome was infeſted with a dreadful peſtilence, which however ſeemed to be appeaſed by this act of religion. Liv. 25, c. 12.

Apollinaris, C. Sulpitius, a grammarian of Carthage, in the ſecond century, who is ſuppoſed to be the author of the verſes prefixed to Terence's plays as argument.

Apollinides, a Greek in the wars of Darius and Alexander, &c. Curt. 4, c. 5.

Apollinis Arx, a place at the entrance of the Sibyl's cave. Virg. Æn. 6.——Promontorium, a promontory of Africa.—Liv. 30, c. 24.——Templum, a place in Thrace,——in Lycia. Ælian. V. H. 6, c. 9.

Apollo, ſon of Jupiter and Latona, called alſo Phœbus, is often confounded with the Sun. According to Cicero, 3 de Nat. Deor. there were four perſons of this name. The firſt was ſon of Vulcan, and the tutelary god of the Athenians. The ſecond was ſon of Corybas, and was born in Crete, for the dominion of which he diſputed even with Jupiter himſelf. The third was ſon of Jupiter and Latona, and came from the nations of the Hyperboreans to Delphi. The fourth was born in Arcadia, and called Nomion, becauſe he gave laws to the inhabitants. To the ſon of Jupiter and Latona all the actions of the others ſeem to have been attributed. The Apollo, ſon of Vulcan, was the ſame as the Orus of the Egyptians, and was the moſt ancient, from whom the actions of the others have been copied. The three others ſeem to be of Grecian origin. The tradition that the ſon of Latona was born in the floating iſland of Delos, is taken from the Egyptian mythology, which aſſerts that the ſon of Vulcan, which is ſuppoſed to be Orus, was ſaved by his mother Iſis from the perſecution of Typhon, and entruſted to the care of Latona, who concealed him in the iſland of Chemmis.—When Latona was pregnant by Jupiter, Juno, who was ever jealous of her huſband's amours, raiſed the ſerpent Python to torment Latona, who was refuſed a place to give birth to her children, till Neptune, moved moved at the ſeverity of her fate, raiſed the iſland of Delos from the bottom of the ſea, where Latona brought forth Apollo and Diana. Apollo was the god of all the fine arts, of medicine, muſic, poetry, and eloquence, of all which he was deemed the inventor. He had received from Jupiter the power of knowing futurity, and he was the only one of the gods whoſe oracles were in general repute over the world. His amours with Leucothoe, Daphne, Iſſa, Bolina, Coronis, Clymene, Cyrene, Chione, Acacallis, Calliope, &c. are well known, and the various ſhapes he aſſumed to gratify his paſſion. He was very fond of young Hyacinthus, whom he accidentally killed with a quoit; as alſo of Cypariſſus, who was changed into a cypreſs tree. When his ſon Æſculapius had been killed with the thunders of Jupiter, for raiſing the dead to life, Apollo, in his reſentment, killed the Cyclops who had fabricated the thunderbolts. Jupiter was incenſed at this act of violence, and he baniſhed Apollo from heaven, and deprived him of his dignity. The exiled deity came to Admetus king of Theſſaly, and hired himſelf to be one of his ſhepherds, in which ignoble employment he remained nine years; from which circumſtance he was called the god of ſhepherds, and at his ſacrifices a wolf was generally offered, as that animal is the declared enemy of the ſheepfold. During his reſidence in Theſſaly, he rewarded the tender treatment of Admetus. He gave him a chariot, drawn by a lion and a bull, with which he was able to obtain in marriage Alceſte the daughter of Pelias; and ſoon after, the Parcæ granted, at Apollo's requeſt, that Admetus might be redeemed from death, if another perſon laid down his life for him.—He aſſiſted Neptune in building the walls of Troy; and when he was refuſed the promiſed reward from Laomedon, the king of the country, he deſtroyed the inhabitants by a peſtilence.—As ſoon as he was born, Apollo deſtroyed, with arrows, the ſerpent Python, whom Juno had ſent to perſecute Latona; hence he was called Pythius. He was not the inventor of the lyre, as ſome have imagined, but Mercury gave it him, and received as a reward the famous caduceus with which Apollo was wont to drive the flocks of Admetus. His conteſt with Pan and Marſyas, and the puniſhment inflicted upon Midas, are well known. He received the ſirnames of Phœbus, Delius, Cynthius, Pæan, Delphicus, Nomius, Lycius, Clarius, Iſmenius, Vulturius, Smintheus, &c. for reaſons which are explained under thoſe words. Apollo is generally repreſented with long hair, and the Romans were fond of imitating his figure, and therefore in their youth they were remarkable for their fine head of hair, which they cut ſhort at the age of 17 or 18. He is always repreſented as a tall beardleſs young man with a handſome ſhape, holding in his hand a bow, and ſometimes a lyre; his head is generally ſurrounded with beams of light. He was the deity who, according to the notions of the ancients, inflicted plagues, and in that moment he appeared ſurrounded with clouds. His worſhip and power were univerſally acknowledged: he had temples and ſtatues in every country, particularly in Egypt, Greece, and Italy. His ſtatue, which ſtood upon mount Actium, as a mark to mariners to avoid the dangerous coaſts, was particularly famous, and it appeared a great diſtance at ſea. Auguſtus, before the battle of Actium, addreſſed himſelf to it for victory. The cock, the graſshopper, the wolf, the crow, the ſwan, the hawk, the olive, the laurel, the palm-tree, &c. were ſacred to him; and in his ſacrifices, wolves and hawks were offered, as they were the natural enemies of the flocks over which he preſided. Bullocks and lambs were alſo immolated to him. As he preſided over poetry, he was often ſeen on mount Parnaſſus with the nine Muſes. His moſt famous oracles were at Delphi, Delos, Claros, Tenedos, Cyrrha and Patara. His moſt ſplendid temple was at Delphi, where every nation and individual made conſiderable preſents when they conſulted the oracle. Auguſtus, after the battle of Actium, built him a temple on mount Palatine, which he enriched with a valuable library. He had a famous Coloſſus in Rhodes, which was one of the ſeven wonders of the world. Apollo has been taken for the Sun; but it may be proved by different paſſages in the ancient writers, that Apollo, the Sun, Phœbus, and Hyperion, were all different characters and deities, though confounded together. When once Apollo was addreſſed as the Sun, and repreſented with a crown of rays on his head, the idea was adopted by every writer, and from thence aroſe the miſtake. *Ovid. diſtance at ſea; and ſerved as a guide to mariners, and reminded them to avoid the dangerous rocks that were along the coaſt. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 275.

APOLLOCRĂTES, a friend of Dion, ſuppoſed by ſome to be the ſon of Dionyſius.

APOLLODŌRUS, a famous grammarian and mythologiſt of Athens, ſon of Aſclepias, and diſciple to Panætius the Rhodian philoſopher. He floriſhed about 115 years before the Chriſtian era, and wrote an hiſtory of Athens, beſides other works. But of all his compoſitions, nothing is extant but his Bibliotheca, which is divided into three books. It is an abridged hiſtory of the gods and of the ancient heroes, of whoſe actions and genealogy it gives a true and faithful account. The beſt edition is that of Heyne Goett. in 8vo. 4 vols. 1782. Athen.—Plin. 7, c. 37.—Diod. 4 & 13. ——A tragic poet of Cilicia, who wrote tragedies entitled Ulyſſes, Thyeſtes, &c. ——A comic poet of Gela in Sicily, in the age of Menander, who wrote 47 plays.—— An architect of Damaſcus, who directed the building of Trajan's bridge acroſs the Danube. He was put to death by Adrian, to whom, when in a private ſtation, he had ſpoken in too bold a manner.——A writer who compoſed an hiſtory of Parthia.—— A learned diſciple of Epicurus, who wrote about 40 volumes on different ſubjects. Diog.——A painter of Athens, of whom Zeuxis was a pupil. Two of his paintings were admired at Pergamus in the age of Pliny; a prieſt in a ſuppliant poſture, and Ajax ſtruck with Minerva's thunders. He was of ſuch an iraſcible diſpoſition, that he deſtroyed his own pieces upon the leaſt provocation. Plin. 34, c. 8.——A rhetorician of Pergamus, preceptor and friend to Auguſtus, who wrote a book on rhetoric. Strab. 13.——A tragic poet of Tarſus.—— A Lemnian who wrote on huſbandry.—— A phyſician of Tarentum.——Another of Cytium.

APOLLONIA, a feſtival at Ægialea in honor of Apollo and Diana. It aroſe from this circumſtance: theſe two deities came to Ægialea after the conqueſt of the ſerpent Python; but they were frightened away, and fled to Crete. Ægialea was ſoon viſited with an epidemical diſtemper, and the inhabitants, by advice of their prophets, ſent ſeven choſen boys, with the ſame number of girls, to entreat them to return to Ægialea. Apollo and Diana granted their petition, in honor of which a temple was raiſed to Πειθω the goddeſs of perſuaſion; and ever after, a number of youths of both ſexes were choſen to march in ſolemn proceſſion, as if anxious to bring back Apollo and Diana. Pauſan. in Corinth.——A town of Mygdonia.—Of Crete.—Of Sicily.—On the coaſt of Aſia Minor.—Another on the coaſt of Thrace, part of which was built on a ſmall iſland of Pontus, where Apollo had a temple.——A town of Macedonia, on the coaſts of the Adriatic.——A city of Thrace. ——Another on mount Parnaſſus.

APOLLONIAS, the wife of Attalus king of Phrygia, to whom ſhe bore four children.

APOLLONIĂDES, a tyrant of Sicily, compelled to lay down his power by Timoleon.

APOLLONĬDES, a writer of Nicæa.—— A phyſician of Cos at the court of Artaxerxes, who became enamoured of Amytis, the monarch's ſiſter, and was ſome time after put to death for ſlighting her after the reception of her favors.

APOLLONIUS, a Stoic philoſopher of Chalcis, ſent for by Antoninus Pius, to inſtruct his adopted ſon Marcus Antoninus. When he came to Rome, he refuſed to go to the palace, obſerving, that the maſter ought not to wait upon his pupil, but the pupil upon him. The emperor hearing this, ſaid, laughing, "It was then eaſier for Apollonius to come from Chalcis to Rome, than from Rome to the palace."——A geometrician of Perge in Pamphylia, whoſe works are now loſt. He lived about 242 years before the Chriſtian era, and compoſed a commentary on Euclid, whoſe pupils he attended at Alexandria. He wrote a treatiſe on conic ſections, eight of which are now extant, and he firſt endeavoured to explain the cauſes of the apparent ſtopping and retrograde motion of the planets, by cycles, and epicycles, or circles within circles. —The beſt edition of Apollonius is Dr. Halley's, Oxon. fol. 1710.——A poet of Naucratis in Egypt, generally called Apollonius of Rhodes, becauſe he lived for ſome time there. He was pupil, when young, to Callimachus and Panætius, and was the third librarian of the famous library of Alexandria, under Ptolemy Evergetes. He was ungrateful to his maſter Callimachus, who wrote a poem againſt him, in which he denominated him Ibis. Of all his works nothing remains but his poem on the expedition of the Argonauts, in four books. The beſt editions of Apollonius, are thoſe printed at Oxford, in 4to, by Shaw, 1777, in 2 vols. and in 1, 8vo, 1779, and that of Brunck Argentor. 12mo, 1780. Quintil. 10, c. 1.——A Greek orator, ſirnamed Molo, was a native of Alabanda in Caria. He opened a ſchool of rhetoric at Rhodes and Rome, and had J. Cæſar and Cicero among his pupils. He diſcouraged the attendance of thoſe whom he ſuppoſed incapable of diſtinguiſhing themſelves as orators, and he recommended to them purſuits more congenial to their abilities. He wrote an hiſtory, in which he did not candidly treat the people of Judæa, according to the complaint of Joſephus contra Apion. Cic. de orat. 1, c. 28, 75, 126 & 130. Ad. famil. 3, ep. 16. De Invent. 1, c. 81.—Quintil. 3, c. 1. l. 12, c. 6.—Suet. in Cæſ. 4.—Plut. in Cæſ. ——A Greek hiſtorian about the age of Auguſtus, who wrote upon the philoſophy of Zeno, and of his followers. Strab. 14. ——A Stoic philoſopher who attended Cato of Utica in his laſt moments. Plut. in Cat.——An officer ſet over Egypt by Alexander. Curt. 4, c. 8.——A wreſtler. Pauſ. 5.——A phyſician of Pergamus, who wrote on agriculture. Varro.——A grammarian of Alexandria.——A writer in the age of Antoninus Pius.——Thyaneus, a Pythagorean philoſopher, well ſkilled in the ſecret arts of magic. Being one day haranguing the populace at Epheſus, he ſuddenly exclaimed, "Strike the tyrant, ſtrike him; the blow is given, he is wounded, and fallen!" At that very moment the emperor Domitian had been ſtabbed at Rome. The magician acquired much reputation when this circumſtance was known. He was courted by kings and princes, and commanded unuſual attention by his numberleſs artifices. His friend and companion, called Damis, wrote his life, which 200 years after engaged the attention of Philoſtratus. In his hiſtory the biographer relates ſo many curious and extraordinary anecdotes of his hero, that many have juſtly deemed it a romance; yet for all this, Hierocles had the preſumption to compare the impoſtures of Apollonius with the miracles of Jeſus Chriſt.——A ſophiſt of Alexandria, diſtinguiſhed for his Lexicon Græcum Iliadis et Odyſſeæ, a book that was beautifully edited by Villoiſon in 4to. 2 vols. Paris, 1773. Apollonius was one of the pupils of Didymus, and floriſhed in the beginning of the firſt century.——A phyſician.——A ſon of Sotades at the court of Ptolemy Philadelphus.——Syrus, a Platonic philoſopher.——Herophilius, wrote concerning ointments.

Apollŏphănes, a Stoic, who greatly flattered king Antigonus, and maintained that there exiſted but one virtue, prudence. Diog.——A phyſician in the court of Antiochus. Polyb. 5.——A comic poet. Ælian. Anim. 6.

Apomyĭos, a ſirname of Jupiter.

Aponiana, an iſland near Lilybæum. Hirt. Afric. 2.

M. Aponius, a governor of Mœſia, rewarded with a triumphal ſtatue by Otho, for defeating 9000 barbarians. Tacit. Hiſt. 1, c. 79.

Apŏnus, a fountain with a village of the ſame name near Patavium in Italy. The waters of the fountain were wholeſome, and were ſuppoſed to have an oracular power. Lucan. 7, v. 194.—Suet. in Tiber. 14.

Apostrophia, a ſirname of Venus in Bœotia, who was diſtinguiſhed under theſe names, Venus Urania, Vulgaria, and Apoſtrophia. The former was the patroneſs of a pure and chaſte love; the ſecond of carnal and ſenſual deſires; and the laſt incited men to illicit and unnatural gratifications, to inceſts and rapes. Venus Apoſtrophia was invoked by the Thebans, that they might be ſaved from ſuch unlawful deſires. She is the ſame as the Verticordia of the Romans. Pauſ. 9, c. 16.——Val. Max. 8, c. 15.

Apotheōsis, a ceremony obſerved by the ancient nations of the world, by which they raiſed their kings, heroes, and great men, to the rank of deities. The nations of the eaſt were the firſt who paid divine honors to their great men, and the Romans followed their example, and not only deified the moſt prudent and humane of their emperors, but alſo the moſt cruel and profligate. Herodian 4, c. 2, has left us an account of the apotheoſis of a Roman emperor. After the body of the deceaſed was burnt, an ivory image was laid on a couch for ſeven days, repreſenting the emperor under the agonies of diſeaſe. The city was in ſorrow, the ſenate viſited it in mourning, and the phyſicians pronounced it every day in a more decaying ſtate. When the death was announced, a young band of ſenators carried the couch and image to the Campus Martius, where it was depoſited on an edifice in the form of a pyramid, where ſpices and combuſtible materials were thrown. After this the knights walked round the pile in ſolemn proceſſion, and the images of the moſt illuſtrious Romans were drawn in ſtate, and immediately the new emperor, with a torch, ſet fire to the pile, and was aſſiſted by the ſurrounding multitude. Mean while an eagle was let fly from the middle of the pile, which was ſuppoſed to carry the ſoul of the deceaſed to heaven, where he was ranked among the gods. If the deified was a female, a peacock, and not an eagle, was ſent from the flames.—The Greeks obſerved ceremonies much of the ſame nature.

Appia via, a celebrated road leading from the porta Capena at Rome to Brundu-ſium, through Capua. Appius Claudius made it as far as Capua, and it received its name from him. It was continued and finiſhed by Gracchus, J. Cæſar, and Auguſtus.

guſtus.—Vid. Via. Lucan. 3, v. 285.—Stat. 2. Sylv. 2, v. 12.—Mart. 9, ep. 104. Suet. in Tiber. 14.

APPIĂDES, a name given to theſe five deities, Venus, Pallas, Veſta, Concord, and Peace. A temple was erected to them near the Appiæ Aquæ, by the forum of J. Cæſar. Ovid. de Art. Am. 3, v. 452.

APPIĀNUS, a Greek hiſtorian of Alexandria, who floriſhed A. D. 123. His univerſal hiſtory, which conſiſted of 24 books, was a ſeries of hiſtory of all the nations that had been conquered by the Romans in the order of time; and in the compoſition, the writer diſplayed, with a ſtyle ſimple and unadorned, a great knowledge of military affairs, and deſcribed his battles in a maſterly manner. This excellent work is greatly mutilated, and there is extant now only the account of the Punic, Syrian, Parthian, Mithridatic, and Spaniſh wars, with thoſe of Illyricum and the civil diſſentions, with a fragment of the Celtic wars. The beſt editions are thoſe of Tollius and Variorum, 2 vols. 8vo, Amſt. 1670, and that of Schweigheuſerus, 3 vols. 8vo. Lipſ. 1785. He was ſo eloquent that the emperor highly promoted him in the ſtate. He wrote an univerſal hiſtory in 24 books, which began from the time of the Trojan war, down to his own age. Few books of this valuable work are extant.

APPII FORUM, a little village not far from Rome, built by the conſul Appius. Horat. 1, ſat. 5.

APPIUS, the prænomen of an illuſtrious family at Rome.—A cenſor of that name, A. U. C. 442. Horat. 1, ſat. 6.

APPIUS CLAUDIUS, a decemvir who obtained his power by force and oppreſſion. He attempted the virtue of Virginia, whom her father killed to preſerve her chaſtity. This act of violence was the cauſe of a revolution in the ſtate, and the raviſher was baniſhed. Liv. 3, c. 33.——Claudius Cæcus, a Roman orator, who built the Appian way, and many aqueducts in Rome. When Pyrrhus, who was come to aſſiſt the Tarentines againſt Rome, demanded peace of the ſenators, Appius, grown old in the ſervice of the republic, cauſed himſelf to be carried to the ſenate-houſe, and, by his authority, diſſuaded them from granting a peace which would prove diſhonorable to the Roman name. Ovid. Faſt. 6, v. 203.—Cic. in Brut. & Tuſc. 4.——A Roman, who, when he heard that he had been proſcribed by the triumvirs, divided his riches among his ſervants, and embarked with them for Sicily. In their paſſage the veſſel was ſhipwrecked, and Appius alone ſaved his life. Appian. 4.——Claudius Craſſus, a conſul, who, with Sp. Naut. Rutulius, conquered the Celtiberians, and was defeated by Perſeus king of Macedonia. Liv.——Claudius Pulcher, a grandſon of Ap. Cl. Cæcus, conſul in the age of Sylla, retired from grandeur to enjoy the pleaſures of a private life.——Clauſus, a general of the Sabines, who, upon being ill treated by his countrymen, retired to Rome with 5000 of his friends, and was admitted into the ſenate in the early ages of the republic. Plut. in Poplic.——Herdonius ſeized the capitol with 4,090 exiles, A. U. C. 292, and was ſoon after overthrown. Liv. 3, c. 15.—Flor. 3. c. 19.——Claudius Lentulus, a conſul with M. Perpenna.—A dictator who conquered the Hernici.—The name of Appius was common in Rome, and particularly to many conſuls whoſe hiſtory is not marked by any uncommon event.

APPŬLA, an immodeſt woman, &c. Juv. 6, v. 64.

APRIES & APRIUS, one of the kings of Egypt in the age of Cyrus, ſuppoſed to be the Pharaoh Hophra of ſcripture. He took Sidon and lived in great proſperity till his ſubjects revolted to Amaſis, by whom he was conquered and ſtrangled. Herodot. 2, c. 159, &c. —Diod. 1.

APSINTHII, a people of Thrace; they received their name from a river called Apſinthus, which flowed through their territory. Dionyſ. Perieg.

APSINUS, an Athenian ſophiſt in the 3d century, author of a work called Præceptor de arte rhetorica.

APSUS, a river of Macedonia falling into the Ionian ſea between Dyrrhachium and Appollonia. Lucan. 5, v. 461.

APTĔRA, an inland town of Crete. Ptol.

APULEIA LEX, was enacted by L. Apuleius the tribune, A. U. C. 652, for inflicting a puniſhment upon ſuch as were guilty of raiſing ſeditions, or ſhewing violence in the city.——Varilia, a grand-daughter of Auguſtus, convicted of adultery with a certain Manlius in the reign of Tiberius. Tacit. An. c. 50.

APULEIUS, a learned man who ſtudied at Carthage, Athens, and Rome, where he married a rich widow called Pudatilla, for which he was accuſed by ſome of her relations of uſing magical arts to win her heart. His apology was a maſterly compoſition. In his youth, Apuleius had been very expenſive; but he was, in a maturer age, more devoted to ſtudy, and learnt Latin without a maſter. The moſt famous of his works extant is the golden aſs in eleven books, an allegorical piece replete with morality. The beſt editions of Apuleius are the Delphin, 2 vols. 4to. Paris, 1688, and Pricæi, 8vo. Goudæ, 1650.

Apŭlia, a country of Italy between Daunia and Calabria. It was part of the ancient Magna Græcia, and generally divided into Apulia Daunia, and Apulia Peucetia. It was famous for its wools. Some ſuppoſe that it is called after Apulus, an ancient king of the country before the Trojan war. Plin. 3, c. 11.—Cic. de Div. 1, c. 43.—Strab. 6.—Mela 2.—Martial. in Apoph. 155.

Apuscidāmus, a lake of Africa. All bodies, however heavy, were ſaid to ſwim on the ſurface of its waters. Plin. 32, c. 2.

Aquarius, one of the ſigns of the Zodiac, riſing in January, and ſetting in February. Some ſuppoſe that Ganymede was changed into this ſign. Virg. G. 3, v. 304.

Aquilaria, a place of Africa. Cæſ. 2, bell. civ. 23.

Aquileia or Aquilegia, a town founded by a Roman colony, called, from its grandeur, Roma ſecunda, and ſituated at the north of the Adriatic Sea, on the confines of Italy. The Romans built it chiefly to oppoſe the frequent incurſions of the barbarians. The Roman emperors enlarged and beautified it, and often made it their reſidence. Ital. 8, v. 605.—Martial. 4. ep. 25.—Mela. 2, c. 4.

Aquilius Niger, an hiſtorian mentioned by Sueton. in Aug. 11.——Marcus, a Roman conſul who had the government of Aſia Minor. Juſtin. 36, c. 4.——Sabinus, a lawyer of Rome, ſirnamed the Cato of his age. He was father to Aquilia Severa, whom Heliogabalus married.——Severus, a poet and hiſtorian in the age of Valentinian.

Aquillia & Aquilia, a patrician family at Rome, from which few illuſtrious men roſe.

Aquĭlo, a wind blowing from the north. Its name is derived, according to ſome, from Aquila, on account of its keenneſs and velocity.

Aquilonia, a city of the Hirpini in Italy. Liv. 10, c. 38.

Aquinius, a poet of a moderate capacity. Cic. 5. Tuſ.

Aquīnum, a town of Latium, on the borders of the Samnites, where Juvenal was born. Strab.—Ital. 8, v. 404.—Juv. 3, v. 319.

Aquitania, a country of Gaul, bounded on the weſt by Spain, north by the province of Lugdunum, ſouth by the province called Gallia Narbonenſis. Its inhabitants are called Aquitani. Plin. 4, c. 17.—Strab. 4.

Ara, a conſtellation, conſiſting of ſeven ſtars, near the tail of the ſcorpion. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 138.

Ara Lugdunensis, a place at the confluence of the Arar and Rhone. Juv. 1, v. 44.

Arabarches, a vulgar perſon among the Egyptians, or perhaps an uſual expreſſion for the leaders of the Arabians, who reſided in Rome. Juv. 1, v. 130. Some believe that Cicero, 2. ep. 17. ad Attic. alluded to Pompey under the name of Arabarches.

Arăbia, a large country of Aſia, forming a peninſula between the Arabian and Perſian gulfs. It is generally divided into three different parts, Petræa, Deſerta, and Felix. It is famous for its frankincenſe and aromatic plants. The inhabitants were formerly under their own chiefs, an uncivilized people, who paid adoration to the ſun, moon, and even ſerpents, and who had their wives in common, and circumciſed their children. The country has often been invaded, but never totally ſubdued. Alexander the Great expreſſed his wiſh to place the ſeat of his empire in their territories. The ſoil is rocky and ſandy, the inhabitants are ſcarce, the mountains rugged, and the country without water. In Arabia, whatever woman was convicted of adultery, was capitally puniſhed. The Arabians for ſome time ſupported the ſplendor of literature, which was extinguiſhed by the tyranny and ſuperſtition which prevailed in Egypt, and to them we are indebted for the invention of Algebra, or the application of ſigns and letters to repreſent lines, numbers, and quantities, and alſo for the numerical characters of 1, 2, 3, &c.—Herodot. 1, 2, 3, & Diod. 1 & 2.—Plin. 12 & 14.—Strab. 16.—Xenoph.—Tibull. 2, el. 2.—Curt. 5, c. 1.—Virg. G. 1, v. 57.—Alſo, the name of the wife of Ægyptus. Apollod.

Arabĭcus sinus, a ſea between Egypt and Arabia, different, according to ſome authors, from the Red Sea, which they ſuppoſe to be between Æthiopia and India, and the Arabian gulph further above, between Egypt and Arabia. It is about 40 days ſail in length, and not half a day's in its moſt extenſive breadth. Plin. 5, c. 11.—Strab.

Arăbis, Arabius, Arbis, an Indian river. Curt. 9, c. 10.

Arabs & Arăbus, a ſon of Apollo and Babylone, who firſt invented medicine, and taught it in Arabia, which is called after his name. Plin. 7, c. 56.

Aracca & Arecca, a city of Suſiana. Tibull. 4, el. 1.

Arachne, a woman of Colophon, daughter to Idmon a dyer. She was ſo ſkilful in working with the needle, that ſhe challenged Minerva, the goddeſs of the art, to a trial of ſkill. She repreſented on her work the amours of Jupiter with Europa, Antiope, Leda, Aſteria, Danae, Alcmena, &c. but though her piece was perfect and maſterly, masterly, she was defeated by Minerva, and hanged herself in despair, and was changed into a spider by the goddess. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 1, &c.——A city of Thessaly.

ARACHOSIA, a city of Asia, near the Massagetæ. It was built by Semiramis.—One of the Persian provinces beyond the Indus. Plin. 6, c. 23.—Strab. 11.

ARACHŌTÆ & ARACHŌTI, a people of India, who received their name from the river Arachotus, which flows down from mount Caucasus. Dionys. Perieg.—Curt. 9, c. 7.

ARACHTHIAS, one of the four capital rivers of Epirus, near Nicopolis, falling into the bay of Ambracia. Strab. 7.

ARACILLUM, a town of Hispania Tarraconensis. Flor. 4, c. 12.

ARACOSII, an Indian nation. Justin. 13, c. 4.

ARACYNTHUS, a mountain of Acarnania. Plin. 4, c. 2.—Virg. Ecl. 2, v. 24.

ARĂDUS, an island near Phœnicia, joined to the continent by a bridge. Dionys. Perieg.

ARÆ, rocks in the middle of the Mediterranean, between Africa and Sardinia, where the Romans and Africans ratified a treaty. It was upon them that Æneas lost the greatest part of his fleet; they are supposed to be those islands which are commonly called Ægates. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 113.

ARÆ PHILÆNORUM, a maritime city of Africa, on the borders of Cyrene. Sallust. Jug. bell.

ARAR, a river of Gaul, flowing into the Rhone, over which Cæsar's soldiers made a bridge in one day. Cæs. bell. Gall. 1, c. 12.—Sil. 3, v. 452.

ARĂRUS, a Scythian river flowing through Armenia. Herodot. 4, c. 48.

ARATHYREA, a small province of Achaia, afterwards called Asophis, with a city of the same name. Homer. Il. 2.—Strab. 8.

ARĂTUS, a Greek poet of Cilicia, about 277 B. C. He was greatly esteemed by Antigonus Gonatas king of Macedonia, at whose court he passed much of his time, and by whose desire he wrote a poem on astronomy, in which he gives an account of the situations, rising and setting, number and motion of the stars. Cicero represents him as unacquainted with astrology, yet capable of writing upon it in elegant and highly finished verses, which however from the subject admit of little variety. Aratus wrote besides, hymns and epigrams, &c. and had among his interpreters and commentators many of the learned men of Greece whose works are lost, besides Cicero, Claudius, and Germanicus Cæsar, who, in their youth, or moments of relaxation, translated the phænomena into Latin verse. The best editions of Aratus are, Grotius' 4to. apud Raphaleng. 1600; and Oxon. 8vo. 1672. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 41.—Paus. 1, c. 2.—Ovid. Am. 1, el. 15, v. 26.——The son of Clinias & Aristodama, was born at Sicyon in Achaia, near the river Asopus. When he was but seven years of age, his father, who held the government of Sicyon, was assassinated by Abantidas, who made himself absolute. After some revolutions, the sovereignty came into the hands of Nicocles, whom Aratus murdered, to restore his country to liberty. He was so jealous of tyrannical power, that he even destroyed a picture which was the representation of a tyrant. He joined the republic of Sicyon in the Achæan league, which he strengthened, by making a treaty of alliance with the Corinthians, and with Ptolemy king of Egypt. He was chosen chief commander of the forces of the Achæans, and drove away the Macedonians from Athens and Corinth. He made war against the Spartans, but was conquered in a battle by their king Cleomenes. To repair the losses he had sustained, he solicited the assistance of king Antigonus, and drove away Cleomenes from Sparta, who fled to Egypt, where he killed himself. The Ætolians soon after attacked the Achæans; and Aratus, to support his character, was obliged to call to his aid, Philip, king of Macedonia. His friendship with this new ally did not long continue. Philip shewed himself cruel and oppressive; and put to death some of the noblest of the Achæans, and even seduced the wife of the son of Aratus. Aratus, who was now advanced in years, showed his displeasure by withdrawing himself from the society and friendship of Philip. But this rupture was fatal. Philip dreaded the power and influence of Aratus, and therefore he caused him and his son to be poisoned. Some days before his death, Aratus was observed to spit blood; and when apprized of it by his friends, he replied, "Such are the rewards which a connection with kings will produce." He was buried with great pomp, by his countrymen; and two solemn sacrifices were annually made to him, the first on the day that he delivered Sicyon from tyranny, and the second on the day of his birth. During those sacrifices, which were called Aratea, the priests wore a ribbon bespangled with white and purple spots, and the public school-master walked in procession at the head of his scholars, and was always accompanied by the richest and most eminent senators, adorned with garlands. Aratus died in the 62d year of his age, B. C. 213. He wrote a history of the Achæan league, much commended by Polybius. Plut. in vitâ.—Pauſ. 2, c. 8.—Cic de Offic. 2, c. 23.—Strab. 14. Liv. 27, c. 31.—Polyb. 2.

ARAXES, a celebrated river which ſeparates Armenia from Media, and falls into the Caſpian Sea. Lucan. 1, v. 19, l. 7, v. 188.—Strab. 8.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 728.—Herodot. 1, c. 202, &c.——Another which falls into the Euphrates.—Another in Europe, now called Volga.

ARBĀCES, a Mede who revolted with Beleſis againſt Sardanapalus, and founded the empire of Media upon the ruins of the Aſſyrian power, 820 years before the Chriſtian era. He reigned above fifty years, and was famous for the greatneſs of his undertakings, as well as for his valor. Juſtin. 1, c. 3.—Paterc. 1, c. 6.

ARBĒLA, a town of Perſia, on the river Lycus, famous for a battle fought there between Alexander and Darius, the 2d of October, B. C. 331. Curt. 5, c. 1.—Plut. in Alex.

ARBĔLA, a town of Sicily, whoſe inhabitants were very credulous.

ARBIS, a river on the weſtern boundaries of India. Strab.

ARBOCĀLA, a city taken by Annibal as he marched againſt Rome.

ARBUSCŬLA, an actreſs on the Roman ſtage, who laughed at the hiſſes of the populace, while ſhe received the applauſes of the knights. Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 77.

ARCĂDIA, an inland country of Peloponneſus, ſurrounded on every ſide by land, ſituate between Achaia, Meſſenia, Elis and Argolis. It received its name from Arcas ſon of Jupiter, and was anciently called Drymodes, on account of the great number of oaks (δρυς) it produced, and afterwards Pelaſgia. The country has been much celebrated by the poets, and was famous for its mountains. The inhabitants were for the moſt part all ſhepherds, who lived upon acorns, were ſkilful warriors, and able muſicians. They thought themſelves more ancient than the moon. Pan the god of ſhepherds chiefly lived among them.—Ariſtotle 4, de met. ſays, that the wine of Arcadia, when placed in a goat's ſkin, near a fire, will become chalky, and at laſt be turned into ſalt. Strab. 8.—Plin. 4, c. 6.—Pauſ. 8, c. 4.—Athen. 14.——A fortified village of Zacynthus.

ARCADIUS, eldeſt ſon of Theodoſius the Great, ſucceeded his father A. D. 395. Under him the Roman power was divided into the eaſtern and weſtern empire. He made the eaſtern empire his choice, and fixed his reſidence at Conſtantinople; while his brother Honorius was made emperor of the weſt, and lived in Rome. After this ſeparation of the Roman empire, the two powers looked upon one another with indifference; and ſoon after, their indifference was changed into jealouſy, and contributed to haſten their mutual ruin. In the reign of Arcadius, Alaricus attacked the weſtern empire, and plundered Rome. Arcadius married Eudoxia, a bold ambitious woman, and died in the 31ſt year of his age, after a reign of 13 years, in which he bore the character of an effeminate prince, who ſuffered himſelf to be governed by favorites, and who abandoned his ſubjects to the tyranny of miniſters, while he loſt himſelf in the pleaſures of a voluptuous court.

ARCĀNUM, a villa of Cicero's, near the Minturni. Cic. 7, ep. ad Att. 10.

ARCAS, a ſon of Jupiter and Calliſto. He nearly killed his mother, whom Juno had changed into a bear. He reigned in Pelaſgia, which from him was called Arcadia, and taught his ſubjects agriculture and the art of ſpinning wool. After his death, Jupiter made him a conſtellation, with his mother. As he was one day hunting, he met a wood-nymph, who begged his aſſiſtance, becauſe the tree over which ſhe preſided, and on whoſe preſervation her life depended, was going to be carried away by the impetuous torrent of a river. Arcas changed the courſe of the waters, and preſerved the tree, and married the nymph, by whom he had three ſons, Azan, Aphidas, and Elatus, among whom he divided his kingdom. The deſcendants of Azan planted colonies in Phrygia. Aphidas received for his ſhare, Tegea, which on that account has been called the inheritance of Aphidas; and Elatus became maſter of mount Cylene, and ſome time after paſſed into Phocis. Pauſ. 8, c. 4.—Hygin. fab. 155 & 176.—Apollod. 3, c. 8.—Strab. 8.—Ovid. Faſt. 1, v. 470.

ARCĒNA, a town of Phœnicia, where Alexander Severus was born.

ARCENS, a Sicilian who permitted his ſon to accompany Æneas into Italy, where he was killed by Mezentius. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 581, &c.

ARCESILĀUS, ſon of Battus, king of Cyrene, was driven from his kingdom in a ſedition, and died B. C. 575. The ſecond of that name, died B. C. 550. Polyæn. 8, c. 41.—Herodot. 4, c. 159.——One of Alexander's generals, who obtained Meſopotamia at the general diviſion of the provinces after the king's death.—A chief of Catana, which he betrayed to Dionyſius the elder. Diod. 14.——A philoſopher of Pitane in Æolia, diſciple of Polemon. He viſited Sardes and Athens, and was the founder of the middle academy, as Socrates founded the ancient, and Carneades the new one. He

He pretended to know nothing, and accuſed others of the ſame ignorance. He acquired many pupils in the character of teacher; but ſome of him left them for Epicurus, though no Epicurean came to him; which gave him occaſion to ſay, that it is eaſy to make an eunuch of a man, but impoſſible to make a man of an eunuch. He was very fond of Homer, and generally divided his time among the pleaſures of philoſophy, love, reading, and the table. He died in his 75th year, B. C. 241, or 300 according to ſome. Diog. in vitâ.—Perſius 3, v. 78.—Cic. de Finib.——A painter. Pauſ.——A comic and elegiac poet.

ARCĒSIUS, ſon of Jupiter, ſaid to be grandfather to Ulyſſes. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 144.

ARCHÆA, a city of Æolia.

ARCHÆĂNAX of Mitylene, was intimate with Piſiſtratus tyrant of Athens. He fortified Sigæum with a wall from the ruins of ancient Troy. Strab. 13.

ARCHÆATĪDAS, a country of Peloponneſus. Polyb.

ARCHĂGĂTHUS, ſon of Archagathus, was ſlain in Africa by his ſoldiers, B. C. 285. He killed his grandfather Agathocles, tyrant of Syracuſe. Diod. 20.—Juſtin. 22, c. 5, &c. ſays, that he was put to death by Archeſilaus.—A phyſician at Rome, B. C. 219.

ARCHANDER, father-in-law to Danaus. Herodot. 2, c. 98.

ARCHANDROS, a town of Egypt.

ARCHE, one of the Muſes according to Cicero.

ARCHEGĒTES, a ſirname of Hercules.

ARCHELĀUS, a name common to ſome kings of Cappadocia. One of them was conquered by Sylla, for aſſiſting Mithridates.——A perſon of that name married Berenice, and made himſelf king of Egypt; a dignity he enjoyed only ſix months, as he was killed by the ſoldiers of Gabinius, B. C. 56. He had been made prieſt of Comana by Pompey. His grandſon was made king of Cappadocia by Antony, whom he aſſiſted at Actium, and he maintained his independence under Auguſtus, till Tiberius perfidiouſly deſtroyed him.——A king of Macedonia, who ſucceeded his father Perdiccas the ſecond; as he was but a natural child, he killed the legitimate heirs, to gain the kingdom. He proved himſelf to be a great monarch; but he was at laſt killed by one of his favorites, becauſe he had promiſed him his daughter in marriage, and given her to another, after a reign of 23 years. He patronized the poet Euripides. Diod. 14.—Juſtin. 7, c. 4.—Ælian. V. H. 2, 8, 12, 14.——A king of the Jews, ſirnamed Herod. He married Glaphyre, daughter of Archelaus king of Macedonia, and widow of his brother Alexander. Cæſar baniſhed him, for his cruelties, to Vienna, where he died. Dio.——A king of Lacedæmon, ſon of Ageſilaus. He reigned 42 years with Charilaus, of the other branch of the family. Herodot. 7, c. 204.—Pauſ. 3, c. 2.——A general of Antigonus the younger, appointed governor of the Acrocorinth, with the philoſopher Perſæus. Polyæn. 6, c. 5.——A celebrated general of Mithridates, againſt Sylla. Id. 8, c. 9——A philoſopher of Athens or Meſſenia, ſon of Apollodorus, and ſucceſſor to Anaxagoras. He was preceptor to Socrates, and was called Phyſicus. He ſuppoſed that heat and cold were the principles of all things. He firſt diſcovered the voice to be propagated by the vibration of the air. Cic. Tuſc. 5.—Diog. in vitâ.—Auguſtin. de civ. Dei. 8.——A man ſet over Suſa by Alexander, with a garriſon of 3000 men. Curt. 5, c. 2.——A Greek philoſopher, who wrote a hiſtory of animals, and maintained that goats breathed not through the noſtrils but through the ears. Plin. 8, c. 50.——A ſon of Electryon and Anaxo. Apollod. 2.——A Greek poet, who wrote epigrams. Varro. de R. R.——A ſculptor of Priene, in the age of Claudius. He made an apotheoſis of Homer, a piece of ſculpture highly admired, and ſaid to have been diſcovered under ground A. D. 1658.——A writer of Thrace.

ARCHEMĂCHUS, a Greek writer, who publiſhed an hiſtory of Eubœa. Athen. 6.——A ſon of Hercules——of Priam, Apollod. 2 & 3.

ARCHEMŎRUS, or Opheltes, ſon of Lycurgus, king of Nemæa, in Thrace, by Eurydice, was brought up by Hypſipyle, queen of Lemnos, who had fled to Thrace, and was employed as a nurſe in the king's family. Hypſipyle was met by the army of Adraſtus, who was going againſt Thebes; and ſhe was forced to ſhew them a fountain where they might quench their thirſt. To do this more expeditiouſly, ſhe put down the child on the graſs, and at her return found him killed by a ſerpent. The Greeks were ſo afflicted at this misfortune, that they inſtituted games in honor of Archemorus, which were called Nemæan, and king Adraſtus inliſted among the combatants, and was victorious. Apollod. 2 & 3.—Pauſ. 8, c. 48.—Stat. Theb. 6.

ARCHEPŎLIS, a man in Alexander's army who conſpired againſt the king with Dymnus. Curt. 6, c. 7.

ARCHEPTOLĔMUS, ſon of Iphitus, king of Elis, went to the Trojan war, and fought againſt the Greeks. As he was fighting near Hector, he was killed by Ajax son of Telamon. It is said that he re-established the Olympic games. Homer. Il. 8, v. 128.

ARCHESTRĂTUS, a tragic poet, whose pieces were acted during the Peloponnesian war. Plut. in Arist.——A man so small and lean, that he could be placed in a dish without filling it, though it contained no more than an obolus.—A follower of Epicurus, who wrote a poem in commendation of gluttony.

ARCHIA, one of the Oceanides, wife to Inachus. Hygin. fab. 143.

ARCHIAS, a Corinthian descended from Hercules. He founded Syracuse, B. C. 732. Being told by an oracle to make choice of health or riches, he chose the latter. Dionys. Hal. 2.——A poet of Antioch, intimate with the Luculli. He obtained the rank and name of a Roman citizen by the means of Cicero, who defended him in an elegant oration, when his enemies had disputed his privileges of citizen of Rome. He wrote a poem on the Cimbrian war, and began another concerning Cicero's consulship, which are now lost. Some of his epigrams are preserved in the Anthologia. Cic. pro Arch.——A Polemarch of Thebes, assassinated in the conspiracy of Pelopidas, which he could have prevented, if he had not deferred to the morrow the reading of a letter which he had received from Archias the Athenian high-priest, and which gave him information of his danger. Plut. in Pelop.——A high priest of Athens, contemporary and intimate with the Polemarch of the same name. Id. ibid——A Theban taken in the act of adultery, and punished according to the law, and tied to a post in the public place, for which punishment he abolished the Oligarchy. Aristot.

ARCHIBIĂDES, a philosopher of Athens, very inimical to the views and measures of Phocion. Plut. in Phoc.——An ambassador of Byzantium, &c. Polyæn. 4, c. 44.

ARCHIBIUS, the son of the geographer Ptolemy.

ARCHIDAMIA, a priestess of Ceres, who, on account of her affection for Aristomenes, restored him to liberty when he had been taken prisoner by her female attendants at the celebration of their festivals. Pauf. 4, c. 17.——A daughter of Cleadas, who, upon hearing that her countrymen the Spartans, were debating whether they should send away their women, against the hostile approach of Pyrrhus, seized a sword, and ran to the senate house, exclaiming that the women were as able to fight as the men. Upon this the decree was repealed. Plut. in Pyrr.—Polyæn. 8, c. 8.

ARCHĪDĀMUS, son of Theopompus, king of Sparta, died before his father. Pauf.—Another, king of Sparta, son of Anaxidamus, succeeded by Agasicles.——Another, son of Agesilaus, of the family of the Proclidæ.——Another, grandson of Leotychidas, by his son Zeuxidamus. He succeeded his grandfather, and reigned in conjunction with Pliston anax. He conquered the Argives and Arcadians, and privately assisted the Phocians in plundering the temple of Delphi. He was called to the aid of Tarentum against the Romans, and killed there in a battle, after a reign of 33 years. Diod. 16.—Xenoph.——Another, son of Eudamidas.——Another, who conquered the Helots, after a violent earthquake. Diod. 11.——A son of Agesilaus, who led the Spartan auxiliaries to Cleombrotus at the battle of Leuctra, and was killed in a battle against the Lucanians, B. C. 338.——A son of Xenius Theopompus. Pauf.

ARCHĪDAS, a tyrant of Athens, killed by his troops.

ARCHIDEMUS, a Stoic philosopher, who willingly exiled himself among the Parthians. Plut. de exil.

ARCHIDĒUS, a son of Amyntas, king of Macedonia. Justin. 7, c. 4.

ARCHIDIUM, a city of Crete, named after Archidius son of Tegeates. Pauf. 8, c. 53.

ARCHIGALLUS, the chief of the priests of Cybele.

ARCHIGĔNES, a physician, born at Apamea, in Syria. He lived in the reign of Domitian, Nerva, and Trajan, and died in the 73d year of his age. He wrote a treatise on adorning the hair, as also ten books on fevers. Juv. 6, v. 235.

ARCHILŎCHUS, a poet of Paros, who wrote elegies, satyrs, odes, and epigrams, and was the first who introduced iambics in his verses. He had courted Neobule, the daughter of Lycambes, and had received promises of marriage; but the father gave her to another, superior to the poet in rank and fortune; upon which Archilochus wrote such a bitter satyr, that Lycambes hanged himself in a fit of despair. The Spartans condemned his verses on account of their petulance, and banished him. He flourished 685 B. C. and it is said that he was assassinated. Some fragments of his poetry remain, which display vigor and animation, boldness and vehemence in the highest degree; from which reason, perhaps Cicero calls virulent edicts, Archilochia edicta. Cic. Tusc. 1.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Herodot.

1, c. 12.—Horat. art. poet. v. 79.—Athen. 1, 2, &c.—A ſon of Neſtor, killed by Memnon in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2.——A Greek hiſtorian who wrote a chronological table, and other works.

ARCHIMĒDES, a famous geometrician of Syracuſe, who invented a machine of glaſs that faithfully repreſented the motion of all the heavenly bodies. When Marcellus, the Roman conſul, beſieged Syracuſe, Archimedes conſtructed machines which ſuddenly raiſed up in the air the ſhips of the enemy from the bay before the city, and then let them fall with ſuch violence into the water that they ſunk. He ſet them alſo on fire with his burning glaſſes. When the town was taken, the Roman general gave ſtrict orders to his ſoldiers not to hurt Archimedes, and even offered a reward to him who ſhould bring him alive and ſafe into his preſence. All theſe precautions were uſeleſs: the philoſopher was ſo deeply engaged in ſolving a problem, that he was even ignorant that the enemy were in poſſeſſion of the town; and a ſoldier, without knowing who he was, killed him, becauſe he refuſed to follow him, B. C. 212. Marcellus raiſed a monument over him, and placed upon it a cylinder and a ſphere; but the place remained long unknown, till Cicero, during his queſtorſhip in Sicily, found it near one of the gates of Syracuſe, ſurrounded with thorns and brambles. Some ſuppoſe that Archimedes raiſed the ſite of the towns and villages of Egypt, and began thoſe mounds of earth by means of which communication is kept from town to town during the inundations of the Nile. The ſtory of his burning glaſſes had always appeared fabulous to ſome of the moderns, till the experiments of Buffon demonſtrated it beyond contradiction. Theſe celebrated glaſſes were ſuppoſed to be reflectors made of metal, and capable of producing their effect at the diſtance of a bow ſhot. The manner in which he diſcovered how much braſs a goldſmith had mixed with gold in making a golden crown for the king, is well known to every modern hydroſtatic, as well as the pumping ſcrew which ſtill bears his name. Among the wild ſchemes of Archimedes, is his ſaying, that, by means of his machines, he could move the earth with eaſe, if placed on a fixed ſpot near it. Many of his works are extant, eſpecially treatiſes de ſphæra & cylindro, circuli dimenſio, de lineis ſpiralibus, de quadratura paraboles, de numero arenæ, &c. the beſt edition of which is that of David Rivaltius, fol. Paris, 1615. Cic. Tuſc. 1, c. 25. De Nat. D. 2, c. 34.—Liv. 24, c. 34.—Quintil. 1, c. 10.—Vitruv. 9, c. 3.—Polyb. 7.—Plut. in Marcell.—Val. Max. 8, c. 7.

ARCHĪNUS, a man who, when he was appointed to diſtribute new arms among the populace of Argos, raiſed a mercenary band, and made himſelf abſolute. Polyæn. 3, c. 8.——A rhetorician of Athens.

ARCHIPELĂGUS, a part of a ſea where a great number of iſlands are interſperſed, ſuch as that part of the Mediterranean which lies between Greece and Aſia Minor, and is generally called Mare Ægeum.

ARCHIPŎLIS, a ſoldier who conſpired againſt Alexander with Dymnus. Curt. 6, c. 7.

ARCHIPPE, a city of the Marſi, deſtroyed by an earthquake, and loſt in the lake of Fucinus. Plin. 3, c. 19.

ARCHIPPUS, a king of Italy, from whom perhaps the town of Archippe received its name. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 752.——A philoſopher of Thebes, pupil to Pythagoras.——An archon at Athens.——A comic poet of Athens, of whoſe 8 comedies only one obtained the prize.——A philoſopher in the age of Trajan.

ARCHĪTIS, a name of Venus, worſhipped on mount Libanus.

ARCHON, one of Alexander's generals, who received the provinces of Babylon, at the general diviſion after the king's death. Diod. 18.

ARCHONTES, the name of the chief magiſtrates of Athens. They were nine in number, and none were choſen but ſuch as were deſcended from anceſtors who had been free citizens of the republic for three generations. They were alſo to be without deformity in all the parts and members of their body, and were obliged to produce teſtimonies of their dutiful behaviour to their parents, of the ſervices they had rendered their country, and the competency of their fortune to ſupport their dignity. They took a ſolemn oath, that they would obſerve the laws, adminiſter juſtice with impartiality, and never ſuffer themſelves to be corrupted. If they ever received bribes, they were compelled by the laws to dedicate to the god of Delphi, a ſtatue of gold, of equal weight with their body. They all had the power of puniſhing malefactors with death. The chief among them was called Archon, the year took its denomination from him; he determined all cauſes between man and wife, and took care of legacies and wills; he provided for orphans, protected the injured, and puniſhed drunkenneſs with uncommon ſeverity. If he ſuffered himſelf to be intoxicated during the time of his office, the miſdemeanor was puniſhed with death. The ſecond of the archons was called Baſileus; it was his office to keep good order, and to remove all cauſes of quarrel in the families of thoſe who were dedicated to the ſervice of the gods.

gods. The profane and the impious were brought before his tribunal; and he offered public ſacrifices for the good of the ſtate. He aſſiſted at the celebration of the Eleuſinian feſtivals, and other religious ceremonies. His wife was to be related to the whole people of Athens, and of a pure and unſullied life. He had a vote among the Areopagites, but was obliged to ſit among them without his crown. The Polemarch was another archon of inferior dignity. He had the care of all foreigners, and provided a ſufficient maintenance, from the public treaſury, for the families of thoſe who had loſt their lives in the defence of their country. Theſe three chief archons generally choſe each of them two perſons of reſpectable character, and of an advanced age, whoſe counſels and advice might aſſiſt and ſupport them in their public capacity. The ſix other archons were indiſtinctly called Theſmothetæ, and received complaints againſt perſons accuſed of impiety, bribery, and ill behaviour. They ſettled all diſputes between the citizens, redreſſed the wrongs of ſtrangers, and forbade any laws to be enforced, but ſuch as were conducive to the ſafety of the ſtate. Theſe officers of ſtate were choſen after the death of king Codrus; their power was originally for life, but afterwards it was limited to 10 years, and at laſt to one year. After ſome time, the qualifications which were required to be an archon were not ſtrictly obſerved. Adrian, before he was elected emperor of Rome, was made archon at Athens, though a foreigner; and the ſame honors were conferred upon Plutarch. The perpetual archons, after the death of Codrus, were Medon, whoſe office began B. C. 1070; Acaſtus, 1050; Archippus, 1014; Theriſippus, 995; Phorbas, 954; Megacles, 923; Diognetus, 893; Pherecles, 865; Ariphron, 846; Theſpieus, 826; Agameſtor, 799; Æſchylus, 778; Alcmæon, 756; after whoſe death the archons were decennial, the firſt of whom was Charops, who began 753; Æſimedes, 744; Clidicus, 734; Hippomenes, 724; Leocrates, 714; Apſander, 704; Eryxias, 694; after whom the office became annual, and of theſe annual archons Creon was the firſt. *Ariſtoph. in Nub. & Avib.—Plut. ARCHŸLUS THURIUS, a general of Dionyſius the elder. Diod. 14.

ARCHŸTAS, a muſician of Mitylene, who wrote a treatiſe on agriculture. Diog.—— The ſon of Heſtiæus of Tarentum, was a follower of the Pythagorean philoſophy, and an able aſtronomer and geometrician. He redeemed his maſter, Plato, from the hands of the tyrant Dionyſius, and for his virtues, he was ſeven times choſen, by his fellow citizens, governor of Tarentum. He invented ſome mathematical inſtruments, and made a wooden pigeon which could fly. He periſhed in a ſhipwreck, about 394 years before the Chriſtian era. He is alſo the reputed inventor of the ſcrew and the pulley. A fragment of his writings has been preſerved by Porphyry. Horat. 1, od. 28.—Cic. 3, de Orat.—Diog. in vit.

ARCĬTĔNENS, an epithet applied to Apollo, from his bearing a bow, with which, as ſoon as born, he deſtroyed the ſerpent Python. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 75.

ARCTĪNUS, a Mileſian poet, ſaid to be pupil to Homer. Dionyſ. Hal. 1.

ARCTOPHŸLAX, a ſtar near the great bear, called alſo Bootes. Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 42.

ARCTOS, a mountain near Propontis, inhabited by giants and monſters.——Two celeſtial conſtellations near the north pole, commonly called Urſa Major and Minor, ſuppoſed to be Arcas and his mother, who were made conſtellations. Virg. G. 1.—Aratus.—Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 107.

ARCTŪRUS, a ſtar near the tail of the great bear, whoſe riſing and ſetting was generally ſuppoſed to portend great tempeſts. Horat. 3, od. 1. The name is derived from its ſituation, αρκτος urſus, ουρα cauda. It riſes now about the beginning of October, and Pliny tells us it roſe in his age on the 12th, or, according to Columella, on the 5th of September.

ARDĂLUS, a ſon of Vulcan, ſaid to have been the firſt who invented the pipe. He gave it to the Muſes, who on that account have been called Ardalides, and Ardaliotides. Pauſ. 2, c. 31.

ARDANIA, a country of Egypt. Strab.

ARDAXĀNUS, a ſmall river of Illyricum. Polyb.

ARDEA, formerly Ardua, a town of Latium, built by Danae, or according to ſome, by a ſon of Ulyſſes and Circe. It was the capital of the Rutuli. Some ſoldiers ſet it on fire, and the inhabitants publicly reported, that their city had been changed into a bird, called by the Latins Ardea. It was rebuilt, and it became a rich and magnificent city, whoſe enmity to Rome rendered it famous. Tarquin the Proud was preſſing it with a ſiege, when his ſon raviſhed Lucretia. C. Nep. in Attic. 14.—Liv. 1, c. 57. l. 3, c. 71. l. 4, c. 9, &c.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 412.—Ovid. Met. 1, fab. 573.—Strab. 5.

ARDERICCA, a ſmall town on the Euphrates, north of Babylon.

ARDIÆI, a town of Illyricum, whoſe capital was called Ardia. Strab. 7.

ARDONEA, a town of Apulia. Liv. 24, c. 20.

ARDUENNA,

ARDUENNA, a large foreſt of Gaul, in the time of J. Cæſar, which extended 50 miles from the Rhine to the borders of the Nervii. Tacit. 8. Ann. c. 42.—Cæſ. bell. Gall. 6, c. 29.

ARDUINE, the goddeſs of hunting among the Gauls.

ARDYENSES, a nation near the Rhone, Polyb. 3.

ARDYS, a ſon of Gyges, king of Lydia, who reigned 49 years, took Priene, and made war againſt Miletus. Herodot. 1, c. 15.

AREACIDÆ, a nation of Numidia. Polyb.

AREAS, a general choſen by the Greeks againſt Ætolia. Juſtin. 24, c. 1.

ARELĀTUM, a town of Gallia Narbonenſis. Strab. 4.—Mela. 2, c. 5.

ARELLIUS, a celebrated painter of Rome, in the age of Auguſtus. He painted the goddeſſes in the form of his miſtreſſes. Plin. 35, c. 10.——A miſer in Horat.

AREMORĬCA, a part of Gaul, which afterwards received the name of Aquitania. Plin. 4.

ARĒNA & Arene, a city of Meſſenia, in Peloponneſus. Homer. Il. 2.

ARENĂCUM, a town of Germany. Tacit. Hiſt. 5, c. 20.

AREOPAGĪTÆ, the judges of the Areopagus, a ſeat of juſtice on a ſmall eminence near Athens, whoſe name is derived from ἄρεως πάγος, the hill of Mars, becauſe Mars was the firſt who was tried there, for the murder of Hallirhotius, who had offered violence to his daughter Alcippe. Some ſay that the place received the name of Areopagus, becauſe the Amazons pitched their camp there, and offered ſacrifices to their progenitor Mars, when they beſieged Athens; and others maintain, that the name was given to the place, becauſe Mars is the god of bloodſhed, war and murder, which were generally puniſhed by that court. The time in which this celebrated ſeat of juſtice was inſtituted, is unknown. Some ſuppoſe that Cecrops, the founder of Athens, firſt eſtabliſhed it, while others give the credit of it to Cranaus, and others to Solon. The number of judges that compoſed this auguſt aſſembly, is not known. They have been limited by ſome to 9, to 31, to 51, and ſometimes to a greater number. The moſt worthy and religious of the Athenians were admitted as members, and ſuch archons as had diſcharged their duty with care and faithfulneſs. In the latter ages of the republic, this obſervance was often violated, and we find ſome of their members of looſe and debauched morals. If any of them was convicted of immorality, if they were ſeen ſitting at a tavern, or had uſed any indecent language, they were immediately expelled from the aſſembly, and held in the greateſt diſgrace, though the dignity of a judge of the Areopagus always was for life. The Areopagites took cognizance of murders, impiety, and immoral behaviour, and particularly of idleneſs, which they deemed the cauſe of all vice. They watched over the laws, and they had the management of the public treaſury; they had the liberty of rewarding the virtuous, and of inflicting ſevere puniſhment upon ſuch as blaſphemed againſt the gods, or ſlighted the celebration of the holy myſteries. They always ſat in the open air, becauſe they took cognizance of murder; and by their laws, it was not permitted for the murderer and his accuſer to be both under the ſame roof. This cuſtom alſo might originate becauſe the perſons of the judges were ſacred, and they were afraid of contracting pollution by converſing in the ſame houſe with men who had been guilty of ſhedding innocent blood. They always heard cauſes and paſſed ſentence in the night, that they might not be prepoſſeſſed in favor of the plaintiff or of the defendant by ſeeing them. Whatever cauſes were pleaded before them, were to be diveſted of all oratory and fine ſpeaking, leſt eloquence ſhould charm their ears, and corrupt their judgment. Hence aroſe the moſt juſt and moſt impartial deciſions, and their ſentence was deemed ſacred and inviolable, and the plaintiff and defendant were equally convinced of its juſtice. The Areopagites generally ſat on the 27th, 28th and 29th day of every month. Their authority continued in its original ſtate, till Pericles, who was refuſed admittance among them, reſolved to leſſen their conſequence, and deſtroy their power. From that time the morals of the Athenians were corrupted, and the Areopagites were no longer conſpicuous for their virtue and juſtice; and when they cenſured the debaucheries of Demetrius, one of the family of Phalereus, he plainly told them, that if they wiſhed to make a reform in Athens, they muſt begin at home.

AREOPĂGUS, a hill in the neighbourhood of Athens. Vid. Areopagitæ.

ARESTÆ, a people of India, conquered by Alexander. Juſtin. 12, c. 8.

ARESTHANAS, a countryman, whoſe goat ſuckled Æſculapius, when expoſed by his mother. Pauſ. 2, c. 26.

ARESTORĬDES, a patronymic given to the hundred-eyed Argus, as ſon of Areſtor. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 584.

ARĔTA, the mother of Ariſtippus the philoſopher. Laert. 2.——A daughter of Dionyſius, who married Dion. She was thrown thrown into the ſea. Plut. in Dion.——A female philoſopher of Cyrene, B. C. 377.——A daughter of Rhexenor, deſcended from Neptune, who married her uncle Alcinous, by whom ſhe had Nauſicaa. Homer Od. 7 & 8.—Apollod. 1.

ARETÆUS, a phyſician of Cappadocia, very inquiſitive after the operations of nature. His treatiſe on agues has been much admired. The beſt edition of his works which are extant, is that of Boerhaave, L. Bat. fol. 1735.

ARETAPHĬLA, the wife of Melanippus, prieſt of Cyrene. Nicocrates murdered her huſband to marry her. She, however, was ſo attached to Melanippus, that ſhe endeavoured to poiſon Nicocrates, and at laſt cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated by his brother Lyſander, whom ſhe married. Lyſander proved as cruel as his brother, upon which Aretaphila ordered him to be thrown into the ſea. After this ſhe retired to a private ſtation. Plut. de Virtut. Mulier.—Polyæn. 8, c. 38.

ARETĀLES, a Cnidian, who wrote an hiſtory of Macedonia, beſides a treatiſe on iſlands. Plut.

ARĒTE. Vid. Areta.

ARĒTES, one of Alexander's officers. Curt. 4, c. 15.

ARETHŪSA, a nymph of Elis, daughter of Oceanus, and one of Diana's attendants. As ſhe returned one day from hunting, ſhe ſat near the Alpheus, and bathed in the ſtream. The god of the river was enamoured of her, and he purſued her over the mountains and all the country, when Arethuſa, ready to ſink under fatigue, implored Diana, who changed her into a fountain. The Alpheus immediately mingled his ſtreams with hers, and Diana opened a ſecret paſſage under the earth and under the ſea, where the waters of Arethuſa diſappeared, and roſe in the iſland of Ortygia, near Syracuſe in Sicily. The river Alpheus followed her alſo under the ſea, and roſe alſo in Ortygia; ſo that, as mythologiſts relate, whatever is thrown into the Alpheus in Elis, riſes again, after ſome time, in the fountain Arethuſa near Syracuſe. Vid. Alpheus.—Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 10.—Athen. 7.——Pauſ.—One of the Heſperides. Apollod. 2, c. 5.——A daughter of Herileus, mother of Abas, by Neptune. Hygin. fab. 157.——One of Actæon's dogs. Hygin. fab. 181.——A lake of upper Armenia, near the fountains of the Tigris. Nothing can ſink under its waters. Plin. 2, c. 103.

ARETĪNUM, a Roman colony in Etruria. Ital. 5. v. 123.

ARĒTUS, a ſon of Neſtor and Anaxibia. Homer. Od. 3.——A Trojan againſt the Greeks. He was killed by Automedon. Homer. Il. 17.——A famous warrior, whoſe only weapon was an iron club. He was treacherouſly killed by Lycurgus, king of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 11.

AREUS, a king of Sparta, preferred in the ſucceſſion to Cleonymus, brother of Acrotatus, who had made an alliance with Pyrrhus. He aſſiſted Athens when Antigonus beſieged it, and died at Corinth. Pauſ. 3, c. 6.—Plut.——A king of Sparta, who ſucceeded his father Acrotatus 2d, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Leonidas, ſon of Cleonymus.——A philoſopher of Alexandria, intimate with Auguſtus. Sueton.——A poet of Laconia.——An orator mentioned by Quintil.

ARGÆUS & ARGĒUS, a ſon of Apollo and Cyrene. Juſtin. 13, c. 7.——A ſon of Perdiccas, who ſucceeded his father in the kingdom of Macedonia. Juſtin. 7, c. 1.——A mountain of Cappadocia, covered with perpetual ſnows, at the bottom of which is the capital of the country called Maxara. Claudian.——A ſon of Ptolemy, killed by his brother. Pauſ. 1.——A ſon of Lycymnius. Apollod. 2.

ARGĂLUS, a king of Sparta, ſon of Amyclas. Pauſ. 3, c. 1.

ARGATHŌNA, a huntreſs of Cios in Bithynia, whom Rheſus married before he went to the Trojan war. When ſhe heard of his death, ſhe died in deſpair. Parthen. Erotic. c. 36.

ARGATHŌNIUS, a king of Tarteſſus, who, according to Plin. 7, c. 48, lived 120 years, and 300 according to Ital. 3, v. 396.

ARGE, a beautiful huntreſs, changed into a ſtag by Apollo. Hygin. fab. 205.——One of the Cyclops. Heſiod.——A daughter of Theſpius, by whom Hercules had two ſons. Apollod. 2.——A nymph, daughter of Jupiter and Juno. Apollod. 1.

ARGEA, a place at Rome, where certain Argives were buried.

ARGÆĀTHÆ, a village of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 23.

ARGENNUM, a promontory of Ionia.

ARGES, a ſon of Cœlus and Terra, who had only one eye in his forehead. Apollod. 1, c. 1.

ARGESTRĂTUS, a king of Lacedæmon, who reigned 35 years.

ARGĒUS, a ſon of Perdiccas, king of Macedonia, who obtained the kingdom when Amyntas was depoſed by the Illyrians. Juſtin. 7, c. 2.

ARGI, (plur. maſc.) Vid. Argos.

ARGĪA, daughter of Adraſtus, married Polynices, whom ſhe loved with uncommon tenderneſs. When he was killed in the war, ſhe buried his body in the night, againſt the poſitive orders of Creon, for which pious action ſhe was puniſhed with death. Theſeus ARGINŪSÆ, three ſmall iſlands near the continent between Mitylene and Methymna, where the Lacedæmonian fleet was conquered by Conon the Athenian. Strab. 13.

ARGIŎPE, a nymph of mount Parnaſſus.

ARGIPHONTES, a ſirname given to Mercury, becauſe he killed the hundred-eyed Argus, by order of Jupiter.

ARGIPPĒI, a nation among the Sauromatians, born bald, and with flat noſes. They lived upon trees. Herodot. 4, c. 23.

ARGĪVA, a ſirname of Juno, worſhipped at Argos. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 547.

ARGĪVI, the inhabitants of the city of Argos and the neighbouring country. The word is indiſcriminately applied by the poets to all the inhabitants of Greece.

ARGIUS, a ſteward of Galba, who privately interred the body of his maſter in his gardens. Tacit. Hiſt. 1, c. 49.

ARGO, the name of the famous ſhip which carried Jaſon and his 54 companions to Colchis, when they reſolved to recover the golden fleece. The derivation of the word Argo has been often diſputed. Some derive it from Argos, the perſon who firſt propoſed the expedition, and who built the ſhip. Others maintain that it was built at Argos, whence its name. Cicero, Tuſc. 1, c. 20, calls it Argo, becauſe it carried Grecians, commonly called Argives. Diod. 4, derives the word from αργος, which ſignifies ſwift. Ptolemy ſays, but falſely, that Hercules built the ſhip, and called it Argo, after a ſon of Jaſon, who bore the ſame name. The ſhip Argo had 50 oars. According to many authors, ſhe had a beam on her prow, cut in the foreſt of Dodona by Minerva, which had the power of giving oracles to the Argonauts. This ſhip was the firſt that ever ſailed on the ſea, as ſome report. After the expedition was finiſhed, Jaſon ordered her to be drawn a ground at the Iſthmus of Corinth, and conſecrated to the god of the ſea. The poets have made her a conſtellation in heaven. Jaſon was killed by a beam which fell from the top, as he ſlept on the ground near it. Hygin. fab. 14. A. P. 2, c. 37.—Catull. De Nupt. Pel. & Thet.—*Val. ARGOLĬCUS SINUS, a bay on the coaſt of Argolis.

ARGŎLIS and ARGIA, a country of Peloponneſus between Arcadia and the Ægean ſea. Its chief city was called Argos.

ARGON, one of the deſcendants of Hercules, who reigned in Lydia 505 years before Gyges. Herodot. 1, c. 7.

ARGONAUTÆ, a name given to thoſe ancient heroes who went with Jaſon on board the ſhip Argo to Colchis, about 79 years before the taking of Troy, or 1263 B. C. The cauſes of this expedition aroſe from the following circumſtance:—Athamas, king of Thebes, had married Ino, the daughter of Cadmus, whom he divorced to marry Nephele, by whom he had two children, Phryxus and Helle. As Nephele was ſubject to certain fits of madneſs, Athamas repudiated her, and took a ſecond time Ino, by whom he had ſoon after two ſons, Learchus and Melicerta. As the children of Nephele were to ſucceed to their father by right of birth, Ino conceived an immortal hatred againſt them, and ſhe cauſed the city of Thebes to be viſited by a peſtilence, by poiſoning all the grain which had been ſown in the earth. Upon this the oracle was conſulted; and as it had been corrupted by means of Ino, the anſwer was, that Nephele's children ſhould be immolated to the gods. Phryxus was apprized of this, and he immediately embarked with his ſiſter Helle, and fled to the court of Æetes, king of Colchis, one of his near relations. In the voyage Helle died, and Phryxus arrived ſafe at Colchis, and was received with kindneſs by the king. The poets have embelliſhed the flight of Phryxus, by ſuppoſing that he and Helle fled through the air on a ram which had a golden fleece and wings, and was endowed with the faculties of ſpeech. This ram, as they ſay, was the offſpring of Neptune's amours, under the form of a ram, with the nymph Theophane. As they were going to be ſacrificed, the ram took them on his back, and inſtantly diſappeared in the air. On their way Helle was giddy, and fell into that part of the ſea which from her was called the Helleſpont. When Phryxus came to Colchis, he ſacrificed the ram to Jupiter, or, according to others, to Mars, to whom he alſo dedicated the golden fleece. He ſoon after married Chalciope the daughter of Æetes; but his father-in-law envied him the poſſeſſion of the golden fleece, and therefore, to obtain it, he murdered him. Some time after this event, when Jaſon, the ſon of Æſon, demanded of his uncle Pelias the crown which he uſurped [vid. Pelias, Jaſon, Æſon.] Pelias ſaid that he would reſtore it to him, provided he avenged the death of their common relation Phryxus, whom Æetes had baſely murdered in Colchis. Jaſon, who was in the vigor of youth, and of an ambitious ſoul, chearfully undertook the expedition, and embarked with all the young princes of Greece in the ſhip Argo. They ſtopped at the iſland of Lemnos, where they remained two years, and raiſed a new race of men from the Lemnian women who had murdered their huſbands. [Vid. Hypſipyle.] After they had left Lemnos, they viſited Samothrace, where they offered ſacrifices to the gods, and thence paſſed to Troas and to Cyzicum. Here they met with a favorable reception from Cyzicus the king of the country. The night after their departure, they were driven back by a ſtorm again on the coaſt of Cyzicum, and the inhabitants, ſuppoſing them to be their enemies the Pelaſgi, furiouſly attacked them. In this nocturnal engagement the ſlaughter was great, and Cyzicus was killed by the hand of Jaſon, who, to expiate the murder he had ignorantly committed, buried him in a magnificent manner, and offered a ſacrifice to the mother of the gods, to whom he built a temple on mount Dyndymus. From Cyzicum they viſited Bebrycia, otherwiſe called Bithynia, where Pollux accepted the challenge of Amycus king of the country, in the combat of the ceſtus, and ſlew him. They were driven from Bebrycia, by a ſtorm, to Salmydeſſa, on the coaſt of Thrace, where they delivered Phineus, king of the place, from the perſecution of the harpies. Phineus directed their courſe through the Cyanean rock or the Symplegades, [Vid. Cyaneæ.] and they ſafely entered the Euxine ſea. They viſited the country of the Mariandinians, where Lycus reigned, and loſt two of their companions, Idmon, and Tiphis their pilot. After they had left this coaſt, they were driven upon the iſland of Arecia, where they found the children of Phryxus, whom Æetes their grandfather had ſent to Greece to take poſſeſſion of their father's kingdom. From this iſland they at laſt arrived ſafe in Æa, the capital of Colchis. Jaſon explained the cauſes of his voyage to Æetes; but the conditions on which he was to recover the golden fleece, were ſo hard, that the Argonauts muſt have periſhed in the attempt, had not Medea, the king's daughter, fallen in love with their leader. She had a conference with Jaſon, and after mutual oaths of fidelity in the temple of Hecate, Medea pledged herſelf to deliver the Argonauts from her father's hard conditions, if Jaſon married her, and carried her with him to Greece. He was to tame two bulls, which had brazen feet and horns, and which vomited clouds of fire and ſmoke, and to tie them to a plough made of adamant ſtone, and to plough a field of two acres of ground never before cultivated. After this he was to ſow in the plain, the teeth of a dragon, from which an armed multitude were to riſe up, and to be all deſtroyed by his hands. This done, he was to kill an ever-watchful dragon, which was at the bottom of the tree, on which the golden fleece was ſuſpended. All theſe labors were to be performed in one day; and Medea's aſſiſtance, whoſe knowledge of herbs, magic and potions was unparalleled, eaſily extricated Jaſon from all danger, to the aſtoniſhment and terror of his companions, and of Æetes, and the people of Colchis, who had aſſembled to be ſpectators of this wonderful action. He tamed the bulls with eaſe, ploughed the field, ſowed the dragon's teeth, and when the armed men ſprang from the earth, he threw a ſtone in the midſt of them, and they immediately turned their weapons one againſt the other, till they all periſhed. After this he went to the dragon, and by means of enchanted herbs, and a draught which Medea had given him, he lulled the monſter to ſleep, and obtained the golden fleece, and immediately ſet ſail with Medea. He was ſoon purſued by Abſyrtus, the king's ſon, who came up to them, and was ſeized and murdered by Jaſon and Medea. The mangled limbs of Abſyrtus were ſtrewed in the way through which Æetes was to paſs, that his farther purſuit might be ſtopped. After the murder of Abſyrtus, they entered the Palus Mæotis, and by purſuing their courſe towards the left, according to the fooliſh account of poets who were ignorant of geography, they came to the iſland Peuceſtes, and to that of Circe. Here Circe informed Jaſon, that the cauſe of all his calamities aroſe from the murder of Abſyrtus, of which ſhe refuſed to expiate him. Soon after, they entered the Mediterranean by the columns of Hercules, and paſſed the ſtraits of Charybdis and Scylla, where they muſt have periſhed, had not Tethys, the miſtreſs of Peleus, one of the Argonauts, delivered them.

They

They were preſerved from the Sirens by the eloquence of Orpheus, and arrived in the iſland of the Phæacians, where they met the enemy's fleet, which had continued their purſuit by a different courſe. It was therefore reſolved, that Medea ſhould be reſtored, if ſhe had not been actually married to Jaſon; but the wife of Alcinous, the king of the country, being appointed umpire between the Colchians and Argonauts, had the marriage privately conſummated by night, and declared that the claims of Æetes to Medea were now void. From Phæacia the Argonauts came to the bay of Ambracia, whence they were driven by a ſtorm upon the coaſt of Africa, and after many diſaſters at laſt came in ſight of the promontory of Melea in the Peloponneſus, where Jaſon was purified of the murder of Abſyrtus, and ſoon after arrived ſafe in Theſſaly. The impracticability of ſuch a voyage is well known. Apollonius Rhodius gives another account, equally improbable. He ſays, that they ſailed from the Euxine up one of the mouths of the Danube, and that Abſyrtus purſued them by entering another mouth of the river. After they had continued their voyage for ſome leagues, the waters decreaſed, and they were obliged to carry the ſhip Argo acroſs the country to the Adriatic, upwards of 150 miles. Here they met with Abſyrtus, who had purſued the ſame meaſures, and conveyed his ſhips in like manner over the land. Abſyrtus was immediately put to death; and ſoon after, the beam of Dodona [Vid. Argo.] gave an oracle, that Jaſon ſhould never return home if he was not previouſly purified of the murder. Upon this they ſailed to the iſland of Æa, where Circe, who was the ſiſter of Æetes, expiated him without knowing who he was. There is a third tradition, which maintains, that they returned to Colchis a ſecond time, and viſited many places of Aſia. This famous expedition has been celebrated in the ancient ages of the world; it has employed the pen of many writers, and among the hiſtorians, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Apollodorus and Juſtin; and among the poets, Onamacritus, more generally called Orpheus, Apollonius Rhodius, Pindar, and Valerius Flaccus, have extenſively given an account of its moſt remarkable particulars. The number of the Argonauts is not exactly known; the following liſt is drawn from the various authors who have made mention of the Argonautic expedition. Jaſon, ſon of Æſon, as is well known, was the chief of the reſt. His companions were Acaſtus ſon of Pelias, Actor ſon of Hippaſus, Admetus ſon of Pheres, Æſculapius ſon of Apollo, Ætalides ſon of Mercury and Eupoleme, Almenus ſon of Mars, Amphiaraus ſon of Œcleus, Amphidamus ſon of Aleus, Amphion ſon of Hyperaſius, Anceus a ſon of Lycurgus, and another of the ſame name, Areus, Argus the builder of the ſhip Argo, Argus ſon of Phryxus, Armenus, Aſcalaphus ſon of Mars, Aſterion ſon of Cometes, Aſterius ſon of Neleus, Augeas ſon of Sol, Atalanta daughter of Schœneus, diſguiſed in a man's dreſs, Autolycus ſon of Mercury, Azorus, Buphagus, Butes ſon of Teleon, Calais ſon of Boreas, Canthus ſon of Abas, Caſtor ſon of Jupiter, Ceneus ſon of Elatus, Cepheus ſon of Aleus, Cius, Clytius and Iphitus ſons of Eurythus, Coronus, Deucalion ſon of Minos, Echion ſon of Mercury and Antianira, Ergynus ſon of Neptune, Euphemus ſon of Neptune and Macionaſſa, Eribotes, Euryalus ſon of Ciſteus, Eurydamas and Eurythion ſons of Iras, Eurytus ſon of Mercury, Glaucus, Hercules ſon of Jupiter, Idas ſon of Aphareus, Ialmenus ſon of Mars, Idmon ſon of Abas, Iolaus ſon of Iphiclus, Iphiclus ſon of Theſtius, Iphiclus ſon of Philacus, Iphis ſon of Alector, Lynceus ſon of Aphareus, Iritus ſon of Naubolus, Laertes ſon of Arceſius, Laocoon, Leodatus ſon of Bias, Leitus ſon of Alector, Meleager ſon of Œneus, Menœtius ſon of Actor, Mopſus ſon of Amphycus, Nauplius ſon of Neptune, Neleus the brother of Pelias, Neſtor ſon of Neleus, Oileus the father of Ajax, Orpheus ſon of Œager, Palemon ſon of Ætolus, Peleus and Telamon ſons of Æacus, Periclymenes ſon of Neleus, Peneleus ſon of Hipalmus, Philoctetes ſon of Pœan, Phlias, Pollux ſon of Jupiter, Polyphemus ſon of Elates, Pœas ſon of Thaumacus, Phanus ſon of Bacchus, Phalerus ſon of Alcon, Phocas and Priaſus ſons of Ceneus one of the Lapithæ, Talaus, Tiphys ſon of Aginus, Staphilus ſon of Bacchus, two of the name of Iphitus, Theſeus ſon of Ægeus, with his friend Pirithous. Among theſe Æſculapius was phyſician, and Tiphys was pilot.

ARGOS, (ſing. neut. & Argi, maſc. plur.) an ancient city, capital of Argolis in Peloponneſus, about two miles from the ſea, on the bay called Argolicus ſinus. Juno was the chief deity of the place. The kingdom of Argos was founded by Inachus, 1856 years before the Chriſtian era, and afterwards it was united to the crown of Mycenæ. Argos was built according to Euripides. Iphig. in Aulid. v. 152, 534, by ſeven Cyclops, who came from Syria. Theſe Cyclops were not Vulcan's workmen. The nine firſt kings of Argos were called Inachides, in honor of the founder. Their names were Inachus, Phoroneus, Apis, Argus, Chryaſus, Phorbas, Triopas, Stelenus and Gelanor. Gelanor gave a kind reception to Danaus, who drove him from his kingdom in return for his hoſpitality. The deſcendants of Danaus were called Belides. Agamemnon was king of Argos during the Trojan war; and 80 years years after, the Heraclidæ ſeized the Peloponneſus, and depoſed the monarchs. The inhabitants of Argos were called Argivi and Argolici; and this name has been often applied to all the Greeks, without diſtinction. Plin. 7, c. 56.—Pauſ. 2, c. 15, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 7.—Ælian. V. H. 9. c. 15.—Strab. 8.—Mela. 1, c. 13, &c. l. 2, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 40, &c.——A town of Theſſaly, called Pelaſgicon by the Pelaſgians. Lucan. 6. v. 355.——Another in Epirus, called Amphilochium.

ARGUS, a king of Argos, who reigned 70 years.——A ſon of Areſtor, whence he is often called Areſtorides. He married Iſmene, the daughter of the Aſopus. As he had an hundred eyes, of which only two were aſleep at one time, Juno ſet him to watch Io, whom Jupiter had changed into a heifer; but Mercury, by order of Jupiter, ſlew him, by lulling all his eyes aſleep with the ſound of his lyre. Juno put the eyes of Argus on the tail of the peacock, a bird ſacred to her divinity. Moſchus Idyl.—Ovid. Met. 1. fab. 12 & 13.—Propert. 1, v. 585, &c. el. 3.—Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 2. c. 1.——A ſon of Agenor. Hygin. fab. 145.——A ſon of Danaus, who built the ſhip Argo. Id. 14.——A ſon of Jupiter and Niobe. Id. 145.—A ſon of Pyras and Callirhoe. Id. 145.—A ſon of Phryxus. Id. 3.——A ſon of Polybus. Id. 14.——One of Actæon's dogs. Apollod.——A dog of Ulyſſes, who knew his maſter after an abſence of 20 years. Homer. Od. 17. v. 300.

ARGYNNIS, a name of Venus, which ſhe received from Argynnus, a favorite youth of Agamemnon, who was drowned in the Cephiſus. Propert. 3, el. 5, v. 52.

ARGŸRA, a nymph greatly beloved by a ſhepherd called Selimnus. She was changed into a fountain, and the ſhepherd into a river of the ſame name, whoſe waters make lovers forget the object of their affections. Vid. Selimnus. Pauſ. 7, c. 23.——A city of Troas.—Alſo the native place of Diodorus Siculus, in Sicily.

ARGŸRASPĬDES, a Macedonian legion which received this name from their ſilver helmets. Curt. 4, c. 13.

ARGŸRE, an iſland beyond the mouth of the river Indus, abounding in metal. Mela. 3, c. 7.

ARGYRĬPA, a town of Apulia, built by Diomedes after the Trojan war, and called by Polybius Argipana. Only ruins remain to ſhow where it once ſtood, though the place ſtill preſerves the name of Arpi.—Virg. Æn. 11, v. 246.

ARIA, a country of Aſia, ſituate at the eaſt of Parthia. Mela. 1, c. 2. l. 2, c. 7.——The wife of Pætus Cecinna, of Padua, a Roman ſenator who was accuſed of conſpiracy againſt Claudius, and carried to Rome by ſea. She accompanied him, and in the boat ſhe ſtabbed herſelf, and preſented the ſword to her huſband, who followed her example. Plin. 7.

ARIADNE, daughter of Minos 2d, king of Crete, by Paſiphae, fell in love with Theſeus, who was ſhut up in the labyrinth to be devoured by the Minotaur, and gave him a clue of thread, by which he extricated himſelf from the difficult windings of his confinement. After he had conquered the Minotaur, he carried her away according to the promiſe he had made, and married her; but when he arrived at the iſland of Naxos he forſook her, though ſhe was already pregnant, and repaid his love with the moſt endearing tenderneſs. Ariadne was ſo diſconſolate upon being abandoned by Theſeus, that ſhe hung herſelf, according to ſome; but Plutarch ſays, that ſhe lived many years after, and had ſome children by Onarus, the prieſt of Bacchus. According to ſome writers, Bacchus loved her after Theſeus had forſaken her, and he gave her a crown of ſeven ſtars, which, after her death, was made a conſtellation. The Argives ſhewed Ariadne's tomb, and when one of their temples was repaired, her aſhes were found in an earthen urn. Homer, Od. 11, v. 320. ſays, that Diana detained Ariadne at Naxos. Plut. in Theſ.—Ovid. Met 8, fab. 2. Herold. 10. De Art. Am. 2, Faſt. 3, v. 462.—*Catull. de Nupt. ARIÆUS, an officer who ſucceeded to the command of the ſurviving army after the death of Cyrus the younger, after the battle of Cunaxa. He made peace with Artaxerxes. Xenoph.

ARIĀNI & ARIĒNI, a people of Aſia. Dionyſ. Perieg. 714.

ARIANTAS, a king of Scythia, who yearly ordered every one of his ſubjects to preſent him with an arrow. Herodot. 4, c. 81.

ARIAMNES, a king of Cappadocia, ſon of Ariarathes 3d.

ARIARĀTHES, a king of Cappadocia, who joined Darius Ochus in his expedition againſt Egypt, where he acquired much glory.——His nephew, the 2d of that name, defended his kingdom againſt Perdiccas, the general of Alexander, but he was defeated and hung on a croſs in the 81ſt year of his age, 321 B. C.——His ſon Ariarathes the 3d, eſcaped the maſſacre which attended his father and his followers; and after the death of Perdiccas, he recovered Cappadocia, by conquering Amyntas the Macedonian general. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Ariamnes.——Ariarathes the 4th, ſucceeded ceeded his father Ariamnes, and married Stratonice, daughter of Antiochus Theos. He died after a reign of 28 years, B. C. 220, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Ariarathes the 5th, a prince who married Antiochia, the daughter of king Antiochus, whom he aſſiſted againſt the Romans. Antiochus, being defeated, Ariarathes ſaved his kingdom from invaſion by paying the Romans a large ſum of money remitted at the inſtance of the king of Pergamus.—— His ſon, the 6th of that name, called Philopater, from his piety, ſucceeded him 166 B. C.; an alliance with the Romans ſhielded him againſt the falſe claims that were laid to his crown by one of the favorites of Demetrius king of Syria. He was maintained on his throne by Attalus, and aſſiſted his friends of Rome againſt Ariſtonicus, the uſurper of Pergamus; but he was killed in the war B. C. 130, leaving ſix children, five of whom were murdered by his ſurviving wife Laodice.——The only one who eſcaped, Ariarathes 7th, was proclaimed king, and ſoon after married Laodice, the ſiſter of Mithridates Eupator, by whom he had two ſons. He was murdered by an illegitimate brother, upon which his widow Laodice gave herſelf and kingdom to Nicomedes king of Bithynia. Mithridates made war againſt the new king, and raiſed his nephew to the throne. The young king, who was the 8th of the name of Ariarathes, made war againſt the tyrannical Mithridates, by whom he was aſſaſſinated in the preſence of both armies, and the murderer's ſon, a child 8 years old, was placed on the vacant throne. The Cappadocians revolted, and made the late monarch's brother, Ariarathes 9th, king; but Mithridates expelled him, and reſtored his own ſon. The exiled prince died of a broken heart; and Nicomedes of Bithynia, dreading the power of the tyrant, intereſted the Romans in the affairs of Cappadocia. The arbiters wiſhed to make the country free; but the Cappadocians demanded a king, and received Ariobarzanes, B. C. 91. On the death of Ariobarzanes, his brother aſcended the throne, under the name of Ariarathes 10th; but his title was diſputed by Siſenna, the eldeſt ſon of Glaphyra, by Archelaus prieſt of Comăna. M. Antony, who was umpire between the contending parties, decided in favor of Siſenna; but Ariarathes recovered it for a while, though he was ſoon after obliged to yield in favor of Archelaus, the ſecond ſon of Glaphyra, B. C. 36. Diod. 18.—Juſtin. 13. & 29.—Strab. 12.

ARIBBÆUS, a general mentioned by Polyæn. 7, c. 29.

ARĪCIA, an Athenian girl, whom Hippolytus married after he had been raiſed from the dead by Æſculapius. He built a city in Italy, which he called by her name. He had a ſon by her called Virbius. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 544.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 762, &c. ——A very ancient town of Italy, built by Hippolytus, ſon of Theſeus, after he had been raiſed from the dead by Æſculapius, and tranſported into Italy by Diana. In a grove in the neighbourhood of Aricia, Theſeus built a temple to Diana, where he eſtabliſhed the ſame rites as were in the temple of that goddeſs in Tauris. The prieſt of this temple was always a fugitive, and the murderer of his predeceſſor, and went always armed with a dagger, to prevent whatever attempts might be made upon his life by one who wiſhed to be his ſucceſſor. The Arician foreſt was very celebrated, and no horſes would ever enter it, becauſe Hippolytus had been killed by them. Egeria the favorite nymph and inviſible protectreſs of Numa, generally reſided in this famous grove, which was ſituated on the Appian way, beyond mount Albanus. *Ovid. ARIOMĒDES, a pilot of Xerxes.

ARĪON, a famous lyric poet and muſician, ſon of Cyclos, of Methymna, in the iſland of Leſbos. He went into Italy with Periander, tyrant of Corinth, where he obtained immenſe riches by his profeſſion. Some time after, he wiſhed to reviſit his country; and the ſailors of the ſhip, in which he embarked, reſolved to murder him, to obtain the riches which he was carrying to Leſbos. Arion ſeeing them inflexible in their reſolutions, begged that he might be permitted to play ſome melodious tune; and as ſoon as he had finiſhed it, he threw himſelf into the ſea. A number of dolphins had been attracted round the ſhip by the ſweetneſs of his muſic; and it is ſaid, that one of them carried him ſafe on his back to Tænarus, whence he haſtened to the court of Periander, who ordered all the ſailors to be crucified at their return. Hygin. fab. 194.—Herodot. 1, c. 23 & 24.—Ælian. de Nat. An. 13, c. 45.—Ital. 11.—Propert. 2, el. 26, v. 17.—Plut. in Symp. ——A horſe, ſprung from Ceres and Neptune. Ceres, when ſhe travelled over the world in queſt of her daughter Proſerpine, had taken the figure of a mare, to avoid the importuning addreſſes of Neptune. The god changed himſelf alſo into a horſe, and from their union aroſe the horſe Arion, which had the power of ſpeech, the feet on the right ſide like thoſe of a man, and the reſt of the body like a horſe. Arion was brought up by the Nereides, who often harnaſſed him to his father's chariot, which he drew over the ſea with uncommon ſwiftneſs. Neptune gave him to Copreus, who preſented him to Hercules. Adraſtus, king of Argos, received him as a preſent from Hercules, and with this wonderful animal he won the prize at the Nemæan games. Arion, therefore, is often called the horſe of Adraſtus. Pauſ. 8, c. 25.—Propert. 2, el. 34, v. 37.—Apollod. 3, c. 6.

ARIOVISTUS, a king of Germany, who profeſſed himſelf a friend of Rome. When Cæſar was in Gaul, Arioviſtus marched againſt him, and was conquered with the loſs of 80,000 men. Cæſ. 1. bell. Gall.—Tacit. 4 Hiſt.

ARIS, a river of Meſſenia. Pauſ. 4, c. 31.

ARISBA, a town of Leſbos, deſtroyed by an earthquake.——A colony of the Mityleneans in Troas, deſtroyed by the Trojans before the coming of the Greeks. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 264.—Homer. Il. 7.——The name of Priam's firſt wife.

ARISTÆNĔTUS, a writer whoſe epiſtles have been beautifully edited by Abreſch. Zwollæ, 1749.

ARISTÆUM, a city of Thrace at the foot of mount Hæmus. Plin. 4, c. 11.

ARISTÆUS, ſon of Apollo and the nymph Cyrene, was born in the deſerts of Lybia, and and brought up by the Seaſons, and fed upon nectar and ambroſia. His fondneſs for hunting procured him the ſirname of Nomus and Agreus. After he had travelled over the greateſt part of the world, Ariſtæus came to ſettle in Greece, where he married Autonoe, the daughter of Cadmus, by whom he had a ſon called Actæon. He fell in love with Eurydice, the wife of Orpheus, and purſued her in the fields. She was ſtung by a ſerpent that lay in the graſs, and died, for which the gods deſtroyed all the bees of Ariſtæus. In this calamity he applied to his mother, who directed him to ſeize the ſea-god Proteus, and conſult him how he might repair the loſſes he had ſuſtained. Proteus adviſed him to appeaſe the manes of Eurydice by the ſacrifice of four bulls and four heifers: and as ſoon as he had done it, and left them in the air, ſwarms of bees immediately ſprang from the rotten carcaſes, and reſtored Ariſtæus to his former proſperity. Some authors ſay, that Ariſtæus had the care of Bacchus when young, and that he was initiated in the myſteries of this god. Ariſtæus went to live on mount Hæmus, where he died. He was, after death, worſhipped as a demi-god. Ariſtæus is ſaid to have learned from the nymphs, the cultivation of olives, and the management of bees, &c. which he afterwards communicated to the reſt of mankind. Virg. G. 4. v. 317.—Diod. 4.—Juſtin. 13. c. 7.—Ovid. Faſt. 1. v. 363.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 18.—Pauſ. 10, c. 17.—Hygin. fab. 161, 180, 247.—Apollod. 3, c. 4.—Herodot. 4, c. 4, &c.—Polyæn. 1, c. 24.——A general who commanded the Corinthian forces at the ſiege of Potidæa. He was taken by the Athenians, and put to death.

ARISTAGŎRAS, a writer who compoſed an hiſtory of Egypt. Plin. 36, c. 12.——A ſon-in-law of Hiſtiæus, tyrant of Miletus, who revolted from Darius, and incited the Athenians againſt Perſia, and burnt Sardis. This ſo exaſperated the king, that every evening before ſupper he ordered his ſervants to remind him of puniſhing Ariſtagoras. He was killed in a battle againſt the Perſians, B. C. 499. Herodot. 5, c. 30, &c. l. 7, c. 8.—Polyæn. 1, c. 24.——A man of Cyzicus.——Another of Cumæ. Herodot. 4.

ARISTARCHUS, a celebrated grammarian of Samos, diſciple of Ariſtophanes. He lived the greateſt part of his life at Alexandria, and Ptolemy Philometor entruſted him with the education of his ſons. He was famous for his critical powers, and he reviſed the poems of Homer with ſuch ſeverity, that ever after all ſevere critics were called Ariſtarchi. He wrote above 800 commentaries on different authors, much eſteemed in his age. In his old age he became dropſical, upon which he ſtarved himſelf, and died in his 72d year, B. C. 157. He left two ſons called Ariſtarchus and Ariſtagoras, both famous for their ſtupidity. Horat. de Art. Poet. v. 449.—Ovid. 3. ex Pont. ep. 9. v. 24.—Cic. ad Fam. 3 ep. 11. ad Attic. 1, ep. 14.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.——A tragic poet of Tegea in Arcadia, about 454 years B. C. He compoſed 70 tragedies, of which two only were rewarded with the prize. One of them, called Achilles, was tranſlated into Latin verſe by Ennius. Suidas.—A phyſician to queen Berenice, the widow of Antiochus. Polyæn. 8.——An orator of Ambracia.——An aſtronomer of Samos, who firſt ſuppoſed that the earth turned round its axis, and revolved round the ſun. This doctrine nearly proved fatal to him, as he was accuſed of diſturbing the peace of the gods Lares. He maintained that the ſun was 19 times farther diſtant from the earth than the moon, and that the moon was 56 ſemi-diameters of our globe, and little more than one-third, and the diameter of the ſun 6 or 7 times more than that of the earth. The age in which he floriſhed, is not preciſely known. His treatiſe on the largeneſs and the diſtance of the ſun and moon is extant, of which the beſt edition is that of Oxford, 8vo. 1688.

ARISTEAS, a poet of Proconneſus, who as fables report appeared ſeven years after his death to his countrymen, and 540 years after to the people of Metapontum in Italy, and commanded them to raiſe him a ſtatue near the temple of Apollo. He wrote an epic poem on the Arimaſpi in three books, and ſome of his verſes are quoted by Longinus. Herodot. 4, c. 13.——A phyſician of Rhodes.——A geometrician, intimate with Euclid.——A poet, ſon of Democharas, in the age of Crœſus.

ARISTĔRÆ, an iſland on the coaſt of Peloponneſus. Pauſ. 2, c. 34.

ARISTEUS, a man of Argos, who excited king Pyrrhus to take up arms againſt his countrymen, the Argives. Polyæn. 8, c. 68.

ARISTHENES, a ſhepherd who found Æſculapius when he had been expoſed in the woods by his mother Coronis.

ARISTHUS, an hiſtorian of Arcadia. Dionyſ. Hal. 1.

ARISTĪBUS, a river of Pæonia. Polyæn. 4, c. 12.

ARISTĪDES, a celebrated Athenian, ſon of Lyſimachus, whoſe great temperance and virtue procured him the ſirname of Juſt. He was rival to Themiſtocles, by whoſe influence he was baniſhed for ten years, B. C. 484; but before ſix years of his exile had elapſed, he was recalled by the Athenians. He was at the battle of Salamis, and was appointed chief commander with Pauſanias againſt Mardonius, who was defeated at Platæa. He died ſo poor, that the expences of his funeral were defrayed at the public charge, and his two daughters, on account of their father's virtues, received a dowry from the public treaſury when they were come to marriageable years. Poverty however ſeemed hereditary in the family of Ariſtides, for the grandſon was ſeen in the public ſtreets getting his livelihood by explaining dreams. The Athenians became more virtuous in imitating their great leader; and from the ſenſe of his good qualities, at the repreſentation of one of the tragedies of Æſchylus, on the mentioning of a ſentence concerning moral goodneſs, the eyes of the audience were all at once turned from the actor to Ariſtides. When he ſat as judge, it is ſaid that the plaintiff, in his accuſation, mentioned the injuries his opponent had done to Ariſtides. "Mention the wrongs you have received," replied the equitable Athenian.—"I ſit here as judge, and the lawſuit is yours, and not mine." C. Nep. & Plut. in Vitâ.—An hiſtorian of Miletus, fonder of ſtories and anecdotes than of truth. He wrote an hiſtory of Italy, of which the 40th volume has been quoted by Plut. in Parall.——An Athlete, who obtained a prize at the Olympian, Nemean, and Pythian games. Pauſ. 6, c. 16.——A painter of Thebes in Bœotia, for one of whoſe pieces Attalus offered 6000 ſeſterces. Plin. 7 & 35.——A Greek orator who wrote 50 orations, beſides other tracts. When Smyrna was deſtroyed by an earthquake, he wrote ſo pathetic a letter to M. Aurelius, that the emperor ordered the city immediately to be rebuilt, and a ſtatue was in conſequence raiſed to the orator. His works conſiſt of hymns in proſe in honor of the gods, funeral orations, apologies, panegyrics, and harangues, the beſt edition of which is that of Jebb, 2 vols. 4to. Oxon. 1722, and that in a ſmaller ſize in 12mo, 3 vols. of Canterus apud P. Steph. 1604.——A man of Locris, who died by the bite of a weaſel. *Ælian. V. ARISTIPPUS, the elder, a philoſopher of Cyrene, diſciple to Socrates, and founder of the Cyrenaic ſect. He was one of the flatterers of Dionyſius of Sicily, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf for his epicurean voluptuouſneſs, in ſupport of which he wrote a book, as likewiſe an hiſtory of Libya. When travelling in the deſarts of Africa, he ordered his ſervants to throw away the money they carried, as too burdenſome. On another occaſion, diſcovering that the ſhip in which he ſailed belonged to pirates, he deſignedly threw his property into the ſea, adding, that he choſe rather to loſe it than his life. Many of his ſayings and maxims are recorded by Diogenes, in his life. Horat. 2. Sat. 3, v. 100.——His grandſon of the ſame name, called the younger, was a warm defender of his opinions, and ſupported that the principles of all things were pain and pleaſure. He floriſhed about 363 years B. C.—A tyrant of Argos, whoſe life was one continued ſeries of apprehenſion. He was killed by a Cretan, in a battle againſt Aratus, B. C. 242. Diog.——A man who wrote an hiſtory of Arcadia. Diog. 2.

M. ARISTIUS, a tribune of the ſoldiers in Cæſar's army. Cæſar. bell. Gall. 7, c. 42.——Another. Vid. Fuſcus.——A ſatyriſt, who wrote a poem called Cyclops.

ARISTOCLĒA, a beautiful woman, ſeen naked by Strato, as ſhe was offering a ſacrifice. She was paſſionately loved by Calliſthenes, and was equally admired by Strato. The two rivals ſo furiouſly contended for her hand, that ſhe died during their quarrel, upon which Strato killed himſelf, and Calliſthenes was never ſeen after. Plut. in Amat.

ARISTOCLES, a peripatetic philoſopher of Meſſenia, who reviewed, in a treatiſe on philoſophy, philoſophy, the opinions of his predeceſſors. The 14th book of this treatiſe is quoted, &c. —He alſo wrote on rhetoric, and likewiſe nine books on morals.——A grammarian of Rhodes.——A ſtoic of Lampſacus.——An hiſtorian. Strab. 4.——A muſician. Athen. &c.——A prince of Tegea, &c. Polyæn. ——This name is common to many Greeks, of whom few or no particulars are recorded.

ARISTOCLĪDES, a tyrant of Orchomenus, who, becauſe he could not win the affection of Stymphalis, killed her and her father, upon which all Arcadia took up arms and deſtroyed the murderer.

ARISTOCRĂTES, a king of Arcadia, put to death by his ſubjects, for offering violence to the prieſteſs of Diana. Pauſ. 8, c. 5. His grandſon of the ſame name, was ſtoned to death for taking bribes, during the ſecond Meſſenian war, and being the cauſe of the defeat of his Meſſenian allies, B. C. 682. Id. ibid.——A Rhodian.——A man who endeavoured to deſtroy the democratical power at Athens.——An Athenian general ſent to the aſſiſtance of Corcyra with 25 gallies. Diod. 15.——An Athenian who was puniſhed with death for flying from the field of battle.——A Greek hiſtorian, ſon of Hipparchus. Plut. in Lyc.

ARISTOCREON, the writer of a book on geography.

ARISTOCRĬTUS, wrote a treatiſe concerning Miletus.

ARISTODĒMUS, ſon of Ariſtomachus, was one of the Heraclidæ. He, with his brothers Temenus and Chreſpontes, invaded Peloponneſus, conquered it, and divided the country among themſelves, 1104 years before the Chriſtian era. Pauſ. 2, c. 18. &c. He was killed by the ſons of Pylades and Electra, or, as others ſay, by Apollo. Id. 3, c. 1.——A king of Meſſenia, who maintained a famous war againſt Sparta. After ſome loſſes, he recovered his ſtrength, and ſo effectually defeated the enemy's forces, that they were obliged to proſtitute their women to re-people their country. The offspring of this proſtitution were called Partheniæ, and 30 years after their birth they left Sparta and ſeized upon Tarentum. Ariſtodemus put his daughter to death for the good of his country; but being afterwards perſecuted in a dream by her manes, he killed himſelf, after a reign of ſix years and ſome months, in which he had obtained much military glory, B. C. 724. His death was lamented by his countrymen, who did not appoint him a ſucceſſor, but only inveſted Damis, one of his friends, with abſolute power to continue the war, which was at laſt terminated after much bloodſhed and many loſſes on both ſides. Pauſ. in Meſſen.——The father of Euryſthenes and Procles, was the firſt king of Lacedæmon, of the Heraclidæ. Apollod. 2.——A tyrant of Cumæ.——A philoſopher of Ægina.——An Alexandrian who wrote ſome treatiſes, &c.——A Spartan who taught the children of Pauſanias.——A man who was preceptor to the children of Pompey.——A tyrant of Arcadia.——A Carian, who wrote an hiſtory of painting.——A philoſopher of Nyſa, B. C. 68.

ARISTOGĔNES, a phyſician of Cnidos, who obtained great reputation by the cure of Demetrius Gonatas, king of Macedonia. ——A Thaſian who wrote 24 books on medicine.

ARISTOGĪTON & Harmodius, two celebrated friends of Athens, who, by their joint efforts, delivered their country from the tyranny of the Piſiſtratidæ, B. C. 510. They received immortal honors from the Athenians, and had ſtatues raiſed to their memory. Theſe ſtatues were carried away by Xerxes when he took Athens. The conſpiracy of Ariſtogiton was ſo ſecretly planned, and ſo wiſely carried into execution, that it is ſaid a courtezan bit her tongue off, not to betray the truſt repoſed in her. Pauſ. 1, c. 29.—Herodot. 5, c. 55.—Plut. de 10 Orat. ——An Athenian orator, ſirnamed Canis, for his impudence. He wrote orations againſt Timarchus, Timotheus, Hyperides, and Thraſyllus.——A ſtatuary. Pauſ.

ARISTOLĀUS, a painter. Plin. 35, c. 11.

ARISTOMĂCHE, the wife of Dionyſius of Syracuſe. Cic. Tuſc. 5, c. 20.——The wife of Dion.——A poeteſs. Plut. Symp.——A daughter of Priam, who married Critolaus. Pauſ. 10.

ARISTOMĂCHUS, an Athenian, who wrote concerning the preparation of wine. Plin. 14, c. 9.——A man ſo exceſſively fond of bees, that he devoted 58 years of his life in raiſing ſwarms of them. Plin. 11, c. 9.—The ſon of Cleodæus, and grandſon of Hyllus, whoſe three ſons, Creſphontes, Temenus, and Ariſtodemus, called Heraclidæ, conquered Peloponneſus. Pauſ. 2, c. 7, l. 3, c. 15.—Herodot. 6, 7, & 8.——A man who laid aſide his ſovereign power at Argos, at the perſuaſion of Aratus. Pauſ. 2, c. 8.

ARISTOMĒDES, a Theſſalian general in the intereſt of Darius 3d. Curt. 3, c. 9.

ARISTOMĔNES, a commander of the fleet of Darius on the Helleſpont, conquered by the Macedonians. Curt. 4. c. 1.——A famous general of Meſſenia, who encouraged his countrymen to ſhake off the Lacedæmonian yoke, under which they had labored for above 30 years. He once defended the virtue of ſome Spartan women, whom his ſoldiers had attempted; and when he was taken pri-ſoner and carried to Sparta, the women whom he had protected intereſted themſelves ſo warmly in his cauſe that they procured his liberty. He refuſed to aſſume the title of king, but was ſatisfied with that of commander. He acquired the ſirname of Juſt, from his equity, to which he joined the true valor, ſagacity, and perſeverance of a general. He often entered Sparta without being known, and was ſo dexterous in eluding the vigilance of the Lacedæmonians, who had taken him captive, that he twice eſcaped from them. As he attempted to do it a third time, he was unfortunately killed, and his body being opened, his heart was found all covered with hair. He died 671 years B. C. and it is ſaid that he left dramatical pieces behind him. Diod. 15.—Pauſ. in Meſſen.——A Spartan ſent to the aſſiſtance of Dionyſius. Polyæn. 2.

ARISTON, the ſon of Agaſicles, king of Sparta. Being unable to raiſe children by two wives, he married another famous for her beauty, by whom he had, after ſeven months, a ſon Demaratus, whom he had the imprudence to call not his own. Herodot. 6, c. 61, &c.——A general of Ætolia.——A ſculptor.——A Corinthian who aſſiſted the Syracuſans againſt the Athenians.——An officer in Alexander's army.——A tyrant of Methymna, who, being ignorant that Chios had ſurrendered to the Macedonians, entered into the harbour, and was taken and put to death. Curt. 4, c. 9.——A philoſopher of Chios, pupil to Zeno the ſtoic, and founder of a ſect which continued but a little while. He ſupported that the nature of the divinity is unintelligible. It is ſaid that he died by the heat of the ſun, which fell too powerfully upon his bald head. In his old age he was much given to ſenſuality. Diog.——A lawyer in Trajan's reign, whoſe eulogium has been written by Pliny, 22 epiſt. lib. 1.——A peripatetic philoſopher of Alexandria, who wrote concerning the courſe of the Nile. Strab.——A wreſtler of Argos, under whom Plato performed ſome exerciſes.——A muſician of Athens.——A tragic poet.——A peripatetic of Cos.——A native of Pella, in the age of Adrian, who wrote on the rebellion of the Jews.

ARISTONAUTÆ, the naval dock of Pellene. Pauſ. 2.

ARISTONĪCUS, ſon of Eumenes, by a concubine of Epheſus, 126 B. C. invaded Aſia and the kingdom of Pergamus, which Attalus had left by his will to the Roman people. He was conquered by the conſul Perpenna, and ſtrangled in priſon. Juſtin. 36, c. 4.—Flor. 2, c. 20.——A muſician of Olynthus.——A grammarian of Alexandria, who wrote a commentary on Heſiod and Homer, beſides a treatiſe on the Muſæum eſtabliſhed at Alexandria by the Ptolemies.

ARISTONȲDES, a noble ſtatuary. Plin. 34, c. 14.

ARISTŎNUS, a captain of Alexander's cavalry. Curt. 9, c. 5.

ARISTONȲMUS, a comic poet under Philadelphus, keeper of the library of Alexandria. He died of a retention of urine, in his 77th year. Athen.——One of Alexander's muſicians. Plut. in Alex.

ARISTOPHĂNES, a celebrated comic poet of Athens, ſon of Philip of Rhodes. He wrote 54 comedies, of which only 11 are come down to us. He lived in the age of Socrates, Demoſthenes, and Euripides, B. C. 434, and laſhed the vices of his age with a maſterly hand. The wit and excellence of his comedies are well known; but they abound ſometimes too much with obſcenity, and his attack upon the venerable character of Socrates has been always cenſured, and with juſtice. As a reward of his mental greatneſs, the poet received a crown of olive, in a public aſſembly; but if he deſerved praiſe, he merited blame for his licentiouſneſs, which ſpared not even the gods, and was ſo offenſive to his countrymen that Alcibiades made a law at Athens, which forbade the comic writers from mimicking or repreſenting on the ſtage any living character by name. Ariſtophanes has been called the prince of ancient comedy, as Menander of the new. The play called Nubes is pointedly againſt Socrates, and the philoſopher is expoſed to ridicule, and his precepts placed in a moſt ludicrous point of view, by the introduction of one of his pupils in the characters of the piece. It is ſaid that St. Chryſoſtom uſed to keep the comedies of Ariſtophanes under his pillow, on account of the brilliancy of the compoſition. Plutarch has made a compariſon between the princes of the new and old comedy, which abounds with many anecdotes concerning theſe original characters. The beſt editions of the works of Ariſtophanes, are, Kuſter's, fol. Amſt. 1710, and the 12mo. L. Bat. 1670, and that of Brunck. 4 vols. 8vo. Argent. 1783, which would ſtill be more perfect did it contain the valuable Scholia. Quintil. 10. c. 1.—Paterc. 1, c. 16.—Horat. 1, Sat. 4. v. 1.——A grammarian of Byzantium, keeper of the library of Alexandria under Ptolemy Evergetes. He wrote a treatiſe on the harlots of Attica. Diog. in Plat. & Epic.—Athen. 9.——A Greek hiſtorian of Bœotia, quoted by Plut. de Herod. Malig.——A writer on agriculture.

ARISTOPHĪLĪDES, a king of Tarentum in the reign of Darius ſon of Hyſtaſpes. Herodot. 3.

ARISTŎPHON, a painter in the age of Socrates. He drew the picture of Alcibiades ſoftly reclining on the boſom of the courtezan Nemea, and all the people of Athens ran yan in crowds to be ſpectators of the maſterly piece. He alſo made a painting of Mars leaning on the arm of Venus. Athen. 13. —Plin. 35, c. 11.——A comic poet in the age of Alexander, many of whoſe fragments are collected in Athenæus.

ARISTOR, the father of Argus the hundred eyed keeper of Io.

ARISTORĬDES, the patronymic of Argus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 624.

ARISTOTELEIA, feſtivals in honor of Ariſtotle, becauſe he obtained the reſtitution of his country from Alexander.

ARISTOTĔLES, a famous philoſopher, ſon of Nicomachus, a phyſician, born at Stagira. After his father's death he went to Athens, to hear Plato's lectures, where he ſoon ſignalized himſelf by the brightneſs of his genius. He had been of an inactive and diſſolute diſpoſition in his youth, but now he applied himſelf with uncommon diligence, and after he had ſpent 20 years in hearing the inſtructions of Plato, he opened a ſchool for himſelf, for which he was accuſed of ingratitude and illiberality by his ancient maſter. He was moderate in his meals; he ſlept little, and always had one arm out of his couch with a bullet in it, which, by falling into a brazen baſon underneath, early awakened him. He was, according to ſome, 10 years preceptor to Alexander, who received his inſtructions with much pleaſure and deference, and always reſpected him. According to Plutarch, the improvement that Alexander made under Ariſtotle, was of more ſervice to him than all the ſplendor and power which he received from Philip. Almoſt all his writings, which are compoſed on a variety of ſubjects, are extant: he gave them to Theophraſtus at his death, and they were bought by one of the Ptolemies, and placed in the famous library of Alexandria. Diogenes Laertes has given us a very extenſive catalogue of them. Ariſtotle had a deformed countenance, but his genius was a ſufficient compenſation for all his perſonal defects. He has been called by Plato the philoſopher of truth; and Cicero compliments him with the title of a man of eloquence, univerſal knowledge, readineſs and acuteneſs of invention, and fecundity of thought. The writings of Ariſtotle have been compared with thoſe of Plato; but the one are the effuſions of a lively and fruitful imagination, whilſt the philoſopher of Stagira ſtudied nature more than art, and had recourſe to ſimplicity of expreſſion more than ornament. He neither worſhipped nor cared for the divinity, concerning which his opinions were ever various and diſſonant; and the more he diſregarded the mythology of the ancients, the greater was the credit he acquired over his leſs philoſophical predeceſſors. He was ſo authoritative in his opinions, that, as Bacon obſerves, he wiſhed to eſtabliſh the ſame dominion over men's minds, as his pupil over nations. Alexander, it is ſaid, wiſhed and encouraged his learned tutor to write the hiſtory of animals; and the more effectually to aſſiſt him, he ſupplied him with 800 talents, and, in his Aſiatic expedition, employed above a thouſand men to collect animals, either in fiſhing, hunting, or hawking, which were carefully tranſmitted to the philoſopher. Ariſtotle's logic has long reigned in the ſchools, and been regarded as the perfect model of all imitation. As he expired, the philoſopher is ſaid to have uttered the following ſentiment; Fæde hunc mundum intravi, anxius vixi, perturbatus egredior, cauſa cauſarum miſerere mei. The letter which Philip wrote to Ariſtotle, has been preſerved, and is in theſe words: "I inform you I have a ſon; I thank the gods, not ſo much for making me a father, as for giving me a ſon in an age when he can have Ariſtotle for his inſtructor. I hope you will make him a ſucceſſor worthy of me, and a king worthy of Macedonia." Ariſtotle wiſhed to make his wife Pythias a deity, and to pay her the ſame worſhip as was paid to Ceres. He died in the 63d year of his age, B. C. 322. His treatiſes have been publiſhed ſeparately; but the beſt edition of the works collectively, is that of Duval, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1629. Tyrrwhitt's edition of the Poetica, Oxon. 4to. 94, is a valuable acquiſition to literature. He had a ſon whom he called Nicomachus, by the courtezan Herpyllis. Some have accuſed him of being acceſſary to the death of Alexander, and ſaid that he drowned himſelf in the Euripus, becauſe he could not find out the cauſe of its flux and reflux. There are however different reports about the manner of his death, and ſome believe that he died at Athens of a cholic, two years after Alexander's death. The people of Stagira inſtituted feſtivals in his honor, becauſe he had rendered important ſervices to their city. Diog. in vitâ.—Plut. in Alex. & de Alex. fort. &c. —Cic. Acad. Quæſt. 4, de Orat. 3, de finib. 5. —Quintil. 1, 2, 5, 10.—Ælian. V. H. 4.— Juſtin. 12.—Juſtin. Martyr.—Auguſt. de Civ. Dei, 8.—Plin. 2, 4, 5, &c.—Athen.—Val. Max. 5, c. 6, &c.——There were beſides ſeven of the ſame name: A magiſtrate of Athens.—A commentator on Homer's Iliad. ——An orator of Sicily, who anſwered the panegyric of Iſocrates.——A friend of Æſchines.——A man of Cyrene who wrote on poetry. —A ſchoolmaſter mentioned in Plato's life, written by Ariſtoxenus.——An obſcure grammarian. Diog. de Ariſtot.

ARISTOTĪMUS, a tyrant of Elis, 271 years B. C. Pauſ. 5, c. 5.

ARISTOXĔNUS, a celebrated muſician, diſciple of Ariſtotle. He wrote 453 different treatiſes on philoſophy, hiſtory, &c. and was diſappointed in his expectations of ſucceeding in the ſchool of Ariſtotle, for which he always ſpoke with ingratitude of his learned maſter. Of all his works nothing remains but three books upon muſic, the moſt ancient on that ſubject extant.——A philoſopher of Cyrene. Athen.——A phyſician whoſe writings are quoted by Galen.——A poet of Selinus.——A Pythagorean philoſopher.

ARISTUS, a Greek hiſtorian of Salamis, who wrote an account of Alexander's expedition. Strab. 14.—Arrian. 7.

ARISTYLLUS, an obſcure poet. Ariſtoph.——An aſtronomer of Alexandria, 292 B. C.

ARIUS, a river of Gaul, and of Aſia. The inhabitants in the neighbourhood are called Arii.——A celebrated writer, the origin of the Arian controverſy, that denied the eternal divinity and conſubſtantiality of the word. Though he was greatly perſecuted for his opinions, he gained the favor of the emperor Conſtantine, and triumphed over his powerful antagoniſt Athanaſius. He died the very night he was going to enter the church of Conſtantinople in triumph. Preſſed by nature, he ſtepped aſide to eaſe himſelf; but his bowels guſhed out, and he expired on the ſpot. Athanaſ.

ARMĔNES, a ſon of Nabis, led in triumph at Rome. Liv. 34, c. 1.

ARMENIA, a large country of Aſia, divided into Upper and Lower Armenia. Upper Armenia, called alſo Major, has Media on the eaſt, Iberia on the north, and Meſopotamia on the ſouth. Lower Armenia, or Minor, is bounded by Cappadocia, Armenia Major, Syria, Cilicia, and the Euphrates. The Armenians were a long time under the dominion of the Medes and Perſians, till they were conquered, with the reſt of Aſia, by Alexander and his ſucceſſors. The Romans made it one of their provinces, and, under ſome of the emperors, the Armenians had the privilege of chooſing their own kings, but they were afterwards reduced. The country received its name from Armenus, who was one of the Argonauts, and of Theſſalian origin. They borrowed the names and attributes of their deities from the Perſians. They paid great adoration to Venus Anaitis, and the chiefeſt of the people always proſtituted their daughters in honor of this goddeſs. Armenia Major is now called Turconia, and Minor, Aladulia. Herodot. 1, c. 194. l. 5, c. 49.—Curt. 4, c. 12. l. 5, c. 1.—Strab. 1 & 11.—Mela. 3, &c.—Plin. 6, c. 4, &c.—Lucan. 2.

ARMENTARIUS, a Cæſar in Diocleſian's reign.

ARMILLATUS, one of Domitian's favorites. Juv. 4, v. 53.

ARMILUSTRIUM, a feſtival at Rome on the 19th of October. When the ſacrifices were offered, all the people appeared under arms. The feſtival has often been confounded with that of the Salii, though eaſily diſtinguiſhed; becauſe the latter was obſerved the 2d of March, and on the celebration of the Armiluſtrium they always played on a flute, and the Salii played upon the trumpet. It was inſtituted A. U. C. 543. Varro de L. L. 5, c. 3.—Liv. 27, c. 37.

ARMINIUS, a warlike general of the Germans, who ſupported a bloody war againſt Rome for ſome time, and was at laſt conquered by Germanicus in two great battles. He was poiſoned by one of his friends, A. D. 19, in the 37th year of his age. Dio. 56.—Tacit. An. 1, &c.

ARMORĬCÆ, cities of Celtic Gaul, famous for the warlike, rebellious, and inconſtant diſpoſition of the inhabitants called Armorici. Cæſ. bell. G.

ARNE, a city of Lycia, called afterwards Xanthus.——A town of Umbria in Italy.——A daughter of Æolus, who gave her name to two towns, one in Theſſaly, the other in Bœotia. Neptune changed himſelf into a bull to enjoy her company. Strab. 1 & 2.—Pauſ. 9, c. 40.—Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 4.

ARNI, a people of Italy, deſtroyed by Hercules.

ARNIENSIS, a tribe in Rome. Liv. 6.

ARNOBIUS, a philoſopher in Diocleſian's reign, who became a convert to Chriſtianity. He applied for ordination, but was refuſed by the biſhops till he gave them a proof of his ſincerity. Upon this he wrote his celebrated treatiſe, in which he expoſed the abſurdity of irreligion, and ridiculed the heathen gods. Opinions are various concerning the purity of his ſtyle, though all agree in praiſe of his extenſive erudition. The book that he wrote de rhetorica inſtitutione is not extant. The beſt edition of his treatiſe adverſus gentes is the 4to, printed L. Bat. 1651.

ARNUS, a river of Etruria, riſing on the Appennine mountains, and falling into the Mediterranean. Liv. 22, c. 2.

AROA, a town of Achaia. Pauſ. 7.

AROMA, a town of Caria——of Cappadocia.

ARPĀNI, a people of Italy.

ARPI, a city of Apulia, built by Diomedes after the Trojan war. Juſtin. 20, c. 1.—Virg. Æn. 10, v. 28.

ARPĪNUM, a town of the Volſci, famous for giving birth to Cicero and Marius. The words Arpinæ chartæ are ſometimes applied to Cicero's works. Mart. 10, ep. 19.—Juv. 8, v. 237.——A town of Magna Græcia.

ARRÆI, a people of Thrace. Plin.

ARRHABÆUS, the king of a nation in the neighbourhood of Macedonia, who greatly diſtreſſed Archelaus. Ariſtot. 5. Polit. c. 10.

ARRIA. Vid. Aria.

ARRIA GALLA, a beautiful, but immodeſt woman in the reign of the emperors. Tacit. 15, c. 59.

ARRIĀNUS, a philoſopher of Nicomedia, prieſt of Ceres and Proſerpine, and diſciple of Epictetus, called a ſecond Xenophon from the elegance and ſweetneſs of his diction, and diſtinguiſhed for his acquaintance with military and political life. He wrote 7 books on Alexander's expedition, the periplus of the Euxine and Red Sea, 4 books on the diſſertations of Epictetus, beſides an account of the Alani, Bithynians, and Parthians. He floriſhed about the 140th year of Chriſt, and was rewarded with the conſulſhip and government of Cappadocia, by M. Antoninus. The beſt edition of Arrian's Expeditio Alexandri, is the fol. Gronovii. L. Bat. 1704, and the 8vo. a Raphelio, 2 vols. 1757, and the Tactica, 8vo. Amſt. 1683.——A Greek hiſtorian.——An Athenian who wrote a treatiſe on hunting, and the manner of keeping dogs.——A poet who wrote an epic poem in 24 books on Alexander; alſo another poem on Attalus, king of Pergamus. He likewiſe tranſlated Virgil's Georgics into Greek verſe.

ARRIUS, a friend of Cicero, whoſe ſumptuous feaſt Horat. deſcribes, 2 ſat. 3. v. 86. ——Aper, a Roman general who murdered the emperor, &c.

ARRIUS & ARIUS, a philoſopher of Alexandria, who ſo ingratiated himſelf with Auguſtus, after the battle of Actium, that the conqueror declared the people of Alexandria owed the preſervation of their city to three cauſes; becauſe Alexander was their founder, becauſe of the beauty of the ſituation, and becauſe Arrius was a native of the place. Plut. in Anton.

ARRUNTIUS, a Roman conſul.——A famous geographer, who, upon being accuſed of adultery and treaſon, under Tiberius, opened his veins. Tacit. Ann. 6.

ARSABES, a ſatrap of Armenia.—Of Perſia. Polyæn.

ARSĂCES, a man of obſcure origin, who upon ſeeing Seleucus defeated by the Gauls, invaded Parthia, and conquered the governor of the province called Andragoras, and laid the foundations of an empire, 250 B. C. He added the kingdom of the Hyrcani to his newly acquired poſſeſſions, and ſpent his time in eſtabliſhing his power, and regulating the laws. After death he was made a god of his nation, and all his ſucceſſors were called, in honor of his name, Arſacidæ. Juſtin. 41, c. 5 & 6.——His ſon and ſucceſſor bore the ſame name. He carried war againſt Antiochus the ſon of Seleucus, who entered the field with 100,000 foot and 20,000 horſe. He afterwards made peace with Antiochus, and died B. C. 217. Id. 41, c. 5.——The 3d king of Parthia, of the family of the Arſacidæ, bore the ſame name, and was alſo called Priapatius. He reigned 12 years, and left two ſons, Mithridates and Phraates. Phraates ſucceeded as being the elder, and at his death he left his kingdom to his brother, though he had many children; obſerving, that a monarch ought to have in view, not the dignity of his family, but the proſperity of his ſubjects. Juſtin. 31, c. 5.——A king of Pontus and Armenia, in alliance with the Romans. He fought long with ſucceſs againſt the Perſians, till he was deceived by the ſnares of king Sapor, his enemy, who put out his eyes, and ſoon after deprived him of life. Marcellin.——The eldeſt ſon of Artabanus, appointed over Armenia by his father, after the death of king Artaxias. Tacit. Hiſt. 6. ——A ſervant of Themiſtocles.

ARSACĬDÆ, a name given to ſome of the monarchs of Parthia, in honor of Arſaces, the founder of the empire. Their power ſubſiſted till the 229th year of the Chriſtian æra, when they were conquered by Artaxerxes king of Perſia. Juſtin. 41.

ARSAMĔNES, a ſatrap of Perſia, at the battle of the Granicus.

ARSAMETES, a river of Aſia, near Parthia. Tacit. ann. 15.

ARSAMOSĀTA, a town of Armenia Major, 70 miles from the Euphrates. Tacit. ann. 15.

ARSĀNES, the ſon of Ochus, and father of Codomanus.

ARTABĀNUS, ſon of Hyſtaſpes, was brother to Darius the firſt. He diſſuaded his nephew Xerxes from making war againſt the Greeks, and at his return he aſſaſſinated him with the hopes of aſcending the throne. Darius, the ſon of Xerxes, was murdered in a ſimilar manner; and Artaxerxes, his brother, would have ſhared the ſame fate, had not he diſcovered the ſnares of the aſſaſſin, and puniſhed him with death. Diod. 11.—Juſtin. 3, c. 1, &c.—Herodot. 4, c. 38. l. 7, c. 10, &c.——A king of Parthia, after the death of his nephew Phraates 2d. He undertook a war againſt a nation of Scythia, in which he periſhed. His ſon Mithridates ſucceeded him, and merited the appellation of Great. Juſtin. 42, c. 2.——A king of Media, and afterwards of Parthia, after the expulſion of Vonones, whom Tiberius had made king there. He invaded Armenia, from whence he was driven away by one of the generals of Tiberius. He was expelled from his throne, which Tiridates uſurped; and ſome time after, he was reſtored again to his ancient power, and died A. D. 48. Tacit. ann. 5, &c.——A king of Parthia, very inimical to the intereſt of Veſpaſian.——Another king of Parthia, who made war againſt the emperor Caracalla, who had attempted his life on pretence of courting his daughter. ARTATUS, a river of Illyria. Liv. 43, c. 19.

ARTAVASDES, a ſon of Tigranes king of Upper Armenia, who wrote tragedies, and ſhone as an elegant orator and faithful hiſtorian. He lived in alliance with the Romans, mans, but Craſſus was defeated partly on account of his delay. He betrayed M. Antony in his expedition againſt Parthia, for which Antony reduced his kingdom, and carried him to Egypt, where he adorned the triumph of the conqueror led in golden chains. He was ſome time after murdered. Strab. 11.——The crown of Armenia was given by Tiberius to a perſon of the ſame name, who was expelled.—Auguſtus had alſo raiſed to the throne of Armenia, a perſon of the ſame name. Tacit. An. 2.

ARTAXA & ARTAXIAS, a general of Antiochus the Great, who erected the province of Armenia into a kingdom, by his reliance on the friendſhip of the Romans. King Tigranes was one of his ſucceſſors. Strab. 11.

ARTAXĂTA, a ſtrongly fortified town of Upper Armenia, the capital of the empire where the kings generally reſided. It is ſaid that Annibal built it for Artaxias, the king of the country. It was burnt by Corbulo, and rebuilt by Tiridates, who called it Neronea, in honor of Nero. Strab. 11.

ARTAXERXES 1ſt, ſucceeded to the kingdom of Perſia, after his father Xerxes. He deſtroyed Artabanus who had murdered Xerxes, and attempted to deſtroy the royal family to raiſe himſelf to the throne. He made war againſt the Bactrians, and re-conquered Egypt, that had revolted, with the aſſiſtance of the Athenians, and was remarkable for his equity and moderation. One of his hands was longer than the other, whence he has been called Macrochir or Longimanus. He reigned 39 years, and died B. C. 425. C. Nep. in Reg.—Plut. in Artax.——The 2d of that name, king of Perſia, was ſirnamed Mnemon, on account of his extenſive memory. He was ſon of Darius the ſecond, by Paryſatis the daughter of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and had three brothers, Cyrus, Oſtanes, and Oxathres. His name was Arſaces, which he changed into Artaxerxes when he aſcended the throne. His brother Cyrus was of ſuch an ambitious diſpoſition, that he reſolved to make himſelf king, in oppoſition to Artaxerxes. Paryſatis always favored Cyrus; and when he had attempted the life of Artaxerxes, ſhe obtained his pardon by her entreaties and influence. Cyrus, who had been appointed over Lydia and the ſea coaſts, aſſembled a large army under various pretences, and at laſt marched againſt his brother at the head of 100,000 Barbarians and 13,000 Greeks. He was oppoſed by Artaxerxes with 900,000 men, and a bloody battle was fought at Cunaxa, in which Cyrus was killed, and his forces routed. It has been reported, that Cyrus was killed by Artaxerxes, who was ſo deſirous of the honor, that he put to death two men for ſaying that they had killed him. The Greeks, who had aſſiſted Cyrus againſt his brother, though at the diſtance of above 600 leagues from their country, made their way through the territories of the enemy; and nothing is more famous in the Grecian hiſtory, than the retreat of the ten thouſand. After he was delivered from the attacks of his brother, Artaxerxes ſtirred up a war among the Greeks againſt Sparta, and exerted all his influence to weaken the power of the Greeks. He married two of his own daughters, called Atoſſa and Ameſtris, and named his eldeſt ſon Darius to be ſucceſſor. Darius however conſpired againſt his father, and was put to death; and Ochus, one of the younger ſons, called alſo Artaxerxes, made his way to the throne, by cauſing his elder brothers Ariaſpes and Arſames to be aſſaſſinated. It is ſaid that Artaxerxes died of a broken heart, in conſequence of his ſon's unnatural behaviour, in the 94th year of his age, after a reign of 46 years, B. C. 358. Artaxerxes had 150 children by his 350 concubines, and only four legitimate ſons. Plut. in vitâ.—C. Nepos in Reg.—Juſtin. 10, c. 1, &c.—Diod. 13, &c.——The 3d, ſirnamed Ochus, ſucceeded his father Artaxerxes 2d, and eſtabliſhed himſelf on his throne by murdering above 80 of his neareſt relations. He puniſhed with death one of his officers who conſpired againſt him, and recovered Egypt, which had revolted, deſtroyed Sidon, and ravaged all Syria. He made war againſt the Caduſii, and greatly rewarded a private man called Codomanus for his uncommon valor. But his behaviour in Egypt, his cruelty towards the inhabitants, offended his ſubjects, and Bagoas at laſt obliged his phyſician to poiſon him, B. C. 337, and afterwards gave his fleſh to be devoured by cats, and made handles for ſwords with his bones. Codomanus, on account of his virtues, was ſoon after made king by the people; and that he might ſeem to poſſeſs as much dignity as the houſe of Artaxerxes, he reigned under the name of Darius the 3d. Juſtin. 10, c. 3. —Diod. 7.—Ælian. V. H. 6, c. 8.

ARTAXERXES or ARTAXARES 1ſt, a common ſoldier of Perſia, who killed Artabanus A. D. 228, and erected Perſia again into a kingdom, which had been extinct ſince the death of Darius. Severus the Roman emperor conquered him, and obliged him to remain within his kingdom. Herodian. 5.——One of his ſucceſſors, ſon of Sapor, bore his name, and reigned 11 years, during which he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his cruelties.

ARTAXIAS, ſon of Artavaſdes, king of Armenia, was proclaimed king by his father's troops. He oppoſed Antony, by whom he he was defeated, and became ſo odious that the Romans, at the requeſt of the Armenians, raiſed Tigranes to the throne.——Another, ſon of Polemon, whoſe original name was Zeno. After the expulſion of Vennones from Armenia, he was made king by Germanicus. Tacit. 6. Ann. c. 31.——A general of Antiochus. Vid. Artaxa.

C.——A phyſician in the age of Adrian.——A man in the reign of Antoninus, who wrote a learned work on the interpretation of dreams, ſtill extant; the beſt edition of which is that of Rigaltius, Paris, 4to. 1604. to which is annexed Achmetis oneirocritica.——A man of Cnidus, ſon to the hiſtorian Theopompus. He had a ſchool at Rome, and he wrote a book on illuſtrious men, not extant. As he was a friend of J. Cæſar, he wrote down an account of the conſpiracy which was formed againſt him. He gave it to the dictator from among the crowd as he was going to the ſenate, but J. Cæſar put it with other papers he held in his hand, thinking it to be of no material conſequence. Plut. in Cæſ.

ARTĔMIS, the Greek name of Diana. Her feſtivals, called Artemiſia, were celebrated in ſeveral parts of Greece, particularly at Delphi, where they offered to the goddeſs a mullet, which, as was ſuppoſed, bore ſome affinity to the goddeſs of hunting, becauſe it is ſaid to hunt and kill the ſea hare. There was a ſolemnity of the ſame name at Syracuſe; it laſted three days, which were ſpent in banqueting and diverſions. Athen. 7.

ARTEMISIA, daughter of Lygdamis of Halicarnaſſus, reigned over Halicarnaſſus and the neighbouring country. She aſſiſted Xerxes in his expedition againſt Greece with a fleet, and her valor was ſo great that the monarch obſerved that all his men fought like women, and all his women like men. The Athenians were ſo aſhamed of fighting againſt a woman, that they offered a reward of 10,000 drachms for her head. It is ſaid that ſhe was fond of a youth of Abydos, called Dardanus, and that, to puniſh his diſdain, ſhe put out his eyes while he was aſleep, and afterwards leaped down the promontory of Leucas. Herodot. 7, c. 99. l. 8, c. 68, &c.—Juſtin. 2, c. 12.——There was alſo another queen of Caria of that name, often confounded with the daughter of Lygdamis. She was daughter of Hecatomnus king of Caria or Halicarnaſſus, and was married to her own brother Mauſolus, famous for his perſonal beauty. She was ſo fond of her huſband, that at his death ſhe drank in her liquor his aſhes after his body had been burned, and erected to his memory a monument, which, for its grandeur and magnificence was called one of the ſeven wonders of the world. This monument ſhe called Mauſoleum, a name which has been given from that time to all monuments of unuſual ſplendor. She invited all the literary men of her age, and propoſed rewards to him who compoſed the beſt elegiac panegyric upon her huſband. The prize was adjudged to Theopompus. She was ſo inconſolable for the death of her huſband, that ſhe died through grief two years after. Vitruv.—Strab. 14.—Plin. 36, c. 5.

He was killed in the battle, and 56,000 of his men ſhared his fate, and 5400 were taken priſoners; about 8000 Romans were killed. The head of Aſdrubal was cut off, and ſome days after thrown into the camp of Annibal, who, in the moment that he was in the greateſt expectations for a promiſed ſupply, exclaimed at the ſight, "In loſing Aſdrubal, I loſe all my happineſs, and Carthage all her hopes." Aſdrubal had before made an attempt to penetrate into Italy by ſea, but had been defeated by the governor of Sardinia. Liv. 21, 23. 27, &c.—Polyb.—Horat. 4. od. 4.——A Carthaginian general, ſirnamed Calvus, appointed governor of Sardinia, and taken priſoner by the Romans. Liv.——Another, ſon of Giſgon, appointed general of the Carthaginian forces in Spain, in the time of the great Annibal. He made head againſt the Romans in Africa, with the aſſiſtance of Scyphax, but he was ſoon after defeated by Scipio. He died B. C. 206. Liv.——Another who adviſed his countrymen to make peace with Rome, and upbraided Annibal for laughing in the Carthaginian ſenate. Liv.——A grandſon of Maſiniſſa, murdered in the ſenate-houſe by the Carthaginians.——Another, whoſe camp was deſtroyed in Africa by Scipio, though at the head of 20,000 men, in the laſt Punic war. When all was loſt, he fled to the enemy, and begged his life. Scipio ſhewed him to the Carthaginians, upon which his wife, with a thouſand imprecations, threw herſelf and her two children into the flames of the temple of Æſculapius, which ſhe, and others, had ſet on fire. He was not of the ſame family as Hannibal. Liv. 51.——A Carthaginian general, conquered by L. Cæcilius Metellus in Sicily, in a battle in which he loſt 130 elephants. Theſe animals were led in triumph all over Italy by the conquerors.

Aſellio (Sempronius), an hiſtorian and military tribune, who wrote an account of the actions in which he was preſent. Dionyſ. Hal.

Asia, one of the three parts of the ancient world, ſeparated from Europe by the Tanais, the Euxine, Ægean, and Mediterranean ſeas. The Nile and Egypt divide it from Africa. It receives its name from Aſia, the daughter of Oceanus. This part of the globe has given birth to many of the greateſt monarchies of the univerſe, and to the ancient inhabitants of Aſia we are indebted for moſt of the arts and ſciences. The ſoil is fruitful, and abounds with all the neceſſaries as well as luxuries of life. Aſia was divided into many different empires, provinces, and ſtates, of which the moſt conſpicuous were the Aſſyrian and Perſian monarchies. The Aſſyrian monarchy, according to Euſebius, laſted 1240 years, and according to Juſtin, 1300 years, down to the year of the world 4380. The empire of Perſia exiſted 228 years, till the death of Darius the 3d, whom Alexander the Great conquered. The empire of the Medes laſted 259 years, according to Euſebius, or leſs, according to others, till the reign of Aſtyages, who was conquered by Cyrus the Great, who transferred the power of the Medes, and founded the Perſian monarchy. It was in Aſia that the military valor of the Macedonians, and the bold retreat of the 10,000 Greeks were ſo conſpicuouſly diſplayed. It is in that part of the world that we are to look for the more viſible progreſs of luxury, deſpotiſm, ſedition, effeminacy, and diſſipation. Aſia was generally divided into Major and Minor. Aſia Major was the moſt extenſive, and comprehended all the eaſtern parts; and Aſia Minor was a large country in the form of a peninſula, whoſe boundaries may be known by drawing a line from the bay of Iſſus, in a northern direction, to the eaſtern part of the Euxine Sea. Aſia Minor has been ſubject to many revolutions. It was tributary to the Scythians for upwards of 1300 years, and was a long time in the power of the Lydians, Medes, &c. The western parts of Asia Minor were the receptacle of all the ancient emigrations from Greece, and it was totally peopled by Grecian colonies. The Romans generally and indiscriminately called Asia Minor by the name of Asia. Strab.—Mela.—Justin.—Plin.—Tacit. &c.——One of the Oceanides, who married Japetus, and gave her name to one of the three quarters of the ancient globe. Apollod. 1, c. 2.——One of the Nereides. Hygin.——A mountain of Laconia. Paus. 3, c. 24.

Asinārius, a river of Sicily, where the Athenian generals, Demosthenes and Nicias, were taken prisoners.

Asĭne, one of the Sporades.——An island of the Adriatic.——Three towns of Peloponnesus bore that name, viz. in Laconia, Argolis, and Messenia.

Asĭnes, a river of Sicily.

Asinius Gallus, son of Asinius Pollio the orator, married Vipsania after she had been divorced by Tiberius. This marriage gave rise to a secret enmity between the emperor and Asinius, who starved himself to death, either voluntarily, or by order of his Imperial enemy. He had six sons by his wife. He wrote a comparison between his father and Cicero, in which he gave a decided superiority to the former. Tacit. 1 & 5. Ann.—Dio. 58.—Plin. 7, ep. 4.——Marcellus, grandson of Asinius Pollio, was accused of some misdemeanors, but acquitted, &c. Tacit. 14. Ann.——Pollio, an excellent orator, poet, and historian, intimate with Augustus. He triumphed over the Dalmatians, and wrote an account of the wars of Cæsar and Pompey, in 17 books, besides poems. He refused to answer some verses written against him by Augustus, "because," said he, "you have the power to proscribe me, should my answer prove offensive." He died in the 80th year of his age, A. D. 4. He was consul with Cn. Domitius Calvinus, A. U. C. 712. It is to him that the fourth of Virgil's Bucolics is inscribed. Quintil.—Sueton. in Cæs. 30 & 55.—Dio. 37, 49, 55.—Senec. de tranq. Ani. & ep. 100.—Plin. 7, c. 30.—Tacit. 6.—Paterc. 2.—Plut. in Cæs.——A commander of Mauritania, under the first emperors, &c. Tacit. Hist. 2.——An historian in the age of Pompey.——Another in the third century.——Quadratus, a man who published the history of Parthia, Greece, and Rome.

Asius, a son of Dymas, brother of Hecuba. He assisted Priam in the Trojan war. Homer.——A poet of Samos, who wrote about the genealogy of ancient heroes and heroines. Paus. 7, c. 4.——A son of Imbracus, who accompanied Æneas into Italy. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 123.

Asius Campus, a place near the Cayster.

Asnāus, a mountain of Macedonia, near which the river Aous flows. Liv. 32, c. 5.

Asōphis, a small country of Peloponnesus, near the Asopus.

Asōpia, the ancient name of Sicyon. Paus. 2, c. 1.

Asōpiădes, a patronymic of Æacus, son of Ægina, the daughter of Asopus. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 484.

Asōpis, the daughter of the Asopus.——A daughter of Thespius, mother of Mentor. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

Asōpus, a river of Thessaly, falling into the bay of Malia, at the north of Thermopylæ. Strab. 8.——A river of Bœotia, rising near Platæa, and flowing into the Euripus, after it has separated the country of the Thebans and Platæans. Paus. 9, c. 4.——A river of Asia, flowing into the Lycus near Laodicea.——A river of Peloponnesus, passing by Sicyon.——Another of Macedonia, flowing near Heraclea. Strab. &c.——A river of Phœnicia.——A son of Neptune, who gave his name to a river of Peloponnesus. Three of his daughters are particularly celebrated, Ægina, Salamis, and Ismene. Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 3, c. 12.—Paus. 2. c. 12.

Aspamithres, a favorite eunuch of Xerxes, who conspired with Artabanus to destroy the king and the royal family, &c. Ctesias.

Asparagium, a town near Dyrrhachium. Cæs. bell. Civ. 3, c. 30.

Aspăsia, a daughter of Hermotimus of Phocæa, famous for her personal charms and elegance. She was priestess of the sun, mistress to Cyrus, and afterwards to his brother Artaxerxes, from whom she passed to Darius. She was called Milto, Vermillion, on account of the beauty of her complexion. Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 1.—Plut. in Artax.——Another woman, daughter of Axiochus, born at Miletus. She came to Athens, where she taught eloquence. Socrates was proud to be among her scholars. She so captivated Pericles, by her mental and personal accomplishments, that he became her pupil, and and at last took her for his mistress and wife. He was so fond of her, that he made war against Samos at her instigation. The behaviour of Pericles towards Aspasia, greatly corrupted the morals of the Athenians, and introduced dissipation and lasciviousness into the state. Some have confounded the mistress of Pericles with Aspasia the daughter of Hermotimus. Plut. in Pericl. —Quintil. 11.——The wife of Xenophon was also called Aspasia, if we follow the improper interpretation given by some to Cic. de Inv. 1, c. 31.

Aspasirus, a peripatetic philosopher in the 2d century, whose commentaries on different subjects were highly valued.——A sophist, who wrote a panegyric on Adrian.

Asserīni, a people of Sicily.

Assōrus, a town of Sicily, between Enna and Argyrium.

Assos, a town of Lycia on the sea coast.

Assyria, a large country of Asia, whose boundaries have been different in its flourishing times. At first it was bounded by the Lycus and Caprus; but the name of Assyria, more generally speaking, is applied to all that territory which lies between Media, Mesopotamia, Armenia, and Babylon. The Assyrian empire is the most ancient in the world. It was founded by Ninus or Belus, B. C. 2059, according to some authors, and lasted till the reign of Sardanapalus, the 31st sovereign since Ninus, B. C. 820. According to Eusebius, it flourished for 1240 years; according to Justin, 1300 years; but Herodotus says, that its duration was not above 5 or 600 years. Among the different monarchs of the Assyrian empire, Semiramis greatly distinguished herself, and extended the boundaries of her dominions as far as Æthiopia and Libya. In ancient authors, the Assyrians are often called Syrians, and the Syrians Assyrians. The Assyrians assisted Priam in the Trojan war, and sent him Memnon with an army. The king of Assyria generally stiled himself king of kings, as a demonstration of his power and greatness. The country is now called Curdistan. Vid. Syria. Strab. 16. Herodot. 1 & 2.—Justin. 1.—Plin. 6, c. 13 & 26.—Ptol. 1, c. 2.—Diod. 2.—Mela. 1, c. 2.

Asta, a city of Spain.

Astacœni, a people of India, near the Indus. Strab. 15.

Astăcus, a town of Bithynia, built by Astacus, son of Neptune and Olbia, or rather by a colony of Megara and Athens. Lysimachus destroyed it, and carried the inhabitants to the town of Nicomedia, which was then lately built. Pausa. 5, c. 12.—Arrian. —Strab. 17.——A city of Acarnania. Plin. 5.

Astăpus, a river of Æthiopia, falling into the Nile.

Astarte, a powerful divinity of Syria, the same as the Venus of the Greeks. She had a famous temple at Hierapolis in Syria, which was served by 300 priests, who were always employed in offering sacrifices. She was represented in medals with a long habit, and a mantle over it, tucked up on the left arm. She had one hand stretched forward, and held in the other a crooked staff in the form of a cross. Lucian. de Deâ Syriâ.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 23.

Aster, a dexterous archer of Amphipolis, who offered his services to Philip king of Macedonia. Upon being slighted, he retired into the city, and aimed an arrow at Philip, who pressed it with a siege. The arrow, on which was written, "aimed at Philip's right eye," struck the king's eye, and put it out; and Philip, to return the pleasantry, threw back the same arrow, with these words, "If Philip takes the town, Aster shall be hanged." The conqueror kept his word. Lucian. de Hist. Scrib.

Astĕria, a daughter of Ceus, one of the Titans, by Phœbe, daughter of Cœlus and Terra. She married Perses, son of Crius, by whom she had the celebrated Hecate. She enjoyed for a long time the favors of Jupiter, under the form of an eagle; but falling under his diſpleaſure, ſhe was changed into a quail, called Ortyx by the Greeks; whence the name of Ortygia, given to that iſland in the Archipelago, where ſhe retired. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 4.—Hygin. fab. 58.—Apollod. 1, c. 2, &c.——A town of Greece, whoſe inhabitants went to the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2, v. 782.——One of the daughters of Danaus, who married Chætus, ſon of Ægyptus. Apollod. 2.——One of the daughters of Atlas, mother of Oenomaus, king of Piſa. Hygin. fab. 250.——A miſtreſs of Gyges, to whom Horace wrote three odes, to comfort her during her lover's abſence.

Astĕrion & Astĕrius, a river of Peloponneſus, which flowed through the country of Argolis. This river had three daughters, Euboea, Proſymna, and Acræa. Pauſ. 2, c. 17.——A ſon of Cometes, who was one of the Argonauts. Apollon. 1.——A ſtatuary, ſon of Æſchylus. Pauſ.——A ſon of Minos 2d, king of Crete, by Paſiphae. He was killed by Theſeus, though he was thought the ſtrongeſt of his age. Apollodorus ſuppoſes him to be the ſame as the famous Minotaur. According to ſome, Aſterion was ſon of Teutamus, one of the deſcendants of Æolus, and they ſay that he was ſirnamed Jupiter, becauſe he had carried away Europa, by whom he had Minos the 1ſt. Diod. 4.—Apollod. 3.—Pauſ. 2, c. 31.——A ſon of Neleus and Chloris. Apollod. 1, c. 12.

Asterodia, the wife of Endymion. Pauſ. 5, c. 1.

Asterŏpe & Asteropēa, one of the Pleiades, who were beloved by the gods and moſt illuſtrious heroes, and made conſtellations after death.——A daughter of Pelias, king of Iolchos, who aſſiſted her ſiſters to kill her father, whom Medea promiſed to reſtore to life. Her grave was ſeen in Arcadia, in the time of Pauſanias, 8, c. 11.——A daughter of Deion by Diomede. Apollod. 1.——The wife of Æſacus. Id. 3.

Asteropæus, a king of Pæonia, ſon of Pelegon. He aſſiſted Priam in the Trojan war, and was killed by Achilles. Homer. Il. 17. &c.

Asterūsius, a mountain at the ſouth of Crete.——A town of Arabia Felix.

Astinŏme, the wife of Hipponous.

Astiŏchus, a general of Lacedæmon, who conquered the Athenians near Cnidus, and took Phocæa and Cumæ, B. C. 411.

Astræa, a daughter of Aſtræus, king of Arcadia, or, according to others, of Titan, Saturn's brother, by Aurora. Some make her daughter of Jupiter and Themis. She was called Juſtice, of which virtue ſhe was the goddeſs. She lived upon the earth, as the poets mention, during the golden age; but the wickedneſs and impiety of mankind drove her to heaven in the brazen and iron ages, and ſhe was placed among the conſtellations of the zodiac, under the name of Virgo. She is repreſented as a virgin, with a ſtern, but majeſtic countenance, holding a pair of ſcales in one hand, and a ſword in the other. Senec. in Octav.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 149.—Arat. 1. Phænom. v. 98.—Heſiod. Theog.

Astræus, one of the Titans who made war againſt Jupiter.——A river of Macedonia, near Thermæ. Ælian. H. V. 15, c. 1.

Astu, a Greek word which ſignifies city, generally applied by way of diſtinction, to Athens, which was the moſt capital city of Greece. The word urbs is applied with the ſame meaning of ſuperiority to Rome, and πολις to Alexandria, the capital of Egypt, as alſo to Troy.

Astur, an Etrurian, who aſſiſted Æneas againſt Turnus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 180.

Astŭra, a ſmall village of Latium, where Antony's ſoldiers cut off Cicero's head.

Astŭres, a people of Hiſpania Tarraconenſis, who ſpend all their lives in digging for mines of ore. Lucan. 4, v. 298.—Ital. 1, v. 231.

Astyăge, a daughter of Ipheus, who married Periphas, by whom ſhe had ſome children, among whom was Antion, the father of Ixion.

Astyăges, ſon of Cyaxares, was the laſt king of Media. He was father to Mandane, whom he gave in marriage to Cambyſes, an ignoble perſon of Perſia, becauſe he was told by a dream, that his daughter's ſon would diſpoſſeſs him of his crown. From ſuch a marriage he hoped that none but mean and ignorant children could be raiſed; but he was diſappointed, and though he had expoſed his daughter's ſon by the effects of a ſecond dream, he was deprived of his crown by his grandſon, after a reign of 35 years. Aſtyages was very cruel and oppreſſive; and Harpagus, one of his officers, whoſe ſon he had wantonly murdered, encouraged Mandane's ſon, who was called Cyrus, to take up arms againſt his grandfather, and he conquered him and took him priſoner, 559 B. C. Xenophon, in his Cyropædia, relates a different ſtory, and aſſerts that Cyrus and Aſtyages lived in the moſt undiſturbed friendſhip together. Juſtin. 1, c. 4, &c.—Herodot. 1, c. 74, 75, &c.——A grammarian who wrote a commentary on Callimachus.——A man changed into a ſtone by Meduſa's head. Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 6.

Astyălus, a Trojan killed by Neoptolemus. Homer. Il. 6.

ATYS, an ancient king of Lydia. Herodot. 1, c. 7.——A ſon of Crœſus king of Lydia. He was forbidden the uſe of all weapons by his father, who had dreamt that he had been killed. Some time after this, Atys prevailed on his father to permit him to go to hunt a wild boar, which laid waſte the country of Myſia, and he was killed in the attempt by Adraſtus, whom Crœſus had appointed guardian over his ſon, and thus the apprehenſions of the monarch were realized. Herodot. 1, c. 34, &c.——Vid. Adraſtus.——A Trojan, who came to Italy with Æneas, and is ſuppoſed to be the progenitor of the family of the Attii at Rome. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 568.——A youth to whom Iſmene the daughter of Œdipus was promiſed in marriage. He was killed by Tydeus before his nuptials. Stat. Theb. 8, v. 598.——A ſon of Limniace the daughter of the river Ganges, who aſſiſted Cepheus in preventing the marriage of Andromeda, and was killed by Perſeus with a burning log of wood. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 47.——A celebrated ſhepherd of Phrygia, of whom the mother of the gods generally called Cybele became enamoured. She entruſted him with the care of her temple, and made him promiſe he always would live in celibacy. He violated his vow by an amour with the nymph Sangaris, for which the goddeſs made him ſo inſane and delirious, that he caſtrated himſelf with a ſharp ſtone. This was afterwards intentionally made by his ſacerdotal ſucceſſors in the ſervice of Cybele, to prevent their breaking their vows of perpetual chaſtity. This account is the moſt general and moſt approved. Others ſay, that the goddeſs became fond of Atys, becauſe he had introduced her feſtivals in the greateſt part of Aſia Minor, and that ſhe herſelf mutilated him. Pauſanias relates, in Achaic. c. 17, that Atys was the ſon of the daughter of the Sangar, who became pregnant by putting the bough of an almond tree in her boſom. Jupiter, as the paſſage mentions, once had an amorous dream, and ſome of the impurity of the god fell upon the earth, which ſoon after produced a monſter of an human form, with the characteriſtics of the two ſexes. This monſter was called Agdiſtis, and was deprived by the gods of thoſe parts which diſtinguiſh the male ſex. From the mutilated parts which were thrown on the ground, roſe an almond tree, one of whoſe branches a nymph of the Sangar gathered, and placed in her boſom as mentioned above. Atys, as ſoon as born, was expoſed in a wood, but preſerved by a ſhe goat. The genius Agdiſtis ſaw him in the wood, and was captivated with his beauty. As Atys was going to celebrate his nuptials with the daughter of the king of Peſſinus, Agdiſtis, who was jealous of his rival, inſpired by his enchantments the king and his future ſon-in-law with ſuch an uncommon fury, that they both attacked and mutilated one another in the ſtruggle. Ovid. ſays, Met. 10, fab. 2, &c. that Cybele changed Atys into a pine-tree as he was going to lay violent hands upon himſelf, and, ever after, that tree was ſacred to the mother of the gods. After his death, Atys received divine honors, and temples were raiſed to his memory, particularly at Dymæ. Catull. de Aty. & Berec.—Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 223, &c.—Lucian. in Deâ Syriâ.——Sylvius, ſon of Albius Sylvius, was king of Alba. Liv. 1, c. 3.

AVARĪCUM, a ſtrong and fortified town of Gaul. Cæſ. bell. G. 7.

AVENTĪNUS, a ſon of Hercules, by Rhea, who aſſiſted Turnus againſt Æneas. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 657.——A king of Alba, buried upon mount Aventine. Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 51.——One of the ſeven hills on which part of the city of Rome was built. It was 13,300 feet in circumference, and was given to the people to build houſes upon, by king Ancus Martius. It was not reckoned within the precincts of the city till the reign of the emperor Claudius, becauſe the ſoothſayers looked upon it as a place of ill omen, as Remus had been buried there, whoſe blood had been criminally ſhed. The word is derived, according to ſome, ab avibus, becauſe birds were fond of the place. Others ſuppoſe that it receives its name becauſe Aventinus, one of the Alban kings, was buried upon it. Juno, the Moon, Diana, Bona Dea, Hercules, and the goddeſs of Victory and Liberty, had magnificent temples built upon it. Varro. de L. L. 4.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 235.—Liv. 1, c. 33.

AVERNUS or AVERNA, a lake of Campania, near Baiæ, whoſe waters were ſo unwholeſome and putrid, that no birds were ſeen on its banks; hence its original name was ἀορνος, avibus carens. The ancients made it the entrance of hell, as alſo one of its rivers. Its circumference was five ſtadia, and its depth could not be aſcertained. The waters of the Avernus were indiſpenſably neceſſary in all inchantments and magical proceſſes. It may be obſerved, that all lakes whoſe ſtagnated waters were putrid and offenſive to the ſmell, were indiſcriminately called Averna. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 5.—12, &c. l. 6, v. 201, &c.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Strab. 5.—Diod. 4.—Ariſtot. de Adm.

AUGA & AUGE & AUGEA, daughter of Aleus king of Tegea, by Neæra, was raviſhed by Hercules, and brought forth a ſon, whom ſhe expoſed in the woods to conceal her amours from her father. The child was preſerved, and called Telephus. Aleus was informed of his daughter's ſhame, and gave her to Nauplius to put to death. Nauplius refuſed to perform the cruel office, and gave Auga to Teuthras, king of Myſia, who, being without iſſue, adopted her as his daughter. Some time after the dominions of Teuthras were invaded by an enemy, and the king promiſed his crown and daughter to him who could deliver him from the impending calamity. Telephus, who had been directed by the oracle to go to the court of Teuthras, if he wiſhed to find his parents, offered his ſervices to the king, and they were accepted. As he was going to unite himſelf to Auge, in conſequence of the victory he had obtained, Auge ruſhed from him with ſecret horror, and the gods ſent a ſerpent to ſeparate them. Auge implored the aid of Hercules, who made her ſon known to her, and ſhe returned with him to Tegea. Pauſanias ſays, that Auge was confined in a coffer with her infant ſon, and thrown into the ſea, where, after being preſerved and protected by Minerva, ſhe was found by king Teuthras. Apollod. 2 & 3.—Pauſ. 8, c. 4. —Hygin. fab. 99 & 100.

AUGARUS, an Arabian, who, for his good offices, obtained the favors of Pompey, whom he vilely deceived. Dio. ——A king of Oſroene, whom Caracalla impriſoned, after he had given him ſolemn promiſes of friendſhip and ſupport. Dio. 78.

AUGEÆ, a town of Laconia. Pauſ. 3, c. 21.——Another of Locris.

AUGIAS & AUGEAS, ſon of Eleus or Elius, was one of the Argonauts, and afterwards aſcended the throne of Elis. He had an immenſe number of oxen and goats, and the ſtables in which they were kept had never been cleaned, ſo that the taſk ſeemed an impoſſibility to any man. Hercules undertook it on promiſe of receiving for a reward, the tenth part of the herds of Augias, or ſomething equivalent. The hero changed the courſe of the river Alpheus, or, according to others, of the Peneus, which immediately carried away the dung and filth from the ſtables. Augias refuſed the promiſed recompence, on pretence that Hercules had made uſe of artifice, and had not experienced any labor or trouble, & farther drove his own ſon Phyleus from his kingdom, becauſe he ſupported the claims of the hero. The refuſal was a declaration of war. Hercules conquered Elis, put to death Augias, and gave the crown to Phyleus. Pauſanias ſays, 5, c. 2 & 3, that Hercules ſpared the life of Augias for the ſake of his ſon, and that Phyleus went to ſettle in Dulichium; and that at the death of Augias, his other ſon, Agaſthenes, ſucceeded to the throne. Augias received, after his death, the honors which were generally paid to a hero. Augias has been called the ſon of Sol, becauſe Elius ſignifies the ſun. The proverb of Augean ſtable is now applied to an impoſſibility. Hygin. fab. 14.—Plin. 17, c. 9.—Strab. 8.—Apollod. 2.

AUGĬLÆ, a people of Africa, who ſuppoſed that there were no gods except the manes of the dead, of whom they ſought oracles. Mela. 1.

AUGĪNUS, a mountain of Liguria. Liv. 39, c. 2.

AUGŬRES, certain officers at Rome who foretold future events; whence their name, ab avium garritu. They were firſt created by Romulus, to the number of three. Servius Tullius added a fourth, and the tribunes of the people A. U. C. 454, increaſed the number to nine; and Sylla added ſix more, during his dictatorſhip. They had a particular college, and the chief amongſt them was called magiſter collegii. Their office was honorable; and if any one of them was convicted of any crime, he could not not be deprived of his privileges; an indulgence granted to no other sacerdotal body at Rome. The augur generally sat on a high tower, to make his observations. His face was turned towards the east, and he had the north at his left, and the south at his right. With a crooked staff he divided the face of the heavens into four different parts, and afterwards sacrificed to the gods, covering his head with his vestment. There were generally five things from which the augurs drew omens: the first consisted in observing the phænomena of the heavens, such as thunder, lightening, comets, &c. The second kind of omen was drawn from the chirping or flying of birds. The third was from the sacred chickens, whose eagerness or indifference in eating the bread which was thrown to them, was looked upon as lucky or unlucky. The fourth was from quadrupeds, from their crossing or appearing in some unaccustomed place. The fifth was from different casualties, which were called Dira, such as spilling salt on a table, or wine upon one's cloaths, hearing strange noises, stumbling or sneezing, meeting a wolf, hare, fox, or pregnant bitch. From such superstitious notions did the Romans draw their prophecies; the sight of birds on the left hand was always deemed a lucky object, and the words sinister & lævus, though generally supposed to be terms of ill luck, were always used by the augurs in an auspicious sense. Cic. de Div. —Liv. 1, &c.—Dionys. Hal.—Ovid. Fast.

AUGUSTA, a name given to seventy cities in the Roman provinces, in honor of Augustus Cæsar.——London, as capital of the country of the Trinobantes, was called Augusta Trinobantina.——Messalina, famous for her debaucheries, was called Augusta, as wife of the emperor Claudius. Juv. 6, v. 118.

AUGUSTĀLIA, a festival at Rome, in commemoration of the day on which Augustus returned to Rome, after he had established peace over the different parts of the empire.

AUGUSTĪNUS, bishop of Hippo, in Africa, distinguished himself by his writings, as well as by the austerity of his life. In his works, which are numerous, he displayed the powers of a great genius, and an extensive acquaintance with the philosophy of Plato. He died in the 76th year of his age, A. D. 430. The best edition of his works is that of the Benedict. fol. Ant. 1700 to 1703, 12 vols.

AUGUSTŬLUS, the last Roman emperor of the West, A. D. 475, conquered by Odoacer, king of the Heruli.

AUGUSTUS OCTAVIĀNUS CÆSAR, second emperor of Rome, was son of Octavius a senator, and Accia daughter of Julius, and sister to Julius Cæsar. He was adopted by his uncle Cæsar, and inherited the greatest part of his fortune. He lost his father at the age of four; and though only 18 when his uncle was murdered, he hastened to Rome, where he ingratiated himself with the senate and people, and received the honors of the consulship two years after, as the reward of his hypocrisy. Though his youth and his inexperience were ridiculed by his enemies, who branded him with the appellation of boy, yet he rose in consequence by his prudence and valor, and made war against his opponents, on pretence of avenging the death of his murdered uncle. But when he perceived that by making him fight against Antony, the senate wished to debilitate both antagonists, he changed his views, and uniting himself with his enemy, soon formed the second triumvirate, in which his cruel proscriptions shed the innocent blood of 300 senators and 200 knights, and did not even spare the life of his friend Cicero. By the divisions which were made among the triumvirs, Augustus retained for himself the more important provinces of the west, and banished, as if it were, his colleagues, Lepidus and Antony, to more distant territories. But as long as the murderers of Cæsar were alive, the reigning tyrants had reasons for apprehension, and therefore the forces of the triumvirate were directed against the partizans of Brutus and the senate. The battle was decided at Philippi, where it is said that the valor and conduct of Antony alone preserved the combined armies, and effected the defeat of the republican forces. The head of the unfortunate Brutus was carried to Rome, and in insolent revenge thrown at the foot of Cæsar's statue. On his return to Italy, Augustus rewarded his soldiers with the lands of those that had been proscribed; but among the sufferers were many who had never injured the conqueror of Philippi, especially Virgil, whose modest application procured the restitution of his property. The friendship which subsisted between Augustus and Antony was broken as soon as the fears of a third rival vanished away, and the aspiring heir of Cæsar was easily induced to take up arms by the little jealousies and resentment of Fulvia. Her death, however, retarded hostilities; the two rivals were reconciled; their united forces were successfully directed against the younger Pompey; and to strengthen their friendship, Antony agreed to marry Octavia, the sister of Augustus. But as this step was political, and not dictated by affection, Octavia was slighted, and Antony resigned himself to the pleasures and company of the beautiful Cleopatra. Augustus was incensed, and immediately took up arms to avenge the wrongs wrongs of his ſiſter, and perhaps more eagerly to remove a man whoſe power and exiſtence kept him in continual alarms, and made him dependent. Both parties met at Actium, B. C. 31. to decide the fate of Rome. Antony was ſupported by all the power of the eaſt, and Auguſtus by Italy. Cleopatra fled from the battle with 60 ſhips, and her flight ruined the intereſt of Antony, who followed her into Egypt. The conqueror ſoon after paſſed into Egypt, beſieged Alexandria, and honored, with a magnificent funeral, the unfortunate Roman, and the celebrated queen, whom the fear of being led in the victor's triumph at Rome had driven to commit ſuicide. After he had eſtabliſhed peace all over the world, Auguſtus ſhut up the gates of the temple of Janus, the year our Savior was born. It is ſaid he twice reſolved to lay down the ſupreme power, immediately after the victory obtained over Antony, and afterwards on account of his ill health; but his friend Mecænas diſſuaded him, and obſerved, that he would leave it to be the prey of the moſt powerful, and expoſe himſelf to ingratitude and to danger. He died at Nola, in the 75th year of his age, A. D. 14, after he had held the ſovereign power during 44 years. Auguſtus was an active emperor, and conſulted the good of the Romans with the moſt anxious care. He viſited all the provinces except Africa and Sardinia, and his conſummate prudence and experience gave riſe to many ſalutary laws; but it may be ſaid that he finiſhed with a good grace, what he began with cruelty. While making himſelf abſolute, he took care to leave his countrymen the ſhadow of liberty; and if, under the character and office of perpetual tribune, of prieſt and imperator, he was inveſted with all the power of ſovereignty, he guarded againſt offending the jealous Romans, by not aſſuming the regal title. His refuſal to read the letters he found after Pompey's defeat, aroſe more from fear than honor, and he dreaded the diſcovery of names which would have perhaps united to ſacrifice his ambition. His good qualities and many virtues he perhaps never poſſeſſed, have been tranſmitted to poſterity by the pen of adulation or gratitude, in the poems of Virgil, Horace, and Ovid. To diſtinguiſh himſelf from the obſcurity of the Octavii, and, if poſſible, to ſuppreſs the remembrance of his uncle's violent fate, he aſpired after a new title; and the ſubmiſſive ſenate yielded to his ambition, by giving him the honorable appellation of Auguſtus. He has been accuſed of licentiouſneſs and adultery, by his biographer; but the goodneſs of his heart, and the fidelity of his friendſhip, which in ſome inſtances he poſſeſſed, made ſome amends for his natural foibles. He was ambitious of being thought handſome; and as he was publicly reported to be the ſon of Apollo, according to his mother's declaration, he wiſhed his flatterers to repreſent him with the figure and attributes of that god. Like Apollo, his eyes were clear, and he affected to have it thought that they poſſeſſed ſome divine irradiation; and was well pleaſed, if, when he fixed his looks upon any body, they held down their eyes as if overcome by the glaring brightneſs of the ſun. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning; he was a perfect maſter of the Greek language, and wrote ſome tragedies, beſides memoirs of his life, and other works, all now loſt. He was married three times; to Claudia, to Scribonia, and Livia; but he was unhappy in his matrimonial connections, and his only daughter, Julia by Scribonia, diſgraced herſelf and her father by the debauchery and licentiouſneſs of her manners. He recommended, at his death, his adopted ſon Tiberius as his ſucceſſor. He left his fortune partly to Tiberius, and to Druſus, and made donations to the army and Roman people. Virgil wrote his heroic poem at the deſire of Auguſtus, whom he repreſented under the amiable and perfect character of Æneas. Sueton. in vitâ.—Horat.—Virgil.—Pauſ.—Tacit.—Patercul.—Dio. Caſs.—Ovid.——The name of Auguſtus was afterwards given to the ſucceſſors of Octavianus in the Roman empire as a perſonal, and the name of Cæſar, as a family diſtinction. In a more diſtant period of the empire, the title of Auguſtus was given only to the emperor, while that of Cæſar was beſtowed on the ſecond perſon in the ſtate, who was conſidered as preſumptive heir.

Avĭdiēnus, a rich and ſordid man whom Horat. ſtiles happy, 2 Ser. 2, v. 55.

Avidius Cassius, a man ſaluted emperor, A. D. 175. He reigned only three months, and was aſſaſſinated by a centurion. He was called a ſecond Catiline, from his exceſſive love of bloodſhed. Diod.

Aviēnus, a poet in the age of Theodoſius, who tranſlated the phænomena of Aratus, as alſo all Livy, into Iambic verſes. The beſt edition of what remains of him, is that of Cannegetier, 8vo. 1731.

Avitus, a governor of Britain under Nero. Tacit. An. 14.

Avium, a city between Tyre and Sidon. Strab. 16.

Aulestes, a king of the Etrurians when Æneas came into Italy. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 290.

Aulētes, a general who aſſiſted Æneas in slaves.——A tyrant of Athens, surnamed Ariston.

ATHENŎCLES, a general, &c. Polyæn. 6.——A turner of Mitylene. Plin. 34.

ATHENODŌRUS, a philosopher of Tarsus, intimate with Augustus. The emperor often profited by his lessons, and was advised by him always to repeat the 24 letters of the Greek alphabet, before he gave way to the impulse of anger. Athenodorus died in his 82d year, much lamented by his countrymen. Suet.—— A poet who wrote comedy, tragedy, and elegy, in the age of Alexander. Plut. in Alex.——A stoic philosopher of Cana, near Tarsus, in the age of Augustus. He was intimate with Strabo. Strab. 14.——A philosopher, disciple to Zeno, and keeper of the royal library at Pergamus.——A marble sculptor.——A man assassinated at Bactra for making himself absolute.

ATHEOS, a surname of Diagoras and Theodorus, because they denied the existence of a deity. Cic. de Nat. D. 1, c. 1.

ATHĔSIS, a river of Cisalpine Gaul, near the Po, falling into the Adriatic sea. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 680.

ATHOS, a mountain of Macedonia, 150 miles in circumference, projecting into the Ægean sea like a promontory. It is so high that it overshadows the island of Lemnos, though at the distance of 87 miles; or, according to modern calculation, only eight leagues. When Xerxes invaded Greece, he made a trench of a mile and a half in length at the foot of the mountain, into which he brought the sea-water, and conveyed his fleet over it, so that two ships could pass one another, thus desirous either to avoid the danger of sailing round the promontory, or to show his vanity and the extent of his power.—A sculptor, called Denocrates, offered Alexander to cut mount Athos, and make with it a statue of the king holding a town in his left hand, and in the right a spacious bason, to receive all the waters which flowed from it. Alexander greatly admired the plan, but objected to the place; and he observed, that the neighbouring country was not sufficiently fruitful to produce corn and provisions for the inhabitants which were to dwell in the city, in the hand of the statue. Athos is now called Monte Santo. Herodot. 6, c. 44, l. 7, c. 21, &c.—Lucan. 2, v. 672.—Ælian. de Anim. 13, c. 20, &c.—Plin. 4. c. 10.—Æschin. contra Ctesiph.

ATHRULLA, a town of Arabia. Strab.

ATHYMBRA, a city of Caria, afterwards called Nyssa. Strab. 14.

ATIA, a city of Campania.——A law enacted A. U. C. 690, by T. Atius Labienus, the tribune of the people. It abolished the Cornelian law, and put in full force the Lex Domitia, by transferring the right of electing priests from the college of priests to the people.——The mother of Augustus. Vid. Accia.

ATILIA LEX gave the pretor and a majority of the tribunes, power of appointing guardians to those minors who were not previously provided for by their parents. It was enacted about A. U. C. 560.—— Another A. U. C. 443, which gave the people power of electing 20 tribunes of the soldiers in four legions. Liv. 9, c. 30.

ATILIUS, a freed man, who exhibited combats of gladiators at Fidenæ. The amphitheatre, which contained the spectators, fell during the exhibition, and about 50,000 persons were killed or mutilated. Tacit. 4, Ann. c. 62.

ATILLA, the mother of the poet Lucan. She was accused of conspiracy by her son, who expected to clear himself of the charge. Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 56.

ATĪNA, an antient town of the Volsci, one of the first that began hostilities against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 630.

ATINAS, a friend of Turnus, &c. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 869.

ATINIA LEX, was enacted by the tribune Atinius. It gave a tribune of the people the privileges of a senator, and the right of sitting in the senate.

ATLANTES, a people of Africa in the neighbourhood of mount Atlas. They daily cursed the sun at his rising and at his setting, because his excessive heat scorched and tormented them. Herodot.

ATLANTIADES, a patronymic of Mercury, as grandson of Atlas. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 639.

ATLANTĬDES, a people of Africa, near mount Atlas. They boasted of being in possession of the country in which all the gods of antiquity received their birth. Uranus was their first king, whom, on account of his knowledge of astronomy, they enrolled in the number of their gods. Diod. 3.——The daughters of Atlas, seven in number, Maia, Electra, Taygeta, Asterope, Merope, Alcyone, and Celæno. They married some of the gods, and most illustrious heroes, and their children were founders of many nations and cities. The Atlantides were called nymphs, and even goddesses on account of their great intelligence and knowledge. The name of Hesperides was also given them, on account of their mother Hesperis. They were made constellations after death. Vid. Pleiades.

ATLAS, one of the Titans, son of Japetus and Clymene, one of the Oceanides. He was brother to Epimetheus, Prometheus, and Menœtius. His mother's name, according to Apollodorus, was Asia. He married Pleione, daughter of Oceanus or Heſperis, according to others, by whom he had ſeven daughters, called Atlantides. (Vid. Atlantides.) He was king of Mauritania, and maſter of a thouſand flocks of every kind, as alſo of beautiful gardens, abounding in every ſpecies of fruit, which he had entruſted to the care of a dragon. Perſeus, after the conqueſt of the Gorgons, paſſed by the palace of Atlas, and demanded hoſpitality. The king, who was informed by an oracle of Themis that he ſhould be dethroned by one of the deſcendants of Jupiter, refuſed to receive him, and even offered him violence. Perſeus, who was unequal in ſtrength, ſhewed him Meduſa's head, and Atlas was inſtantly changed into a large mountain. This mountain, which runs acroſs the deſarts of Africa eaſt and weſt, is ſo high that the ancients have imagined that the heavens reſted on its top, and that Atlas ſupported the world on his ſhoulders. Hyginus ſays, that Atlas aſſiſted the giants in their wars againſt the gods, for which Jupiter compelled him to bear the heavens on his ſhoulders. The fable that Atlas ſupported the heavens on his back, ariſes from his fondneſs for aſtronomy, and his often frequenting elevated places and mountains, whence he might obſerve the heavenly bodies. The daughters of Atlas were carried away by Buſiris king of Egypt, but redeemed by Hercules, who received as a reward from the father, the knowledge of aſtronomy, and a celeſtial globe. This knowledge Hercules communicated to the Greeks; whence the fable has further ſaid, that he eaſed for ſome time the labors of Atlas, by taking upon his ſhoulders the weight of the heavens. According to ſome authors, there were two other perſons of that name, a king of Italy, father of Electra, and a king of Arcadia, father of Maia the mother of Mercury. *Virg. Atossa, a daughter of Cyrus, who was one of the wives of Cambyſes, Smerdis, and afterwards of Darius, by whom ſhe had Xerxes. She was cured of a dangerous cancer by Democedes. She is ſuppoſed by ſome to be the Vaſthi of ſcripture. Herodot. 3, c. 68, &c.

Atrăces, a people of Ætolia, who received their name from Atrax, ſon of Ætolus. Their country was called Atracia.

Atramyttium, a town of Myſia.

Atrăpes, an officer of Alexander, who, at the general diviſion of the provinces, received Media. Diod. 18.

Atrax, a ſon of Ætolus, or, according to others, of the river Peneus. He was king of Theſſaly, and built a town which he called Atrax or Atracia. This town became ſo famous that the word Atracius has been applied to any inhabitant of Theſſaly. He was father to Hippodamia, who married Pirithous, and whom we muſt not confound with the wife of Pelops, who bore the ſame name. Propert. 1, el. 8, v. 25.—Stat. 1, Theb. v. 106.—*Ovid. Atrebātæ, a people of Britain, who were in poſſeſſion of the modern counties of Berks, Oxford, &c.

Atrĕbātes, a people of Gaul, who, together with the Nervii, oppoſed J. Cæſar with 15,000 men. They were conquered, and Commius a friend of the general was ſet over them as king. They were reinſtated in their former liberty and independence, on account of the ſervices of Commius. Cæſ. bell. Gall. 2, &c.

Atrēni, a people of Armenia.

Atreus, ſon of Pelops by Hippodamia, daughter of Œnomaus king of Piſa, was king of Mycenæ, and brother to Pittheus, Troezen, Thyeſtes, and Chryſippus. As Chryſippus was an illegitimate ſon, and at the ſame time a favorite of his father, Hippodamia reſolved to remove him. She perſuaded her ſons Thyeſtes and Atreus to murder him; but their refuſal exaſperated her more, and ſhe executed it herſelf. This murder was grievous to Pelops; he ſuſpected his two ſons, who fled away from his preſence. Atreus retired to the court of Euryſtheus king of Argos, his nephew, and upon his death he ſucceeded him on the throne. He married, as ſome report, Ærope, his predeceſſor's daughter, by whom he had Pliſthenes, Menelaus, and Agamemnon. Others affirm, that Ærope was the wife of Pliſthenes, by whom ſhe had Agamemnon and Menelaus, who are the reputed ſons of Atreus, becauſe that prince took care of their education, and brought them up as his own. (Vid. Pliſthenes.) Thyeſtes had followed his brother to Argos, where he lived with him, and debauched his wife, by whom he had ſome children. This inceſtuous commerce offended Atreus, and Thyeſtes was baniſhed from his court. He was however ſoon after recalled by his brother, who determined cruelly to revenge the violence offered to his bed. To effect this purpoſe, he invited his brother to a ſumptuous feaſt, where Thyeſtes was ſerved up with the fleſh of the children he had had by his ſiſter-in-law the queen. After the repaſt was finiſhed, the arms and the head of the murdered children children were produced, to convince Thyeſtes of what he had feaſted upon. This action appeared ſo cruel and impious, that the ſun is ſaid to have ſhrunk back in his courſe at the bloody ſight. Thyeſtes immediately fled to the court of Theſprotus, and thence to Sicyon, where he raviſhed his own daughter Pelopea, in a grove ſacred to Minerva, without knowing who ſhe was. This inceſt he committed intentionally, as ſome report, to revenge himſelf on his brother Atreus, according to the word of the oracle, which promiſed him ſatisfaction for the cruelties he had ſuffered, only from the hand of a ſon who ſhould be born of himſelf and his own daughter. Pelopea brought forth a ſon whom ſhe called Ægiſthus, and ſoon after ſhe married Atreus, who had loſt his wife. Atreus adopted Ægiſthus, and ſent him to murder Thyeſtes, who had been ſeized and impriſoned. Thyeſtes knew his ſon, and made himſelf known to him; he made him eſpouſe his cauſe, and inſtead of becoming his father's murderer, he rather avenged his wrongs, and returned to Atreus, whom he aſſaſſinated. Vid. Thyeſtes, Ægiſthus, Pelopea, Agamemnon, & Menelaus.—Hygin. fab. 83, 86, 87, 88, & 258.—*Euripid. in Oreſt. in Iphig. Atrīdæ, a patronymic given by Homer to Agamemnon and Menelaus, as being the ſons of Atreus. This is falſe, upon the authority of Heſiod, Lactantius, Dictys of Crete, &c. who maintain that theſe princes were not the ſons of Atreus, but of Pliſthenes, and that they were brought up in the houſe and under the eye of their grandfather. Vid. Pliſthenes.

Atronius, a friend of Turnus, killed by the Trojans. Virg. Æn. 10.

Atrŏpos, one of the Parcæ, daughters of Nox and Erebus. According to the derivation of her name (α non τρεπω muto) ſhe is inexorable, and inflexible, and her duty among the three ſiſters is to cut the thread of life without any regard to ſex, age or quality. She was repreſented by the ancients in a black veil, with a pair of ſciſſars in her hand. Vid. Parcæ.

T. Q. Atta, a writer of merit in the Auguſtan age, who ſeems to have received this name from ſome deformity in his legs or feet. His compoſitions, dramatical as well as ſatyrical, were held in univerſal admiration. Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 79.

Attalĭcus. Vid. Attalus 3d.

Attălus 1ſt, king of Pergamus, ſucceeded Eumenes 1ſt. He defeated the Gauls who had invaded his dominions, extended his conqueſts to mount Taurus, and obtained the aſſiſtance of the Romans againſt Antiochus. The Athenians rewarded his merit with great honors. He died at Pergamus after a reign of 44 years. B. C. 197. Liv. 26, 27, 28, &c.—Polyb. 5.—Strab. 13.——The 2d of that name, was ſent on an embaſſy to Rome by his brother Eumenes the 2d, and at his return was appointed guardian to his nephew Attalus the 3d, who was then an infant. Pruſias made ſucceſsful war againſt him, and ſeized his capital; but the conqueſt was ſtopped by the interference of the Romans, who reſtored Attalus to his throne. Attalus, who has received the name of Philadelphus, from his fraternal love, was a munificent patron of learning, and the founder of ſeveral cities. He was poiſoned by his nephew in the 82d year of his age, B. C. 138. He had governed the nation with great prudence and moderation for 20 years. Strab. 13.—Polyb. 5.——The 3d, ſucceeded to the kingdom of Pergamus, by the murder of Attalus the 2d, and made himſelf odious by his cruelty to his relations, and his wanton exerciſe of power. He was ſon to Eumenes 2d, and ſirnamed Philopator. He left the cares of government to cultivate his garden, and to make experiments on the melting of metals. He lived in great amity with the Romans; and as he died without iſſue by his wife Berenice; he left in his will, the words P. R. meorum hæres eſto, which the Romans interpreted as themſelves, and therefore took poſſeſſion of his kingdom, B. C. 133, and made of it a Roman province, which they governed by a proconſul. From this circumſtance, whatever was a valuable acquiſition, or an ample fortune, was always called by the epithet of Attalicus. Attalus as well as his predeceſſors, made themſelves celebrated for the valuable libraries which they collected at Pergamus, and for the patronage which merit and virtue always found at their court. Liv. 24, &c.—Plin. 7, 8, 33, &c.—Juſtin. 39.—Horat. 1, od. 1.——An officer in Alexander's army. Curt. 4, c. 13.——Another very inimical to Alexander. Atteius Capĭto, a conſul in the age of Auguſtus, who wrote treatiſes on ſacerdotal laws, public courts of juſtice, and the duty of a ſenator.

Attes,

Attes, a ſon of Calaus of Phrygia, who was born impotent. He introduced the worſhip of Cybele among the Lydians, and became a great favorite of the goddeſs. Jupiter was jealous of his ſucceſs, and ſent a wild boar to lay waſte the country and deſtroy Attes. Pauſ. 7, c. 17.

Atthis, a daughter of Cranaus the 2d, king of Athens, who gave her name to Attica, according to Apollod. 3, c. 14.

Attĭca, a country of Achaia or Hellas, at the ſouth of Bœotia, weſt of the Ægean ſea, north of the Saronicus Sinus, and eaſt of Megara. It received its name from Atthis the daughter of Cranaus. It was originally called Ionia, from the Ionians, who ſettled there; and alſo Acte, which ſignifies ſhore, and Cecropia, from Cecrops the firſt of its kings. The moſt famous of its cities is called Athens, whoſe inhabitants ſometimes bear the name of Attici. Attica was famous for its gold and ſilver mines, which conſtituted the beſt part of the public revenues. The face of the country was partly level, and partly mountainous, divided into the 13 tribes of Acamantis, Æantis, Antiochis, Attalis, Ægeis, Erechtheis, Adrianis, Hippothoontis, Cecropis, Leontis, Æneis, Ptolemais, and Pandionis; whoſe inhabitants were numbered in the 116 olympiad, at 31,000 citizens, and 400,000 ſlaves, within 174 villages, ſome of which were conſiderable towns. Vid. Athenæ.

Attĭcus, one of Galba's ſervants who entered his palace with a bloody ſword, and declared he had killed Otho. Tacit. Hiſt. 1.——(T. Pomponius) a celebrated Roman knight to whom Cicero wrote a great number of letters, which contained the general hiſtory of the age. They are now extant, and divided into 17 books. In the time of Marius and Sylla, Atticus retired to Athens, where he ſo endeared himſelf to the citizens, that after his departure, they erected ſtatues to him in commemoration of his munificence and liberality. He was ſuch a perfect maſter of the Greek writers, and ſpoke their language ſo fluently, that he was ſirnamed Atticus, and as a proof of his learning he favored the world with ſome of his compoſitions. He behaved in ſuch a diſintereſted manner, that he offended neither of the inimical parties at Rome, and both were equally anxious of courting his approbation. He lived in the greateſt intimacy with the illuſtrious men of his age, and he was ſuch a lover of truth, that he not only abſtained from falſehood even in a joke, but treated with the greateſt contempt and indignation a lying tongue. It is ſaid that he refuſed to take aliments when unable to get the better of a fever, and died in his 77th year, B. C. 32, after bearing the amiable character of peace-maker among his friends. Cornelius Nepos, one of his intimate friends, has written a minute account of his life. Cic. ad Attic. &c.——Herodes, an Athenian in the age of the Antonines, deſcended from Miltiades, and celebrated for his munificence. His ſon of the ſame name was honored with the conſulſhip, and he generouſly erected an aqueduct at Troas, of which he had been made governor by the emperor Adrian, and raiſed in other parts of the empire, ſeveral public buildings as uſeful as they were magnificent. Philoſtrat. in vit. 2. p. 548.—A. Gell. noct. Att.—— A conſul in the age of Nero, &c. Tacit. ann. 15.

Attĭla, a celebrated king of the Huns, a nation in the ſouthern parts of Scythia, who invaded the Roman empire in the reign of Valentinian, with an army of 500,000 men, and laid waſte the provinces. He took the town of Aquileia, and marched againſt Rome; but his retreat and peace were purchaſed with a large ſum of money by the feeble emperor. Attila, who boaſted in the appellation of the ſcourge of God, died A. D. 453, of an uncommon effuſion of blood the firſt night of his nuptials. He had expreſſed his wiſh to extend his conqueſts over the whole world; and he often feaſted his barbarity by dragging captive kings in his train. Jornand. de reb. Get.

Attilius, a Roman conſul in the firſt Punic war. Vid. Regulus.——Calatinus, a Roman conſul who fought the Carthaginian fleet.——Marcus, a poet who tranſlated the Electra of Sophocles into Latin verſe, and wrote comedies whoſe unintelligible language procured him the appellation of Ferreus.——Regulus, a Roman cenſor who built a temple to the goddeſs of concord. Liv. 23, c. 23. &c.——The name of Attilius was common among the Romans, and many of the public magiſtrates are called Attilii; their life however is not famous for any illuſtrious event.

Attinas, an officer ſet over Bactriana by Alexander. Curt. 8.

Attius Pelignus, an officer of Cæſar. Cæſ. bell. civ. 1.——Tullius, the general of the Volſci, to whom Coriolanus fled when baniſhed from Rome. Liv.——Varus, ſeized Auxinum in Pompey's name, whence he was expelled. After this he fled to Africa, which he alienated from J. Cæſar. Cæſ. 1, bell. civ.——A poet. Vid. Accius. ——The family of the Attii was deſcended from Atys, one of the companions of Æneas, according to the opinion which Virgil has adopted, Æn. 5, v. 568.

Atyădæ, the deſcendants of Atys the Lydian.

Astyănax, a ſon of Hector and Andromache. He was very young when the Greeks beſieged Troy; and when the city was taken, his mother ſaved him in her arms from the flames. Ulyſſes, who was afraid leſt the young prince ſhould inherit the virtues of his father, and one day avenge the ruin of his country upon the Greeks, ſeized him, and threw him down from the walls of Troy. According to Euripides, he was killed by Menelaus; and Seneca ſays, that Pyrrhus the ſon of Achilles put him to death. Hector had given him the name of Scamandrius; but the Trojans, who hoped he might prove as great as his father, called him Aſtyanax, or the bulwark of the city. Homer. Il. 6 & 22.——Virg. Æn. 2, v. 457. l. 3, v. 489.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 415.——An Arcadian, who had a ſtatue in the temple of Jupiter, on mount Lyceus. Pauſ. 8, c. 38.——A ſon of Hercules. Apollod. 2, c. 7.——A writer in the age of Gallienus.

Astycratia, a daughter of Æolus. Homer. Il.——A daughter of Amphion and Niobe.

Astydămas, an Athenian, pupil to Iſocrates. He wrote 240 tragedies, of which only 15 obtained the poetical prize.——A Mileſian, three times victorious at Olympia. He was famous for his ſtrength, as well as for his voracious appetite. He was once invited to a feaſt by king Ariobarzanes, and he eat what had been prepared for nine perſons. Athen. 10.——Two tragic writers bore the ſame name, one of whom was diſciple to Socrates.——A comic poet of Athens.

Astydămīa, daughter of Amyntor, king of Orchomenos in Bœotia, married Acaſtus, ſon of Pelias, who was king of Iolchos. She became enamoured of Peleus, ſon of Æacus, who had viſited her huſband's court; and becauſe he refuſed to gratify her paſſion, ſhe accuſed him of attempting her virtue. Acaſtus readily believed his wife's accuſation; and as he would not violate the laws of hoſpitality, by puniſhing his gueſt with inſtant death, he waited for a favorable opportunity, and diſſembled his reſentment. At laſt they went in a hunting party to mount Pelion, where Peleus was tied to a tree, by order of Acaſtus, that he might be devoured by wild beaſts. Jupiter was moved at the innocence of Peleus, and ſent Vulcan to deliver him. When Peleus was ſet at liberty, he marched with an army againſt Acaſtus, whom he dethroned, and puniſhed with death the cruel and falſe Aſtydamia. She is called by ſome Hippolyte, Apollod. 3, c. 13.—Pindar. Nem. 4.——A daughter of Ormenus, carried away by Hercules, by whom ſhe had Tlepolemus. Ovid. Heroid. 9. v. 50.

Astўlus, one of the centaurs, who had the knowledge of futurity. He adviſed his brothers not to make war againſt the Lapithæ. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 338.——A man of Crotona, who was victorious three ſucceſſive times at the Olympic games. Pauſ.

Astymedūsa, a woman whom Œdipus married after he had divorced Jocaſta.

Astynŏme, the daughter of Chryſes the prieſt of Apollo, ſometimes called Chryſeis. She fell to the ſhare of Achilles, at the diviſion of the ſpoils of Lyrneſſus.—A daughter of Amphion,—of Talaus. Hygin.

Astynous, a Trojan prince. Homer. Il. 5, v. 144.

Astўoche & Astyochīa, a daughter of Actor, who had by Mars, Aſcalaphus, and Ialmenus, who were at the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2, v. 20.——A daughter of Phylas king of Ephyre, who had a ſon called Tlepolemus, by Hercules. Hygin. fab. 97, 162.——A daughter of Laomedon, by Strymo. Apollod. 3.——A daughter of Amphion and Niobe. Id. 3, c. 4.——A daughter of the Simois, who married Erichthonius. Id. 3, c. 12.——The wife of Strophius, ſiſter to Agamemnon. Hygin.

Astypalæa, one of the Cyclades called after Aſtypalæa, the daughter of Phœnix, and mother of Ancæus, by Neptune. Pauſ. 7, c. 4.—Strab. 14.

Astyphĭlus, a ſoothſayer, well ſkilled in the knowledge of futurity. Plut. in Cim.

Astўron, a town built by the Argonauts on the coaſt of Illyricum. Strab.

Asychis, a king of Egypt, who ſucceeded Mycerinus, and made a law, that whoever borrowed money, muſt depoſit his father's body in the hand of his creditors, as a pledge of his promiſe of payment. He built a magnificent pyramid. Herodot. 2, c. 136.

Asyllus, a gladiator. Juv. 6, v. 266.

Atābŭlus, a wind which was frequent in Apulia. Horat. 1, ſat. 5, v. 78.

Atabўris, a mountain in Rhodes, where Jupiter had a temple, whence he was ſirnamed Atabyris. Strab. 14.

Atăce, a town of Gaul, whence the adjective Atacinus.

Atalanta, a daughter of Schœneus king of Scyros. According to ſome, ſhe was the daughter of Jaſus or Jaſius, by Clymene: but others ſay that Menalion was her father. This uncertainty of not rightly knowing the name of her father, has led the mythologiſts into error, and ſome have maintained that there were two perſons of that name, though their ſuppoſition is groundleſs. Atalanta was born in Arcadia, and, according to Ovid, she determined to live in perpetual celibacy; but her beauty gained her many admirers, and to free herself from their importunities, she proposed to run a race with them. They were to run without arms, and she was to carry a dart in her hand. Her lovers were to start first, and whoever arrived at the goal before her, would be made her husband; but all those whom she overtook, were to be killed by the dart with which she had armed herself. As she was almost invincible in running, many of her suitors perished in the attempt, till Hippomenes the son of Macareus proposed himself as her admirer. Venus had presented him with three golden apples from the garden of the Hesperides, or according to others, from an orchard in Cyprus; and as soon as he had started in the course, he artfully threw down the apples at some distance one from the other. While Atalanta, charmed at the sight, stopped to gather the apples, Hippomenes hastened on his course, arrived first at the goal, and obtained Atalanta in marriage. These two fond lovers, in the impatience of consummating their nuptials, entered the temple of Cybele; and the goddess was so offended at their impiety, and at the profanation of her house, that she changed them into two lions. Apollodorus says, that Atalanta's father was desirous of raising male issue, and that therefore she was exposed to wild beasts as soon as born. She was however suckled by a she-bear, and preserved by shepherds. She dedicated her time to hunting, and resolved to live in celibacy. She killed two centaurs who attempted her virtue. She was present at the hunting of the Calydonian boar, which she first wounded, and she received the head as a present from Meleager, who was enamoured of her. She was also at the games instituted in honor of Pelias, where she conquered Peleus; and when her father, to whom she had been restored, wished her to marry, she consented to give herself to him who could overcome her in running, as has been said above. She had a son called Parthenopæus, by Hippomenes. Hyginus says, that that son was the fruit of her love with Meleager; and Apollodorus says she had him by Milanion, or, according to others, by the god Mars. [Vid. Meleager.] Apollod. 1, c. 8. l. 3, c. 9, &c.—Paus. 1, c. 36, 45, &c.—Hygin. fab. 99, 174, 185, 270.—Ælian. V. H. 13.—Diod. 4.—*Ovid. Atarbechis, a town in one of the islands of the Delta, where Venus had a temple.

Atarnea, a part of Mysia, opposite Lesbos, with a small town in the neighbourhood, of the same name. Paus. 4, c. 35.

Atargatis, a divinity among the Syrians, represented as a Siren. Strab. 16.

Atas & Athas, a youth of wonderful velocity, who is said to have run 75 miles between noon and the evening. Martial. 4, ep. 19.—Plin. 7.

Atax, a river of Gaul Narbonensis, rising in the Pyrenean mountains, and falling into the Mediterranean Sea. Mela. 2.

Ate, the goddess of all evil, and daughter of Jupiter. She raised such jealousy and sedition in heaven among the gods, that Jupiter dragged her away by the hair, and banished her for ever from heaven, and sent her to dwell on earth, where she incited mankind to wickedness, and sowed commotions among them. Homer. Il. 19. She is the same as the Discord of the Latins.

Atella, a town of Campania, famous for a splendid amphitheatre. Juv. 6.

Atenomārus, a chieftan of Gaul, who made war against the Romans. Plut. in Parall.

Athamānes, an ancient people of Epirus, who existed long before the Trojan war, and still preserved their name and customs in the age of Alexander. There was a fountain in their territories, whose waters, about the last quarter of the moon, were so sulphureous that they could set wood on fire. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 311.—Strab. 7.—Plin. 2.—Mela. 2, c. 3.

Athămas, king of Thebes, in Bœotia, was son of Æolus. He married Themisto, whom some call Nephele, and Pindar, Demotice, and by her he had Phryxus and Helle. Some time after, on pretence that Nephele was subject to fits of madness, he married Ino, the daughter of Cadmus, by whom he had two sons, Learchus and Melicerta. Ino became jealous of the children of Nephele; because they were to ascend their father's throne in preference to her own, therefore she resolved to destroy them; but they escaped from her fury to Colchis, on a golden ram. [Vid. Phryxus & Argonautæ.] According to the Greek scholiast of Lycophron, v. 22. Ino attempted to destroy the corn of the country; and as if it were the consequence of divine vengeance, the soothsayer, at her instigation, told Athamas, that before the earth would yield her usual increase, he must sacrifice one of the children of Nephele to the gods. The credulous dulous father led Phryxus to the altar, where he was saved by Nephele. The prosperity of Ino was displeasing to Juno, and more particularly because she was descended from Venus. The goddess therefore sent Tisiphone, one of the furies, to the house of Athamas, who became inflamed with such sudden fury, that he took Ino to be a lioness, and her two children to be whelps. In this fit of madness he snatched Learchus from her, and killed him against a wall; upon which, Ino fled with Melicerta, and, with him in her arms, she threw herself into the sea from a high rock, and was changed into a sea deity. After this, Athamas recovered the use of his senses; and as he was without children, he adopted Coronus and Aliartus, the sons of Thersander his nephew. Hygin. fab. 1, 2, 5, 239.—Apollod. 1, c. 7 & 9.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 467, &c. Fast. 6, v. 489.—Paus. 9, c. 34.——A servant of Atticus. Cic. ad Attic. 12, ep. 10.——A stage dancer. Id. Pis. 36.——A tragic poet. Id. Pis. 20.——One of the Greeks, concealed in the wooden horse at the siege of Troy. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 263.

ATHAMANTIĂDES, a patronymic of Melicerta, Phryxus, or Helle, children of Athamas. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 319.

ATHANASIUS, a bishop of Alexandria, celebrated for his sufferings, and the determined opposition he maintained against Arius and his doctrine. His writings, which were numerous, and some of which have perished, contain a defence of the mystery of the Trinity, the divinity of the Word and of the Holy Ghost, and an apology to Constantine. The creed which bears his name, is supposed by some not to be his composition. Athanasius died 2d May, 373 A. D. after filling the archiepiscopal chair 47 years, and leading alternately a life of exile and of triumph. The latest edition of his works, is that of Benedictin. 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1698.

ATHANIS, a man who wrote an account of Sicily. Athen. 3.

ATHEAS, a king of Scythia, who implored the assistance of Philip of Macedonia against the Istrians, and laughed at him when he had furnished him with an army. Justin. 9, c. 2.

ATHĒNA, the name of Minerva among the Greeks.

ATHĒNÆ, a celebrated city of Attica, founded about 1556 years before the Christian era, by Cecrops and an Egyptian colony. It was called Cecropia from its founder, and afterwards Athenæ in honor of Minerva, who had obtained the right of giving it a name in preference to Neptune. [Vid. Minerva.] It was governed by 17 kings, in the following order:—After a reign of 50 years, Cecrops was succeeded by Cranaus, who began to reign 1506 B. C. Amphictyon, 1497; Erichthonius, 1487; Pandion, 1437; Erichtheus, 1397; Cecrops 2d, 1347; Pandion 2d, 1307; Ægeus, 1283; Theseus, 1235; Menestheus, 1205; Demophoon, 1282; Oxyntes, 1149; Aphidas, 1137; Thymœtes, 1336; Melanthus, 1128; and Codrus, 1091, who was killed after a reign of 21 years. The history of the twelve first of these monarchs, is mostly fabulous. After the death of Codrus, the monarchical power was abolished, and the state was governed by 13 perpetual, and, 317 years after, by 7 decennial, and lastly, B. C. 684, after an anarchy of 3 years, by annual magistrates, called Archons. (Vid. Archontes.) Under this democracy, the Athenians signalized themselves by their valor in the field, their munificence, and the cultivation of the fine arts. They were deemed so powerful by the Persians, that Xerxes, when he invaded Greece, chiefly directed his arms against Athens, which he took and burnt. Their military character was chiefly displayed in the battles of Marathon, of Salamis, of Platæa, and of Mycale. After these immortal victories, they rose in consequence and dignity, and they demanded the superiority in the affairs of Greece. The town was re-built and embellished by Themistocles, and a new and magnificent harbour erected. Their success made them arrogant, and they raised contentions among the neighbouring states, that they might aggrandize themselves by their fall. The luxury and intemperance, which had been long excluded from the city by the salutary laws of their countrymen, Draco and Solon, crept by degrees among all ranks of people, and soon after all Greece united to destroy that city, which claimed a sovereign power over all the rest. The Peloponnesian war, though at first a private quarrel, was soon fomented into an universal war; and the arms of all the states of Peloponnesus (Vid. Peloponnesiacum bellum) were directed against Athens, which, after 28 years of misfortunes and bloodshed, was totally ruined, the 24th April, 404 years before the Christian era, by Lysander. After this, the Athenians were oppressed by 30 tyrants, and for a while labored under the weight of their own calamities. They recovered something of their usual spirit in the age of Philip, and boldly opposed his ambitious views; but their short lived efforts were not of great service to the interest of Greece, and they fell into the hands of the Romans, B. C. 86. The Athenians have been admired in all ages, for their love of liberty, and for the great men that were born among them; but favor there, was attended with danger; and there are very few inſtances in the hiſtory of Athens, that can prove that the jealouſy and frenzy of the people did not perſecute and diſturb the peace of the man who had fought their battles, and expoſed his life in the defence of his country. Perhaps, not one ſingle city in the world can boaſt in ſuch a ſhort ſpace of time, of ſuch a number of truly illuſtrious citizens, equally celebrated for their humanity, their learning, and their military abilities. The Romans, in the more poliſhed ages of their republic, ſent their youths to finiſh their education at Athens, and reſpected the learning, while they deſpiſed the military character of the inhabitants. The reputation the Athenian ſchools had acquired under Socrates and Plato, was maintained by their degenerate and leſs learned ſucceſſors; and they floriſhed with diminiſhed luſtre, till an edict of the emperor Juſtinian ſuppreſſed, with the Roman conſulſhip, the philoſophical meetings of the academy. It has been ſaid by Plutarch, that the good men whom Athens produced, were the moſt juſt and equitable in the world; but that its bad citizens could not be ſurpaſſed in any age or country, for their impiety, perfidiouſneſs, or cruelties. Their criminals were always put to death by drinking the juice of hemlock. The ancients, to diſtinguiſh Athens in a more peculiar manner, called it Aſtu, one of the eyes of Greece, the learned city, the ſchool of the world, the common patroneſs of Greece. The Athenians thought themſelves the moſt ancient nation of Greece, and ſuppoſed themſelves the original inhabitants of Attica, for which reaſon they were called αυτοχθονες, produced from the ſame earth which they inhabited, γηγενεις, ſons of the earth, and τεττιγες, graſshoppers. They ſometimes wore golden graſhoppers in their hair as badges of honor, to diſtinguiſh them from other people of later origin and leſs noble extraction, becauſe thoſe inſects are ſuppoſed to be ſprung from the ground. The number of men able to bear arms at Athens in the reign of Cecrops was computed at 20,000, and there appeared no conſiderable augmentation in the more civilized age of Pericles; but in the time of Demetrius Phalereus there were found 21,000 citizens, 10,000 foreigners, and 40,000 ſlaves. Among the numerous temples and public edifices none was more celebrated than that of Minerva, which after being burnt by the Perſians was re-built by Pericles, with the fineſt marble, and ſtill exiſts a venerable monument of the hero's patriotiſm and of the abilities of the architect. Cic. ad Attic. in Verr. &c.—Thucyd. 1, &c.—Juſtin. 2, &c.—Diod. 13, *&c.—Ælian. ATHENÆA, feſtivals celebrated at Athens in honor of Minerva. One of them was called Panathenæa, and the other Chalcea; for an account of which ſee thoſe words.

ATHENÆUM, a place at Athens, ſacred to Minerva, where the poets, philoſophers, and rhetoricians generally declaimed and repeated their compoſitions. It was public to all the profeſſors of the liberal arts. The ſame thing was adopted at Rome by Adrian, who made a public building for the ſame laudable purpoſes.——A promontory of Italy.

ATHENÆUS, a Greek coſmographer.——A peripatetic philoſopher of Cilicia in the time of Auguſtus. Strab.——A Spartan ſent by his countrymen to Athens, to ſettle the peace during the Peloponneſian war.——A grammarian of Naucratis, who compoſed an elegant and miſcellaneous work, called Deipnoſophiſtæ, replete with very curious and intereſting remarks and anecdotes of the manners of the ancients, and likewiſe valuable for the ſcattered pieces of ancient poetry it preſerves. The work conſiſts of 15 books, of which the two firſt, part of the third, and almoſt the whole of the laſt, are loſt. Athenæus wrote, beſides this, an hiſtory of Syria, and other works now loſt. He died A. D. 194. The beſt edition of his works is that of Cauſaubon, fol. 2 vols. Lugd. 1612, by far ſuperior to the editions of 1595 and 1657.——A hiſtorian, who wrote an account of Semiramis. Diod.——A brother of king Eumenes 2d, famous for his paternal affection.——A Roman general, in the age of Gallienus, who is ſuppoſed to have written a book on military engines.——A phyſician of Cilicia in the age of Pliny, who made heat, cold, wet, dry, and air, the elements, inſtead of the four commonly received.

ATHENAGŎRAS, a Greek in the time of Darius, to whom Pharnabazus gave the government of Chios, &c. Curt. 8, c. 5.——A writer on agriculture. Varro.——A Chriſtian philoſopher, in the age of Aurelius, who wrote a treatiſe on the reſurrection, and an apology for the chriſtians, ſtill extant. He died A. D. 177. The beſt edition of his works is that of Dechair 8vo. Oxon, 1706.——The romance of Theagenes and Charis is falſely aſcribed to him.

ATHENĀIS, a Sibyl of Erythræa, in the age of Alexander. Strab.——A daughter of the philoſopher Leontius.

ATHENION, a peripatetic philoſopher 108 B. C.——A general of the Sicilian ſlaves in Italy, with 100 ships. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 207.——The surname of one of the Ptolemean kings, father to Cleopatra.

Aulis, a daughter of Ogyges. Paus. Bœotic.——A town of Bœotia near Chalcis on the sea coast, where all the Greeks conspired against Troy. They were detained there by contrary winds, by the anger of Diana, whose favorite stag had been killed by Agamemnon. To appease the resentment of the goddess, Agamemnon was obliged to sacrifice his own daughter Iphigenia, whom, however, Diana spared by substituting a ram. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 426.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 9, &c.—Homer. Il. 2, v. 303.

Aulon, a mountain of Calabria, opposite Tarentum, famous for its wine, which, according to Horat. 2, od. 6, v. 18, is superior to that of Falernum. Martial. 13, ep. 125.—Strab. 6.——A place of Messenia. Paus.

Aurelia lex, was enacted A. U. C. 653, by the pretor L. Aurelius Cotta, to invest the Senatorian and Equestrian orders, and the Tribuni Ærarii, with judicial power. ——Another, A. U. C. 678. It abrogated a clause of the Lex Cornelia, and permitted the tribunes to hold other offices after the expiration of the tribuneship.

Aurelia, a town of Hispania Bætica. ——The mother of J. Cæsar. Suet. in Cæs. 74.——A fish woman. Juv. 4, v. 98.

Aurelianus, emperor of Rome after Flavius Claudius, was austere, and even cruel in the execution of the laws, and punished his soldiers with unusual severity. He rendered himself famous for his military character; and his expedition against Zenobia, the celebrated queen of Palmyra, gained him great honors. He beautified Rome, was charitable to the poor, and the author of many salutary laws. He was naturally brave; and in all the battles he fought, it is said, he killed no less than 800 men with his own hand. In his triumph he exhibited to the Romans, people of 15 different nations, all of which he had conquered. He was the first emperor who wore a diadem. After a glorious reign of six years, as he marched against the northern barbarians, he was assassinated near Byzantium, A. D. 275, 29th January, by his soldiers, whom Mnestheus had incited to rebellion against their emperor. This Mnestheus had been threatened with death, for some ill behaviour to the emperor, and therefore he meditated his death. The soldiers, however, soon repented of their ingratitude and cruelty to Aurelian, and threw Mnestheus to be devoured by wild beasts.——A physician of the fourth century.

Aurelius, emperor of Rome. Vid. Antoninus Bassianus.——A painter in the age of Augustus. Plin. 35.——Victor, an historian in the age of Julian, two of whose compositions are extant; an account of illustrious men, and a biography of all the Cæsars to Julian. The best editions of Aurelius are the 4to. of Artnzenius, Amst. 1733, and the 8vo. of Pitiscus, Utr. 1696. ——Antoninus, an emperor. Vid. Antoninus.

Aureolus, a general who assumed the purple in the age of Gallienus.

Aurinia, a prophetess held in great veneration by the Germans. Tacit. Germ. 8.

Aurora, a goddess, daughter of Hyperion and Thia or Thea. Some say that Pallas, son of Crius, and brother to Perses, was her father; hence her surname of Pallantias. She married Astræus, by whom she had the winds, the stars, &c. Her amours with Tithonus and Cephalus are also famous; by the former she had Memnon and Æmathion, and Phaeton by the latter. (Vid. Cephalus and Tithonus.) She had also an intrigue with Orion, whom she carried to the island of Delos, where he was killed by Diana's arrows. Aurora is generally represented by the poets drawn in a rose colored chariot, and opening with her rosy fingers the gates of the east, pouring the dew upon the earth, and making the flowers grow. Her chariot is generally drawn by white horses, and she is covered with a veil. Nox and Somnus fly before her, and the constellations of heaven disappear at her approach. She always sets out before the sun, and is the forerunner of his rising. The Greeks call her Eos. Homer. Il. 8, Od. 10. Hymn. in Vener.—Ovid. Met. 3, 9, 15.—Apollod. 1, 3.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 535. —Varro. de L. L. 5, &c.—Hesiod. Theog.—Hygin. præf. fab.

Aurunce, an ancient town of Latium, built by Auson, the son of Ulysses by Calypso. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 727, &c.

Auschisæ, a people of Libya. Herodot. 4, c. 171.

Ausci, a people of Gaul.

Auser, Auseris, and Anser, a river of Italy.

Auses, a people of Africa, whose virgins yearly fight with sticks in honor of Minerva. She who behaves with the greatest valor, receives unusual honor, &c. Herodot. 4, c. 180.

Auson, a son of Ulysses and Calypso, from from whom the Auſones, a people of Italy, are deſcended.

AUSONIA, one of the ancient names of Italy, which it received from Auſon the ſon of Ulyſſes. If Virgil makes Æneas ſpeak of Auſonia, it is by anticipation. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 171.

AUSŌNIUS, a poet in the 4th century, preceptor to Gratian, ſon of the emperor Valentinian, and made conſul by the means of his pupil. His compoſitions have been long admired. The thanks he returned the emperor Gratian is one of the beſt of his poems, which were too often hurried for publication, and conſequently not perfect. He wrote the conſular faſti of Rome, an uſeful performance, now loſt. His ſtyle is obſcene, and he has attempted upon the words of Virgil, what revolts every thing againſt his indelicacy. The beſt edition is that of Tollius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1671; or that of Jaubert, with a French tranſlation, 4 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1769.

AUSPĬCES, a ſacerdotal order at Rome, nearly the ſame as the augurs. Vid. Augures.

AUSTER, one of the winds blowing from the ſouth, whoſe breath was pernicious to flowers as well as to health. He was parent of rain. Virg. Ecl. 2, v. 58. Vid. Venti.

AUSTESION, a Theban, ſon of Tiſamenus. His ſon Theras led a colony into an iſland, which, from him, was called Thera. Herodot. 4.—Pauſ.

AUTOBULUS, a painter. Plin. 35.

AUTOCHTHŎNES, the original inhabitants of a country who are the firſt poſſeſſors of it, and who never have mingled with other nations. The Athenians called themſelves Autochthones, and boaſted that they were as old as the country which they inhabited. Pauſ. 1, c. 14.—Tacit. de Germ.—Cic. de Orat. 3, c. 83.

AUTŎCLES, an Athenian, ſent by his countrymen with a fleet to the aſſiſtance of Alexander of Pheræ.

AUTOCRĂTES, an hiſtorian mentioned by Athen. 9 & 11.

AUTOLŎLÆ, a people of Mauritania, deſcended from the Gætuli. They excelled all their neighbours in running. Lucan. 4, v. 677.

AUTŎLŸCUS, a ſon of Mercury by Chione, a daughter of Dædalion. He was one of the Argonauts. His craft as a thief has been greatly celebrated. He ſtole the flocks of his neighbours, and mingled them with his own, after he had changed their marks. He did the ſame to Siſyphus, ſon of Æolus; but Siſyphus was as crafty as Autolycus, and he knew his own oxen by a mark which he had made under their feet. Autolycus was ſo pleaſed with the artifice of Siſyphus, that he immediately formed an intimacy with him, and even permitted him freely to enjoy the company of his daughter Anticlea, who became pregnant of Ulyſſes, and was ſoon after married to Laertes. Vid. Siſyphus, Laertes. Hygin. fab. 200, &c.—Ovid. Met. 1, fab. 8.—Apollod. 1.—Homer. Od. 14.——A ſon of Phryxus and Chalciope. Hygin. fab. 14.

AUTOMĂTE, one of the Cyclades, called alſo Hera. Plin. 2. c. 37.——A daughter of Danaus.

AUTOMĔDON, a ſon of Dioreus, who went to the Trojan war with 10 ſhips. He was the charioteer of Achilles, after whoſe death he ſerved Pyrrhus in the ſame capacity. Homer. Il. 9, 16, &c.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 477.

AUTOMEDŪSA, a daughter of Alcathous, killed by Tydeus. Apollod. 2.

AUTOMĔNES, one of the Heraclidæ, king of Corinth. At his death, B. C. 779, annual magiſtrates, called Prytanes, were choſen at Corinth, and their power continued 90 years, till Cypſelus and his ſon Periander made themſelves abſolute.

AUTOMŎLI, a nation of Æthiopia. Herodot. 2.

AUTONOE, a daughter of Cadmus, who married Ariſtæus, by whom ſhe had Actæon, often called Autoneius heros. The death of her ſon [Vid. Actæon] was ſo painful to her, that ſhe retired from Bœotia to Megara, where ſhe ſoon after died. Pauſ. 1, c. 44.—Hygin. fab. 179.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 720.——One of the Danaides. Apollod. 2.——One of the Nereides. Heſiod. Theog.——A female ſervant of Penelope. Homer. Od. 18.

AUTOPHRADATES, a ſatrap of Lydia, who revolted from Artaxerxes. Diod.

AUXESIA & DAMIA, two virgins who came from Crete to Troezene, where the inhabitants ſtoned them to death in a ſedition. The Epidaurians raiſed them ſtatues by order of the oracle, when their country was become barren. They were held in great veneration at Troezene. Herodot. 5, c. 82.—Pauſ. 2, c. 90.

AXĔNUS, the ancient name of the Euxine Sea. The word ſignifies inhoſpitable, which was highly applicable to the manners of the ancient inhabitants of the coaſt. Ovid. 4, Triſt. 4, v. 56.

AXIŎCHUS, a philoſopher, to whom Plato dedicated a treatiſe concerning death.

Axona, a river of Germany. The inhabitants of the neighbourhood are called Axones.

Axur & Anxur, a ſirname of Jupiter, who had a temple at Trachis in Theſſaly. He was repreſented as a beardleſs youth.

Axus, a town about the middle of Crete. Apollod.

Azan, a mountain of Arcadia, ſacred to Cybele.——A ſon of Arcas, king of Arcadia, by Erato, one of the Dryades. He divided his father's kingdom with his brothers Aphidas and Elatus, and called his ſhare Azania. There was in Azania a fountain called Clitorius, whoſe waters gave a diſlike for wine to thoſe who drank them. Vitruv. 8, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 322. Pauſ. 8, c. 4.

Azīris, a place in Libya, ſurrounded on both ſides by delightful hills covered with trees, and watered by a river where Battus built a town. Herodot. 4, c. 157.

Azonax, a man who taught Zoroaſter the art of magic. Plin. 30.

Azōtus, a large town of Syria on the borders of the Mediterranean. Joſeph. Ant. Jud. 15.

Babilius, a Roman, who, by the help of a certain herb, is ſaid to have paſſed in ſix days from the Sicilian ſea to Alexandria. Plin. præm. 19.

Babilus, an aſtrologer in Nero's age, who told the emperor to avert the danger which ſeemed to hang upon his head, from the appearance of a hairy comet, by putting all the leading men of Rome to death. His advice was faithfully followed. Sueton. in Ner. c. 36.

Babylon, a ſon of Belus, who, as ſome ſuppoſe, founded a city which bears his name.—A celebrated city, the capital of the Aſſyrian empire, on the banks of the Euphrates. It had 100 brazen gates; and its walls, which were cemented with bitumen, and greatly enlarged and embelliſhed by the activity of Semiramis, meaſured 480 ſtadia in circumference, 50 cubits in thickneſs, and 200 in height. It was taken by Cyrus, B. C. 538, after he had drained the waters of the Euphrates into a new channel, and marched his troops by night into the town, through the dried bed; and it is ſaid that the fate of the extenſive capital was unknown to the inhabitants of the diſtant ſuburbs till late in the evening. Babylon became famous for the death of Alexander, and for the new empire which was afterwards eſtabliſhed there under the Seleucidæ. [Vid. Syria.] Its greatneſs was ſo reduced in ſucceeding ages, according to Pliny's obſervations, that in his time it was but a deſolate wilderneſs, and at preſent the place where it ſtood is unknown to travellers. The inhabitants were early acquainted with aſtrology. Plin. 6, c. 26.—Herodot. 1, 2, 3.—Juſtin. 1, &c.—Diod. 2.—Xenoph. Cyrop. 7, &c.—Propert. 3, el. 11, v. 21.—Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 2.—Martial. 9, ep. 77.——There is alſo a town of the ſame name near the Nile, in Egypt.

Babylōnia, a large province of Aſſyria, of which Babylon was the capital. The inhabitants ſhook off the Aſſyrian yoke, and afterwards became very powerful.——The ſirname of Seleucia, which aroſe from the ruins of Babylon, under the ſucceſſors of Alexander. Plin. 6, c. 26.

Babylōnii, the inhabitants of Babylon, famous for their knowledge of aſtrology, firſt divided the year into 12 months, and the zodiac into 12 ſigns.

Babyrsa, a fortified caſtle near Artaxata. Strab. 11.

Babytăce, a city of Armenia, whoſe inhabitants deſpiſe gold. Plin. 6. c. 27.

Bacabasus, betrayed the ſnares of Artabānus, brother of Darius, againſt Artaxerxes. Juſtin. 3, c. 1.

Bacchæ, the prieſteſſes of Bacchus. Pauſ. 2, c. 7.

Bacchanālia, feſtivals in honor of Bacchus at Rome, the ſame as the Dionyſia of the Greeks. Vid. Dionyſia.

Bacchantes, prieſteſſes of Bacchus, who are repreſented at the celebration of the orgies almoſt naked, with garlands of ivy, with a thyrſus and diſhevelled hair. Their looks are wild, and they utter dreadful ſounds, and claſh different muſical inſtruments together. They are alſo called Thyades and Menades. Ovid. Met. 6. v. 592.—Horat. 3, od. 25.—Propert. 3, el. 21.—Lucan. 1, v. 674.

Bacchi, a mountain of Thrace, near Philippi. Appian.

Bacchiădæ, a Corinthian family deſcended from Bacchia, daughter of Dionyſius. In their nocturnal orgies, they, as ſome report, tore to pieces Actæon, ſon of Meliſſus, which ſo enraged the father, that before the altar he entreated the Corinthians to r venge the death of his ſon, and immediately threw himſelf into the ſea. Upon this the Bacchiadæ were baniſhed, and went to ſettle in Sicily, between Pachynum and Pelorus. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 407.—Strab. 8.

BACCHĬDES, a general who betrayed the town of Sinope to Lucullus. Strab. 12.

BACCHIS or BALUS, king of Corinth, ſucceeded his father Prumnides. His ſucceſſors were always called Bacchidæ, in remembrance of the equity and moderation of his reign. The Bacchidæ increaſed ſo much, that they choſe one of their number to preſide among them with regal authority. Cypſelus overturned this inſtitution, by making himſelf abſolute. Strab. 8.—Paſ. 2, c. 4.—Herodot. 5, c. 92.

BACCHIUM, a ſmall iſland in the Ægean ſea, oppoſite Smyrna. Plin. 5, c. 3.

BACCHIUS & BITHUS, two celebrated gladiators of equal age and ſtrength; whence the proverb to expreſs equality, Bithus contra Bacchium.—Sueton. in Aug.—Horat. 1. ſat. 7, v. 20.

BACCHUS, was ſon of Jupiter and Semele, the daughter of Cadmus. After ſhe had enjoyed the company of Jupiter, Semele was deceived, and periſhed by the artifice of Juno. This goddeſs, always jealous of her huſband's amours, aſſumed the ſhape of Beroe, Semele's nurſe, and perſuaded Semele that the lover whom ſhe entertained was not Jupiter, but a falſe lover, and that to prove his divinity ſhe ought to beg of him, if he really were Jupiter, to come to her bed with the ſame majeſty as he courted the embraces of Juno. The artifice ſucceeded, and when Jupiter promiſed his miſtreſs whatever ſhe aſked, Semele required him to viſit her with all the divinity of a god. Jupiter was unable to violate his oath, and Semele, unwilling to retract it; therefore, as ſhe was a mortal, and unable to bear the majeſty of Jupiter, ſhe was conſumed, and reduced to aſhes. The child, of which ſhe had been pregnant for ſeven months, was with difficulty ſaved from the flames, and put in his father's thigh, where he remained the full time he naturally was to have been in his mother's womb. From this circumſtance Bacchus has been called Bimater. According to ſome, Dirce, a nymph of the Achelous, ſaved him from the flames. There are different traditions concerning the manner of his education. Ovid ſays, that, after his birth, he was brought up by his aunt Ino, and afterwards entruſted to the care of the nymphs of Nyſa. Lucian ſuppoſes, that Mercury carried him, as ſoon as born, to the nymphs of Nyſa; and Apollonius ſays, that he was carried by Mercury to a nymph in the iſland of Eubœa, whence he was driven by the power of Juno, who was the chief deity of the place. Some ſupport, that Naxus can boaſt of the place of his education, under the nymphs Philia, Coronis, and Clyda. Pauſanias relates a tradition which prevailed in the town of Braſiæ in Peloponneſus; and accordingly mentions, that Cadmus, as ſoon as he heard of his daughter's amours, ſhut her up, with her child lately born, in a coffer, and expoſed them on the ſea. The coffer was carried ſafe by the waves to the coaſt of Braſiæ; but Semele was found dead, and the child alive. Semele was honored with a magnificent funeral, and Bacchus properly educated. This diverſity of opinions ſhews that there were many of the ſame name. Diodorus ſpeaks of three, and Cicero of a greater number; but among them all, the ſon of Jupiter and Semele ſeems to have obtained the merit of the reſt. Bacchus is the Oſiris of the Egyptians, and his hiſtory is drawn from the Egyptian traditions concerning that ancient king. Bacchus aſſiſted the gods in their wars againſt the giants, and was cut to pieces; but the ſon of Semele was not then born: this tradition therefore is taken from the hiſtory of Oſiris, who was killed by his brother Typhon, and the worſhip of Oſiris has been introduced by Orpheus into Greece, under the name of Bacchus. In his youth he was taken aſleep in the iſland of Naxos, and carried away by ſome mariners whom he changed into dolphins, except the pilot, who had expreſſed ſome concern at his misfortune. His expedition into the eaſt is celebrated. He marched, at the head of an army compoſed of men, as well as of women, all inſpired with divine fury, and armed with thyrſuſes, cymbals, and other muſical inſtruments. The leader was drawn in a chariot by a lion and a tyger, and was accompanied by Pan and Silenus, and all the Satyrs. His conqueſts were eaſy, and without bloodſhed; the people eaſily ſubmitted, and gratefully elevated to the rank of a god the hero who taught them the uſe of the vine, the cultivation of the earth, and the manner of making honey. Amidſt his benevolence to mankind, he was relentleſs in puniſhing all want of diſreſpect to his divinity; and the puniſhment he inflicted on Pentheus, Agave, Lycurgus, &c. is well known. He has received the name of Liber, Bromius, Lyæus, Evan, Thyonæus, Pſilas, &c. which are moſtly derived from the places where he received adoration, or from the ceremonies obſerved in his feſtivals. As he was the god of wine, and of drinkers, he is generally repreſented crowned with vine and ivy leaves, with a thyrſus in his hand. His figure is that of an effeminate young man, to denote the joys which commonly prevail at feaſts; and ſometimes that of an old man, to teach us that wine taken immoderately will enervate us, conſume our health, render us loquacious and childiſh like old men, and unable to keep ſecrets. The panther is ſacred to him, becauſe he went in his expedition covered with the ſkin of that beaſt. The magpye is alſo his favorite bird, becauſe in triumphs people were permitted to ſpeak with boldneſs and liberty. Bacchus is ſometimes repreſented like an infant, holding a thyrſus and cluſters of grapes with a horn. He often appears naked, and riding upon the ſhoulders of Pan, or in the arms of Silenus, who was his foſter-father. He alſo ſits upon a celeſtial globe, beſpangled with ſtars, and is then the ſame as the Sun or Oſiris of Egypt. The feſtivals of Bacchus, generally called Orgies, Bacchanalia, or Dionyſia, were introduced into Greece from Egypt by Danaus and his daughters. The infamous debaucheries which aroſe from the celebration of theſe feſtivals is well known. [Vid. Dionyſia.] The amours of Bacchus are not numerous. He married Ariadne, after ſhe had been forſaken by Theſeus in the iſland of Naxos; and by her he had many children, among whom were Ceranus, Thoas, Œnopion, Tauropolis, &c. According to ſome, he was the father of Hymenæus, whom the Athenians made the god of marriage. The Egyptians ſacrificed pigs to him, before the doors of their houſes. The fir-tree, the yew-tree, the fig-tree, and the ivy, and the vine, were ſacred to him; and the goat was generally ſacrificed to him, on account of the great propenſity of that animal to deſtroy the vine. According to Pliny, he was the firſt who ever wore a crown. His beauty is compared to that of Apollo, and, like him, he is repreſented with fine hair looſely flowing down his ſhoulders, and he is ſaid to poſſeſs eternal youth. Sometimes he has horns, either becauſe he taught the cultivation of the earth with oxen, or becauſe Jupiter, his father, appeared to him in the deſarts of Libya under the ſhape of a ram, and ſupplied his thirſty army with water. Bacchus went down to hell to recover his mother, whom Jupiter willingly made a goddeſs, under the name of Thyone. The three perſons of the name of Bacchus, which Diodorus mentions, are, the one who conquered the Indies, and is ſirnamed the bearded Bacchus; a ſon of Jupiter and Proſerpine, who was repreſented with horns; and the ſon of Jupiter and Semele, called the Bacchus of Thebes. Thoſe mentioned by Cicero, are, a ſon of Proſerpine; a ſon of Niſus, who built Nyſa; a ſon of Caprius, who reigned in the Indies; a ſon of Jupiter and the Moon; and a ſon of Thyone and Niſus. *Cic. de Nat. BACCHYLIDES, a Lyric poet of Cos, nephew to Simonides, who, like Pindar, wrote the praiſes of Hiero. Some of his verſes have been preſerved. Marcel.

BACENIS, a wood in Germany. Cæſ. bell. Gall. 6, c. 10.

BACIS, a ſoothſayer of Bœotia. Cic. 1, de Div. c. 34.——A king of Corinth, called alſo Bacchis. Vid. Bacchis.——An athlete of Troezene. Pauſ. 6.

BACTRA, the capital of Bactriana, on the river Bactros in Aſia. Virg. G. 2, v. 138. —Strab. 2.

BACTRI & BACTRIĀNI, the inhabitants of Bactriana, who lived upon plunder, and were always under arms. They gave to their dogs thoſe that died through old age or diſeaſe, and ſuffered ſlaves and ſtrangers to take whatever liberties they pleaſed with their wives. They were conquered by Alexander the Great. Curt. 4, c. 6. &c.—Plin. 6, c. 23.—Plut. in vitioſ. ad infel. ſuſſ.—Herodot. 1 & 3.

BACTRIĀNA, a country of Aſia, fruitful as well as extenſive. It formed once part of the Perſian empire, on the eaſtern parts of which it is ſituated. Zoroaſter was the moſt ancient king of this country, who taught his ſubjects the art of magic and aſtrology. Diod. 2.—Juſtin. 1, c. 1.

BACTROS, a river on the borders of Aſiatic Scythia, from which Bactriana receives its name. Lucan. 3, v. 267.

BADACA, a town of Media. Diod. 19.

BADIA, a town of Spain. Val. Max. 3. c. 7.

BADIUS, a Campanian, who challenged T. Q. Criſpinus, one of his friends, by whom he was killed. Liv. 35, c. 18.

BADUHENNÆ, a place in the country of the Friſii, where 900 Romans were killed. Tacit. 4, Ann. c. 73.

BÆBIA LEX was enacted for the election of 4 pretors every other year. Liv. 40.—Another law by M. Bæbius a tribune of the people, which forbade the diviſion of the lands, whilſt it ſubſtituted a yearly tax to be paid by the poſſeſſors, and to be divided among the people. Appian. 1.

M. BÆBIUS, a Roman, in whoſe conſulſhip the tomb of Numa was diſcovered. Plut.

in Num.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1.——Lucius, a Roman pretor, who being ſurprized by the Ligurians, fled to Marſeilles, where he died three days after. Liv. 37, c. 57.

BÆTON, a Greek hiſtorian in the age of Alexander.

BAGISTAME, a delightful country of Media. Diod. 17.

BAGISTANES, a friend of Beſſus, whom he abandoned when he murdered Darius. Curt. 5, c. 13.

BAGŌAS & BAGŌSAS, an Egyptian eunuch in the court of Artaxerxes Ochus, ſo powerful that nothing could be done without his conſent. He led ſome troops againſt the Jews, and profaned their temple. He poiſoned Ochus, gave his fleſh to cats, and made knife-handles with his bones, becauſe he had killed the god Apis. He placed on the throne Arſes, the youngeſt of the ſlaughtered prince's children, and afterwards put him to death. He was at laſt killed, B. C. 335, by Darius, whom, after raiſing to the crown, he had attempted to poiſon. Diod. 16 & 17.—— Another greatly eſteemed by Alexander. He was the cauſe that one of the ſatraps was put to death by the moſt excruciating torments. Curt. 10, c. 1.—Plut. in Alex.—— The name of Bagoas occurs very frequently in the Perſian hiſtory; and it ſeems that moſt of the eunuchs of the monarchs of Perſia were generally known by that appellation.

BAGODARES, a friend of Beſſus, whom he abandoned when he attempted the life of Darius. Diod. 17.

BAGOPHĂNES, a governor of Babylon, who, when Alexander approached the city, ſtrewed all the ſtreets and burned incenſe on the altars, &c. Curt. 5, c. 1.

L. BALBUS, a lawyer, &c. one among the pupils of Scævola.——A man killed by the aſſaſſins of the triumvirs.

BALEĀRES, three iſlands in the Mediterranean, modernly called Majorca, Minorca, and Yvica, on the coaſt of Spain. The word is derived from βαλλειν to throw, becauſe the inhabitants were expert archers and ſlingers, beſides great pirates. We are told by Florus, that the mothers never gave their children breakfaſt before they had ſtruck with an arrow a certain mark in a tree. When a woman was married, ſhe was not admitted to her huſband's bed before ſhe had received the embraces of all her relations. The inhabitants were naturally of a laſcivious propenſity, and in their wars they required nothing but females and wine, and often changed four men for one woman. Strab. 14.—Flor. 3, c. 8.—Diod. 5.

BALĒTUS, a ſon of Hippo, who firſt founded Corinth. Patercul. 1, c. 3.

BALIUS, a horſe of Achilles. Homer. Il. 16, v. 146.

BALISTA, a mountain of Liguria. Liv. 40, c. 41.

BALLONŎTI, a people of European Sarmatia. Flacc. 6, v. 160.

BALNEÆ (baths) were very numerous at Rome, private as well as public. In the antient times ſimplicity was obſerved, but in the age of the emperors they became expenſive; they were uſed after walking, exerciſe, or labor, and were deemed more neceſſary than luxurious. Under the emperors it became ſo faſhionable to bathe, that without this the meaneſt of the people ſeemed to be deprived of one of the neceſſaries of life. There were certain certain hours of the day appointed for bathing, and a ſmall piece of money admitted the pooreſt as well as the moſt opulent. In the baths there were ſeparate apartments for the people to dreſs and to undreſs; and, after they had bathed, they commonly covered themſelves, the hair was plucked out of the ſkin, and the body rubbed over with a pumice ſtone, and perfumed to render it ſmooth and fair. The Roman emperors generally built baths, and all endeavoured to eclipſe each other in the magnificence of the building. It is ſaid, that Diocletian employed 40,000 of his ſoldiers in building his baths; and when they were finiſhed, he deſtroyed all the workmen. Alexander Severus firſt permitted the people to uſe them in the night, and he himſelf often bathed with the common people. For ſome time both ſexes bathed promiſcuouſly and without ſhame, and the edicts of the emperors proved abortive for a while in aboliſhing that indecent cuſtom, which gradually deſtroyed the morals of the people. They generally read in bathing, and we find many compoſitions written in the midſt of this luxurious enjoyment.

Belitæ, a nation of Aſia. Curt. 4, c. 12.

Bellerŏphon, ſon of Glaucus king of Ephyre, by Eurymede, was at firſt called Hipponous. The murder of his brother, whom ſome call Alcimenus & Beller, procured him the name of Bellerophon, or murderer of Beller. After this murder, Bellerophon fled to the court of Prœtus king of Argos. As he was of a handſome appearance, the king's wife, called Antæa or Stenobœa, fell in love with him; and as he ſlighted her paſſion, ſhe accuſed him before her huſband, of attempts upon her virtue. Prœtus, unwilling to violate the laws of hoſpitality, by puniſhing Bellerophon, ſent him away to his father-in-law Jobates king of Lycia, and gave him a letter, in which he begged the king to puniſh with death, a man who had ſo diſhonorably treated his daughter. From that circumſtance all letters which are of an unfavorable tendency to the bearer, have been called letters of Bellerophon. Jobates, to ſatisfy his ſon-in-law, ſent Bellerophon to conquer a horrible monſter called Chimæra, in which dangerous expedition he hoped, and was even aſſured, he muſt periſh. [Vid. Chimæra.] But the providence of Minerva ſupported him, and, with the aid of the winged horſe Pegaſus, he conquered the monſter, and returned victorious. After this, Jobates ſent him againſt the Solymi, in hopes of ſeeing him deſtroyed; but he obtained another victory, and conquered afterwards the Amazons, by the king's orders. At his return from this third expedition, he was attacked by a party ſent againſt him by Jobates; but he deſtroyed all his aſſaſſins, and convinced the king that innocence is always protected by the gods. Upon this, Jobates no longer ſought to deſtroy his life; but he gave him his daughter in marriage, and made him his ſucceſſor on the throne of Lycia, as he was without male iſſue. Some authors have ſupported, that he attempted to fly to heaven upon the horſe Pegaſus; but that Jupiter ſent an inſect, which ſtung the horſe, and threw down the rider, who wandered upon the earth in the greateſt melancholy and dejection till the day of his death, one generation before the Trojan war. Bellerophon had two ſons, Iſander, who was killed in his war againſt the Solymi, and Hippolochus, who ſucceeded to the throne after his death, beſides one daughter called Hippodamia, who had Sarpedon by Jupiter. Homer. Il. 6, v. 156, &c. —Juv. 10.—Apollod. 2, c. 3. l. 3, c. 1.—Hygin. fab. 157 & 243. P. A. 2, c. 18.—Heſiod. Theog. v. 325.—Horat. 4, od. 11, v. 26.—Pauſ. 9, c. 31.

Belliēnus, a Roman, whoſe houſe was ſet on flames at Cæſar's funeral. Cic. 2, Phil. c. 36.

Bellōna, the goddeſs of war, daughter to Phorcys and Ceto, was called by the Greeks Ényo, and often confounded with Minerva. She was antiently called Duelliona, and was the ſiſter of Mars, or, according to others, his daughter, or his wife. She prepared the chariot of Mars when he was going to war; and ſhe appeared in battles armed with a whip to animate the combatants, with diſhevelled hair, and a torch in her hand. The Romans paid great adoration to her; but ſhe was held in the greateſt veneration by the Cappadocians, and chiefly at Comana, where ſhe had above 3000 prieſts. Her temple at Rome was near the Porta Carmentalis. In it the ſenators gave audience to foreign ambaſſadors, and to generals returned from war. At the gate was a ſmall column, called the column of war, againſt which they threw a ſpear whenever war was declared againſt an enemy. The prieſts of this goddeſs conſecrated themſelves by great inciſions in their body, and particularly in the thigh, of which they received the blood in their hands to offer as a ſacrifice to the goddeſs. In their wild enthuſiaſm they often predicted bloodſhed and wars, the defeat of enemies, or the beſieging of towns. Juv. 4, v. 124.—Varro de L. L. 5.—Heſiod Theog. v. 270.—Pauſ. 4, c. 30.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 703.—Stat. Theb. 2, v. 718. l. 7, v. 73.—Ital. 5, v. 221.

Belus, one of the moſt antient kings of Babylon, about 1800 years before the age of Semiramis, was made a god after death, and worſhipped with much ceremony by the Aſſyrians and Babylonians. He was ſuppoſed to be the ſon of the Oſiris of the Egyptians. The temple of Belus was the moſt antient and moſt magnificent in the world. It was originally the tower of Babel, which was converted into a temple. It had lofty towers, and it was enriched by all the ſucceeding monarchs till the age of Xerxes, who, after his unfortunate expedition againſt Greece, plundered and demoliſhed it. Among the riches it contained were many ſtatues of maſſy gold, one of which was 40 feet high. In the higheſt of the towers was a magnificent bed, where the prieſts daily conducted a woman, who, as they ſaid, was honored with the company of the god. *Joſeph. Ant. Brachmānes, Indian philoſophers, who derive their name from Brahma, one of the three beings whom God, according to their theology, created, and with whoſe aſſiſtance he formed the world. They devoted themſelves totally to the worſhip of the gods, and were accuſtomed from their youth to endure labors, and to live with frugality and abſtinence. They never eat fleſh, and abſtained from the uſe of wine, and all carnal enjoyments. After they had ſpent 37 years in the greateſt trials, they were permitted to marry, and indulge themſelves in a more free and unbounded manner. According to modern authors, Brahma is the parent of all mankind, and he produced as many worlds as there are parts in the body, which they reckoned 14. They believed that there were ſeven ſeas, of water, milk, curds, butter, ſalt, ſugar, and wine, each bleſſed with its particular paradiſe. Strab. 15.—Diod. 17.

Braure, a woman who assisted in the murder of Pittacus, king of the Edoni. Thucyd. 4, c, 107.

Brauron, a town of Attica, where Diana had a temple. The goddess had three festivals called Brauronia, celebrated once every fifth year by ten men who were called ἀρκτοποι. They sacrificed a goat to the goddess, and it was usual to sing one of the books of Homer's Iliad. The most remarkable that attended were young virgins in yellow gowns, consecrated to Diana. They were about ten years of age, and not under five, and therefore their consecration was called δεκατευειν, from δεκα, decem; and sometimes αρκτευειν, as the virgins themselves bore the name of αρκτοι, bears, from this circumstance. There was a bear in one of the villages of Attica, so tame, that he ate with the inhabitants, and played harmlessly with them. This familiarity lasted long, till a young virgin treated the animal too roughly, and was killed by it. The virgin's brothers killed the bear, and the country was soon after visited by a pestilence. The oracle was consulted and the plague removed by consecrating virgins to the service of Diana. This was so faithfully observed, that no woman in Athens was ever married before a previous consecration to the goddess. The statue of Diana of Tauris, which had been brought into Greece by Iphigenia, was preserved in the town of Brauron. Xerxes carried it away when he invaded Greece. Paus. 8, c. 46. —Strab. 9.

Brenni & Breuni, a people of Noricum. Horat. 4, od. 14.

Brennus, a general of the Galli Senones, who entered Italy, defeated the Romans at the river Allia, and entered their city without opposition. The Romans fled into the capitol, and left the whole city in the possession of the enemies. The Gauls climbed the Tarpeian rock in the night, and the capitol would have been taken had not the Romans been awakened by the noise of geese which were before the doors, and immediately repelled the enemy. Camillus, who was in banishment, marched to the relief of his country, and so totally defeated the Gauls, that not one remained to carry the news of their destruction. Liv. 5, c. 36, &c.—Plut. in Camill.——Another Gaul, who made an irruption into Greece with 150,000 men and 15,000 horse, and endeavoured to plunder the temple of Apollo at Delphi. He was destroyed, with all his troops, by the god, or more properly killed himself in a fit of intoxication, B. C. 278, after being defeated by the Delphians. Paus. 10, c. 22 & 23.—Justin. 24, c. 6, &c.

Brenthe, a ruined city of Arcadia. Paus. 8, c. 28.

Brescia, a city of Italy, who had gods peculiar to itself.

Brettii, a people of Italy. Strab. 6.

Briăreus, a famous giant, son of Cœlus and Terra, who had 100 hands and 50 heads, and was called by men Ægeon, and only by the gods Briareus. When Juno, Neptune, and Minerva conspired to dethrone Jupiter, Briareus ascended the heavens, and seated himself next to him, and so terrified the conspirators by his fierce and threatening looks, that they desisted. He assisted the giants in their war against the gods, and was thrown under mount Ætna, according to some accounts. Hesiod. Theog. v. 148.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.—Homer. Il. 1, v. 403.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 287. l. 10, v. 565.——A Cyclop, made judge between Apollo and Neptune, in their dispute about the isthmus and promontory of Corinth. He gave the former to Neptune, and the latter to Apollo. Paus. 2, c. 1.

Brias, a town of Pisidia.

Brigantes, a people in the northern parts of Britain. Juv. 14, v. 196.—Paus. 8, c. 43.

Brigantīnus, a lake of Rhætia between the Alps, with a town called Brigantium. Plin. 9, c. 17.

Brilessus, a mountain of Attica. Thucyd. 2, c. 23.

Brīmo, (terror) a name given to Proserpine and Hecate. Propert. 2, el. 2, v. 11.

Brisēis, a woman of Lyrnessus, called also Hippodamia. When her country was taken by the Greeks, and her husband and brother killed in the fight, she fell to the share of Achilles, in the division of the spoils. Agamemnon took her away some time after from Achilles, who made a vow to absent himself from the field of battle. Briseis was very faithful to Achilles; and when Agamemnon restored her to him, he swore he had never offended her chastity. Homer. Il. 1, 2, &c.—Ovid. Heroid. 3, de Art. Am. 2 & 3.—Propert. 2, el. 8, 20 & 22.—Paus. 5, c. 24.—Horat. 2, od. 4.

Brises, a man of Lyrnessus, brother to the priest Chryses. His daughter Hippodamia was called Briseis from him.

Briseus, a surname of Bacchus, from his nurse of the same name, or his temple at Brisa, a promontory of Lesbos. Persius. 1, v. 76.

Britanni, the inhabitants of Britain. [Vid. Britannia.]——A nation in Gallia Belgica. Plin. 4, c. 17.

Britannia, an island in the northern ocean, ocean, the greateſt in Europe, conquered by J. Cæſar during his Gallic wars, B. C. 55. and firſt known to be an iſland by Agricola, who ſailed round it. It was a Roman province from the time of its conqueſt till the 448th year of the chriſtian era. The inhabitants, in the age of Cæſar, uſed to paint their bodies, to render themſelves more terrible in the eyes of their enemies. The name of Britain was unknown to the Romans before Cæſar conquered it. Cæſ. bell. G. 4.—Diod. 5.—Pauſ. 1, c. 33.—Tacit. in Agric. 10.—Plin. 34, c. 17.

Britannĭcus, a ſon of Claudius Cæſar by Meſſalina. Nero was raiſed to the throne in preference to him, by means of Agrippina, and cauſed him to be poiſoned. His corpſe was buried in the night; but it is ſaid that a ſhower of rain waſhed away the white paint which the murderer had put over his face, ſo that it appeared quite black, and diſcovered the effects of poiſon. Tacit. Ann.—Sueton. in Ner. c. 33.

Britomartis, a beautiful nymph of Crete, daughter of Jupiter and Charme. She was loved by Minos, who purſued her ſo cloſely, that, to avoid his importunities, ſhe threw herſelf into the ſea. Pauſ. 2, c. 30, l. 3, c. 14.——A ſirname of Diana.

Britomarus, a chief of the Galli Inſubres, conquered by Æmilius. Flor. 2, c. 4.

Britŏnes, the inhabitants of Britain. Juv. 15, v. 124.

Brixellum, a town in Italy near Mantua. Tacit. Hiſt. 2, c. 32.

Brixia, a town of Italy beyond the Po. Juſtin. 20, c. 5.

Brizo, the goddeſs of dreams, worſhipped in Delos.

Brocubēlus, a governor of Syria, who fled to Alexander, when Darius was murdered by Beſſus. Curt. 5, c. 13.

Bromius, a ſirname of Bacchus, from Βρεμειν, frendere, alluding to the groans which Semele uttered when conſumed by Jupiter's fire. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 11.——A ſon of Ægyptus. Apollod. 2, c. 1.

Brontes, (thunder) one of the Cyclops. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 425.

Brontīnus, a Pythagorean philoſopher. ——The father of Theano, the wife of Pythagoras. Diog.

Broteas & Ammon, two men famous for their ſkill in the ceſtus. Ovid Met, 5. v. 107.—One of the Lapithæ.

Brotheus, a ſon of Vulcan and Minerva, who burned himſelf to avoid the ridicule to which his deformity ſubjected him. Ovid. in Ib. v. 517.

Bructēri, a people of Germany. Tacit. Ann. 1. c. 51.

Brumālia, feſtivals celebrated at Rome in honor of Bacchus, about the month of December. They were firſt inſtituted by Romulus.

Brandŭsium, a city of Calabria, on the Adriatic Sea, where the Appian road was terminated. It was founded by Diomedes after the Trojan war, or according to Strabo, by Theſeus, with a Cretan colony. The Romans generally embarked at Brandſium for Greece. It is famous for the birth of the poet Pacuvius, and the death of Virgil, and likewiſe for its harbour, which is capacious, and ſheltered by the land, and by a ſmall iſland at the entrance, againſt the fury of the winds and waves. Little remains of the ancient city, and even its harbour has now been choaked up by the negligence of the inhabitants. Juſtin. 3, c. 4, l. 12, c. 2.—Strab. 5.—Cæſ. bell. Civ. 1, c. 24.—Cic. ad Attic. 4, ep. 1.

Brutidius, a man dragged to priſon in Juvenal's age, on ſuſpicion of his favoring Sejanus. Juv. 10, v. 82.

Brutii, a people in the fartheſt parts of Italy, who were originally ſhepherds of the Lucanians, but revolted, and went in queſt of a ſettlement. They received the name of Brutii, from their ſtupidity and cowardice in ſubmitting, without oppoſition, to Annibal in the 2d Punic war. They were ever after held in the greateſt diſgrace, and employed in every ſervile work. Juſtin. 23, c. 9.—Strab. 6.—Diod. 16.

Brutŭlus, a Samnite, who killed himſelf, upon being delivered to the Romans for violating a treaty. Liv. 8, c. 39.

Brutus, L. Junius, ſon of M. Junius and Tarquinia ſecond daughter of Tarquin Priſcus. The father, with his eldeſt ſon, were murdered by Tarquin the Proud; and Lucia unable to revenge their death, pretended to be inſane. The artifice ſaved his life; was called Brutus for his ſtupidity, which however ſoon after ſhewed to be feigned. When Lucretia killed herſelf, B. C. 509. in conſequence of the brutality of Tarquin Brutus ſnatched the dagger from the wound and ſwore, upon the reeking blade, immortal hatred to the royal family. His example animated the Romans, the Tarquins were proſcribed by a decree of the ſenate, and the royal authority veſted in the hands of conſuls chosen from patrician families. Brutus, in his conſular office, made the people ſwear they never would again ſubmit to kingly authority; but the firſt who violated their oath were in his own family. His ſons conſpired with the Tuſcan ambaſſador to reſtore the Tarquins; and when diſcovered, they were tried and condemned by their father, who himſelf attended at their execution. Some time after, in a combat that was fought between the Romans and Tarquins, Brutus engaged with Aruns, and ſo fierce was the attack that they pierced one another at the ſame time. The dead body was brought to Rome, and received as in triumph; a funeral oration was ſpoken over it, and the Roman matrons ſhowed their grief by mourning a year for the father of the republic. Flor. 1, c. 9.—Liv. 1. c. 56, l. 2, c. 1, &c.—Dionyſ. Hal. 4 & 5.—C. Nep. in Attic. 8.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 818. Plut. in Brut. & Cæſ.——Marcus Junius, father of Cæſar's murderer, wrote three books on civil law. He followed the party of Marius, and was conquered by Pompey. After the death of Sylla, he was beſieged in Mutina by Pompey, to whom he ſurrendered, and by whoſe orders he was put to death. He had married Servilia, Cato's ſiſter, by whom he had a ſon and two daughters. Cic. de. Orat. c. 55.—Plut. in Brut.——His ſon of the ſame name by Servilia, was lineally deſcended from J. Brutus, who expelled the Tarquins from Rome. He ſeemed to inherit the republican principles of his great progenitor, and in the civil wars joined himſelf to the ſide of Pompey, though he was his father's murderer, only becauſe he looked upon him as more juſt and patriotic in his claims. At the battle of Pharſalia, Cæſar not only ſpared the life of Brutus, but he made him one of his moſt faithful friends. He however forgot the favor becauſe Cæſar aſpired to tyranny. He conſpired with many of the moſt illuſtrious citizens of Rome againſt the tyrant, and ſtabbed him in Pompey's Baſilica. The tumult which this murder occaſioned was great; the conſpirators fled to the capitol, and by proclaiming freedom and liberty to the populace, they re-eſtabliſhed tranquillity in the city. Antony, whom Brutus, contrary to the opinion of his aſſociates, refuſed to ſeize, gained ground in behalf of his friend Cæſar, and the murderers were ſoon obliged to leave Rome. Brutus retired into Greece, where he gained himſelf many friends by his arms, as well as by perſuaſion, and he was ſoon after purſued thither by Antony, whom young Octavius accompanied. A battle was fought at Philippi. Brutus, who commanded the right wing of the republican army, defeated the enemy; but Caſſius, who had the care of the left, was overpowered, and as he knew not the ſituation of his friend, and grew deſperate, he ordered one of his freed-men to run him through. Brutus deeply deplored his fall, and in the fullneſs of his grief, called him the laſt of the Romans. In another battle, the wing which Brutus commanded obtained a victory; but the other was defeated, and he found himſelf ſurrounded by the ſoldiers of Antony. He however made his eſcape, and ſoon after fell upon his ſword, B. C. 42. Antony honored him with a magnificent funeral. Brutus is not leſs celebrated for his literary talents, than his valor in the field. When he was in the camp, the greateſt part of his time was employed in reading and writing; and the day which preceded one of his moſt bloody battles, while the reſt of his army was under continual apprehenſions, Brutus calmly ſpent his hours till the evening, in writing an epitome of Polybius. He was fond of imitating the auſtere virtues of Cato, and in reading the hiſtories of nations he imbibed thoſe principles of freedom which were ſo eminently diſplayed in his political career. He was intimate with Cicero, to whom he would have communicated his conſpiracy, had he not been apprehenſive of his great timidity. He ſeverely reprimanded him in his letters for joining the ſide of Octavius, who meditated the ruin of the republic. Plutarch mentions, that Cæſar's ghoſt made its appearance to Brutus in his tent, and told him that he would meet him at Philippi. Brutus married Porcia, the daughter of Cato, who killed herſelf, by ſwallowing burning coals when ſhe heard the fate of her huſband. C. Nep. in Attic.—Paterc. 2, c. 48.—Plut. in Brut. &c. Cæſ. 1.—Flor. 4.——D. Jun. Albinus, one of Cæſar's murderers, who, after the battle of Mutina, was deſerted by the legions, with which he wiſhed to march againſt Antony. He was put to death by Antony's orders, though conſul elect.——Jun. one of the firſt tribunes of the people. Plut.——One of Carbo's generals.

Bucephălus, a horse of Alexander's, whose head resembled that of a bull, whence his name (Βου κεφαλος, bovis caput). Alexander was the only one who could mount on his back, and he always knelt down to take up his master. He was present in an engagement in Asia, where he received a heavy wound, and hastened immediately out of the battle, and dropped down dead as soon as he had set down the king in a safe place. He was 30 years old when he died, and Alexander built a city which he called after his name. Plut. in Alex.—Curt.—Arrian. 5, c. 3.—Plin. 8, c. 42.

Buciliānus, one of Cæsar's murderers. Cic. ad Attic. 14.

Bucolĭca, a sort of poem which treats of the care of the flocks, and of the pleasures and occupations of the rural life, with simplicity and elegance. The most famous pastoral writers of antiquity are Moschus, Bion, Theocritus, and Virgil. The invention of Bucolics, or pastoral poetry, is attributed to a shepherd of Sicily.

Byzacium, a country of Africa.

Byzantium, a town ſituate on the Thracian Boſphorus, founded by a colony of Megara, under the conduct of Byzas, 658 years before the Chriſtian era. Paterculus ſays it was founded by the Mileſians, and by the Lacedæmonians according to Juſtin, and according to Ammianus by the Athenians. The pleaſantneſs and convenience of its ſituation was obſerved by Conſtantine the Great, who made it the capital of the eaſtern Roman empire, A. D. 328, and called it Conſtantinopolis. A number of Greek writers, who have deſerved or uſurped the name of Byzantine hiſtorians, floriſhed at Byzantium, after the ſeat of the empire had been tranſlated thither from Rome. Their works, which more particularly relate to the time in which they floriſhed, and are ſeldom read but by thoſe who wiſh to form an acquaintance with the revolutions of the lower empire, were publiſhed in one large collection, in 36 vols. folio, 1648, &c. at Paris, and recommended themſelves by the notes and ſupplement of Du Freſne du Cange. They were likewiſe printed at Venice 1729, in 28 vols. though perhaps this edition is not ſo valuable as that of the French. Strab. 1.—Paterc. 2, c. 15.—*C. Nep. in Pauſ. CABĪRI, certain deities held in the greateſt veneration at Thebes and Lemnos, but more particularly in the iſlands of Samothrace and Imbros. The number of theſe deities is uncertain. Some ſay there were only two, Jupiter and Bacchus; others mention three, and ſome four, Aſchieros, Achiocherſa, Achiocherſus & Camillus. It is unknown where their worſhip was firſt eſtabliſhed; yet Phœnicia ſeems to be the place according to the authority of Sanchoniathon, and from thence it was introduced into Greece by the Pelaſgi. The feſtivals or myſteries of the Cabiri, were celebrated with the greateſt ſolemnity at Samothrace, where all the ancient heroes and princes were generally initiated, as their power ſeemed to be great in protecting perſons from ſhipwreck and ſtorms. The obſcenities which prevailed in the celebration have obliged the authors of every country to paſs over them in ſilence, and ſay that it was unlawful to reveal them. Theſe deities are often confounded with the Corybantes, Anaces, Dioſcuri, &c. and according to Herodotus, Vulcan was their father. This author mentions the ſacrilege which Cambyſes committed in entering their temple, and turning to ridicule their ſacred myſteries. They were ſuppoſed to preſide over metals. Herodot. 2, c. 51.—Strab. 10, &c.—Pauſ. 9, c. 22, &c.—Cic. de Nat. D. 1.

CACA, a goddeſs among the Romans, ſiſter to Cacus, who is ſaid to have diſcovered to Hercules where her brother had concealed his oxen. She preſided over the excrements of the body. The veſtals offered ſacrifices in her temple. Lactant. 1, c. 20.

CACHĂLES, a river of Phocis. Pauſ. 10, c. 32.

CACUS, a famous robber, ſon of Vulcan and Meduſa, repreſented as a three-headed monſter, and as vomiting flames. He reſided in Italy, and the avenues of his cave were covered with human bones. He plundered the neighbouring country; and when Hercules returned from the conqueſt of Geryon, Cacus ſtole ſome of his cows, and dragged them backwards into his cave to prevent diſcovery. Hercules departed without perceiving the theft; but his oxen having lowed, were anſwered by the cows in the cave of Cacus, and the hero became acquainted with the loſs he had ſuſtained. He ran to the place, attacked Cacus, ſqueezed and ſtrangled him in his arms, though vomiting fire and ſmoke. Hercules erected an altar to Jupiter Servator, in commemoration of his victory; and an annual feſtival was inſtituted by the inhabitants in honor of the hero, who had delivered them from ſuch a public calamity. Ovid. 1, Faſt. v. 551.—*Virg. CADMĒA, a citadel of Thebes, built by Cadmus. It is generally taken for Thebes itſelf, and the Thebans are often called Cadmeans. Stat. Theb. 8, v. 601.—Pauſ. 9, c. 5.

CADMĒIS, an ancient name of Bœotia.

CADMUS, ſon of Agenor king of Phœnicia, by Telephaſſa or Agriope, was ordered by his father to go in queſt of his ſiſter Europa, whom Jupiter had carried away, and he was never to return to Phœnicia if he did not bring her back. As his ſearch proved fruitleſs, he conſulted the oracle of Apollo, and was ordered to build a city where he ſhould ſee a young heifer ſtop in the graſs, and to call the country Bœotia. He found the heifer according the directions of the oracle; and as he wiſhed to thank the god by a ſacrifice, he ſent his companions to fetch water from a neighbouring grove. The waters were ſacred to Mars and guarded by a dragon, which devoured all the Phœnician's attendants. Cadmus, tired of their ſeeming delay, went to the place, and ſaw the monſter ſtill feeding on their fleſh. He attacked the dragon, and overcame it by the aſſiſtance of Minerva, and ſowed the teeth in a plain, upon which armed men ſuddenly roſe up from the ground. He threw a ſtone in the midſt of them, and they inſtantly turned their arms one againſt the other, till all periſhed except five, who aſſiſted him in building his city. Soon after he married Hermione the daughter of Venus, with whom he lived in the greateſt cordiality, and by whom he had a ſon, Polydorus, and four daughters, Ino, Agave, Autonoe, and Semele. Juno perſecuted thoſe children; and their well-known misfortunes ſo diſtracted Cadmus and Hermione, that they retired to Illyricum, loaded with grief and infirm with age. They intreated the gods to remove them from the misfortunes of life, and they were immediately changed into ſerpents. Some explain the dragon's fable, by ſuppoſing that it was a king of the country that Cadmus conquered by war; and the armed men riſing from the field, is no more than men armed with braſs, according to the ambiguous ſignification of a Phœnician word. Cadmus was the firſt who introduced the uſe of letters into Greece; but ſome maintain, that the alphabet which he brought from Phœnicia, was only different from that which was uſed by the ancient inhabitants of Greece. This alphabet conſiſted only of 16 letters, to which Palamedes afterwards added four, and Simonides of Melos the ſame number. The worſhip of many of the Egyptian and Phœnician deities was alſo introduced by Cadmus, who is ſuppoſed to have come into Greece 1493 years before the chriſtian era, and to have died 61 years after. According to thoſe who believe that Thebes was built at the ſound of Amphion's lyre, Cadmus built only a ſmall citadel which he called Cadmea, and laid the foundations of a city which was finiſhed by one of his ſucceſſors. *Ovid. CADRA, a hill of Aſia Minor. Tacit.

CADŪCEUS, a rod entwined at one end by two ſerpents, in the form of two equal ſemicircles. It was the attribute of Mercury, and had been given him by Apollo in return for the lyre. Various interpretations have been put upon the two ſerpents round it. Some ſuppoſe them to be a ſymbol of Jupiter's amours with Rhea, when theſe two deities transformed themſelves into ſnakes. Others ſay, that it originates from Mercury's having appeaſed the fury of two ſerpents that were fighting, by touching them with his rod. Prudence is generally ſuppoſed to be repreſented by theſe two ſerpents, and the wings are the ſymbol of diligence; both neceſſary in the purſuit of buſineſs and commerce, which Mercury patronized. With it Mercury conducted to the infernal regions the ſouls of the dead, and could lull to ſleep, and even raiſe to life a dead perſon. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 242.—Horat. 1, od. 10.

CÆRE, CÆRES, or AGYLLA, a city of Etruria, once the capital of the whole country. It was in being in the age of Strabo. When Æneas came to Italy, Mezentius was king over the inhabitants called Cæretes or Cærites; but they baniſhed their prince, and aſſiſted the Trojans. The people of Cære received with all poſſible hoſpitality the Romans who fled with the fire of Veſta, when the city was beſieged by the Gauls, and for this humanity they were made citizens of Rome, but without the privilege of voting; whence Cærites tabulæ was applied to thoſe who had no ſuffrage, and Cærites cera appropriated as a mark of contempt. Virg. Æn. 8 & 10.—Liv. 1, c. 2.—Strab. 5.

CÆRESI, a people of Germany. Cæſ.

CÆSAR, a ſirname given to the Julian family at Rome, either becauſe one of them kept an elephant, which bears the ſame name in the Punic tongue, or becauſe one was born with a thick head of hair. This name, after it had been dignified in the perſon of Julius Cæſar, and of his ſucceſſors, was given to the apparent heir of the empire, in the age of the Roman emperors. The twelve firſt Roman emperors were diſtinguiſhed by the ſirname of Cæſar. They reigned in the following order: Julius Cæſar, Auguſtus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero, Galba, Otho, Vitellius, Veſpaſian, Titus, and Domitian. In Domitian, or rather in Nero, the family of Julius Cæſar was extinguiſhed. But after ſuch a lapſe of time, the appellation of Cæſar ſeemed inſeparable from the imperial dignity, and therefore it was aſſumed by the ſucceſſors of the Julian family. Suetonius has written an account of theſe twelve characters, in an extenſive and impartial manner.——C. Julius Cæſar, the firſt emperor of Rome, was ſon of L. Cæſar and Aurelia the daughter of Cotta. He was deſcended, according to ſome accounts, from Julus the ſon of Æneas. When he reached his 15th year he loſt his father, and the year after he was made prieſt of Jupiter. Sylla was aware of his ambition, and endeavoured to remove him; but Cæſar underſtood his intentions, and, to avoid diſcovery, changed every day his lodgings. He was received into Sylla's friendſhip ſome time after; and the dictator told thoſe who ſolicited the advancement of young Cæſar, that they were warm in the intereſt of a man who would prove ſome day or other the ruin of their country and of their liberty. When Cæſar went to finiſh his ſtudies at Rhodes, under Appollonius Molo, he was ſeized by pirates, who offered him his liberty for 30 talents. He gave them 40, and threatened to revenge their inſults; and he no ſooner was out of their power, than he armed a ſhip, purſued them, and crucified them all. His eloquence procured him friends at Rome; and the generous manner in which he lived, equally ſerved to promote his intereſt. He obtained the office of high prieſt at the death of Metellus; and after he had paſſed thro' the inferior employments of the ſtate, he was appointed over Spain, where he ſignalized himſelf by his valor and intrigues. At his return to Rome, he was made conſul, and ſoon after he effected a reconciliation between Craſſus and Pompey. He was appointed for the ſpace of five years over the Gauls, by the intereſt of Pompey, to whom he had given his daughter Julia in marriage. Here he enlarged the boundaries of the Roman empire by conqueſt, and invaded Britain, which was then unknown to the Roman people. He checked the Germans, and ſoon after had his government over Gaul prolonged to five other years, by means of his friends at Rome. The death of Julia and of Craſſus, the corrupted ſtate of the Roman ſenate, and the ambition of Cæſar and Pompey, ſoon became the cauſes of a civil war. Neither of theſe celebrated Romans would ſuffer a ſuperior, and the ſmalleſt matters were ſufficient ground for unſheathing the ſword. Cæſar's petitions were received with coldneſs or indifference by the Roman ſenate; and, by the influence of Pompey, a decree was paſſed to ſtrip him of his power. Antony, who oppoſed it as tribune, fled to Cæſar's camp with the news; and the ambitious general no ſooner heard this, than he made it a plea of reſiſtance. On pretence of avenging the violence which had been offered to the ſacred office of tribune in the perſon of Antony, he croſſed the Rubicon, which was the boundary of his province. The paſſage of the Rubicon was a declaration of war, and Cæſar entered Italy ſword in hand. Upon this, Pompey, with all the friends of liberty, left Rome, and retired to Dyrrachium; and Cæſar, after he had ſubdued all Italy, in 60 days, entered Rome, and provided himſelf with money from the public treaſury. He went to Spain, where he conquered the partizans of Pompey, under Petreius, Afranius, and Varro; and, at his return to Rome, was declared dictator, and ſoon after conſul. When he left Rome, he went in queſt of Pompey, obſerving that he was marching againſt a general without troops, after having defeated troops without a general in Spain. In the plains of Pharſalia, B. C. 48, the two hoſtile generals engaged. Pompey was conquered, and fled into Egypt, where he was murdered. Cæſar, after he had made a noble uſe of victory, purſued his adverſary into Egypt, where he ſometimes forgot his fame and character in the arms of Cleopatra, by whom he had a ſon. His danger was great while at Alexandria; but he extricated himſelf with wonderful ſucceſs, and made Egypt tributary to his power. After ſeveral conqueſts in Africa, the defeat of Cato, Scipio, and Juba, and that of Pompey's ſons in Spain, he entered Rome, and triumphed over five different nations, Gaul, Alexandria, Pontus, Africa, and Spain, and was created perpetual dictator. But now his glory was at an end, his uncommon ſucceſs created him enemies, and the chiefeſt of the ſenators, among whom was Brutus his moſt intimate friend, conſpired againſt him, and ſtabbed him in the ſenate-houſe on the ides of March. He died, pierced with 23 wounds, the 15th of March, B. C. 44, in the 56th year of his age. Caſca gave him the firſt blow, and immediately he attempted to make ſome reſiſtance; but when he ſaw Brutus among the conſpirators, he ſubmitted to his fate, and fell down at their feet, muffling up his mantle, and exclaiming, Tu quoque Brute! Cæſar might have eſcaped the ſword of the conſpirators, if he had liſtened to the advice of his wife, whoſe dreams, on the night previous to the day of his murder, were alarming. He alſo received, as he went to the ſenate-houſe, a paper from Artemidorus, which diſcovered the whole conſpiracy to him; but he neglected the reading of what might have ſaved his life. When he was in his firſt campaign in Spain, he was obſerved to gaze at a ſtatue of Alexander, and even he ſhed tears at the recollection that that hero had conquered the world at an age in which he himſelf had done nothing. The learning of Cæſar deſerves commendation, as well as his military character. He reformed the calendar. He wrote his commentaries on the Gallic wars, on the ſpot where he fought his battles; and the compoſition has been admired for the elegance as well as the correctneſs of its ſtyle. This valuable book was nearly loſt; and when Cæſar ſaved his life in the bay of Alexandria, he was obliged to ſwim from his ſhip, with his arms in one hand, and his commentaries in the other. Beſides the Gallic and Civil wars, he wrote other pieces, which are now loſt. The hiſtory of the war in Alexandria and Spain, is attributed to him by ſome, and by others to Hirtius. Cæſar has been blamed for his debaucheries and expences; and the firſt year he had a public office, his debts were rated at 830 talents, which his friends diſcharged: yet, in his public character, he muſt be reckoned one of the few heroes that rarely make their appearance among mankind. His qualities were ſuch that in every battle he could not be but conqueror, and in every republic, maſter; and to his ſenſe of his ſuperiority over the reſt of the world, or to his ambition, we are to attribute his ſaying, that he wiſhed rather to be firſt in a little village, than ſecond at Rome. It was after his conqueſt over Pharnaces in one day, that he made uſe of theſe remarkable words, to expreſs the celerity of his operations; Veni, vidi, vici. Conſcious of the ſervices of a man who, in the intervals of peace, beautified and enriched the capital of his country with public buildings, libraries, and porticos, the ſenate permitted the dictator to wear a laurel crown on his bald head; and it is ſaid, that, to reward his benevolence, they were going to give him the title or authority of king all over the Roman empire, except Italy, when he was murdered. In his private character, Cæſar has been accuſed of ſeducing one of the veſtal virgins, and ſuſpected of being privy to Catiline's conſpiracy; and it was his fondneſs for diſſipate pleaſures which made his countrymen ſay, that he was the huſband of all the women at Rome, and the woman of all men. It is ſaid that he conquered 300 nations, took 800 cities, and defeated three millions of men, one of which fell in the field of battle. Plin. 7, c. 25. ſays, that he could employ at the ſame time, his ears to liſten, his eyes to read, his hand to write, and his mind to dictate. His death was preceded, as many authors mention, by uncommon prodigies; and immediately after his death, a large comet made its appearance. The beſt editions of Cæſar's commentaries, are the magnificent one by Dr. Clarke, fol. Lond. 1712; that of Cambridge, with a Greek tranſlation, 4to. 1727; that of Oudendorp. 2 vols. 4to. L. C. CALĬGŬLA, the emperor, received this ſirname from his wearing in the camp, the Caliga, a military covering for the leg. He was ſon of Germanicus by Agrippina, and grandſon to Tiberius. During the firſt 8 months of his reign, Rome expected univerſal proſperity, the exiles were recalled, taxes were remitted, and proſligates diſmiſſed; but Caligula ſoon became proud, wanton, and cruel. He built a temple to himſelf, and ordered his head to be placed on the images of the gods, while he wiſhed to imitate the thunders and power of Jupiter. The ſtatues of all great men were removed, as if Rome would ſooner forget her virtues in their abſence; and the emperor appeared in public places in the moſt indecent manner, encouraged roguery, committed inceſt with his three ſiſters, and eſtabliſhed public places of proſtitution. He often amuſed himſelf with putting innocent people to death; he attempted to famiſh Rome, by a monopoly of corn; and as he was pleaſed with the greateſt diſaſters which befell his ſubjects, he often wiſhed the Romans had but one head, that he he might have the gratification to ſtrike it off. Wild beaſts were conſtantly fed in his palace with human victims, and a favorite horſe was made high-prieſt and conſul, and kept in marble apartments, and adorned with the moſt valuable trappings and pearls the Roman empire could furniſh. Caligula built a bridge upwards of three miles in the ſea; and would perhaps have ſhown himſelf more tyrannical, had not Chæreas, one of his ſervants, formed a conſpiracy againſt his life, with others equally tired with the cruelties and the inſults that were offered with impunity to the perſons and feelings of the Romans. In conſequence of this, the tyrant was murdered January 24th, in his 29th year, after a reign of three years and ten months, A. D. 41. It has been ſaid, that Caligula wrote a treatiſe on rhetoric; but his love of learning is better underſtood from his attempts to deſtroy the writings of Homer and of Virgil. Dio.—Sueton in vitâ.—Tacit. Ann.

CALYMNE, an iſland near Lebynthos. Ovid. Art. Am. 2, v. 81.

CALYNDA, a town of Caria. Ptol. 5, c. 3.

CALŸPSO, one of the Oceanides, or one of the daughters of Atlas, according to ſome, was goddeſs of ſilence, and reigned in the iſland of Ogygia, whoſe ſituation and even exiſtence is doubted. When Ulyſſes was ſhipwrecked on her coaſts, ſhe received him with great hoſpitality, and offered him immortality if he would remain with her as a huſband. The hero refuſed, and after ſeven years' delay, he was permitted to depart from the iſland by order of Mercury, the meſſenger of Jupiter. During his ſtay, Ulyſſes had two ſons by Calypſo, Nauſithous and Nauſinous. Calypſo was inconſolable at the departure of Ulyſſes. Homer. Od. 7 & 15.—Heſiod. Theog. v. 360.—Ovid de Pon. 4, ep. 18. Amor. 2, el. 17.—Propert. 1, el. 15.

CAMANTIUM, a town of Aſia Minor.

CAMARĪNA, a town of Italy.—A lake of Sicily, with a town of the ſame name, built B. C. 552. It was deſtroyed by the Syracuſans, and rebuilt by a certain Hipponous. The lake was drained contrary to the advice of Apollo, as the antients ſuppoſed, and a peſtilence was the conſequence; but the lowneſs of the lake below the level of the ſea prevents its being drained. The words Camarinam movere are become proverbial to expreſs an unſucceſsful and dangerous attempt. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 701. Strab. 6.—Herodot. 7, c. 154.

CAMBAULES, a general of ſome Gauls who invaded Greece. Pauſ. 10, c. 19.

CAMBES, a prince of Lydia, of ſuch voracious appetite that he ate his own wife, &c. Ælian. 1, V. H. c. 27.

CAMBUNII, mountains of Macedonia. Liv. 42, c. 53.

CAMBŸSES, king of Perſia, was ſon of Cyrus the Great. He conquered Egypt, and was ſo offended at the ſuperſtition of the Egyptians, that he killed their god Apis, and plundered their temples. When he wiſhed to take Peluſium, he placed at the head of his army, a number of cats and dogs; dogs; and the Egyptians refuſing, in an attempt to defend themſelves, to kill animals which they reverenced as divinities, became an eaſy prey to the enemy. Cambyſes afterwards ſent an army of 50,000 men to deſtroy Jupiter Ammon's temple, and reſolved to attack the Carthaginians and Æthiopians. He killed his brother Smerdis from mere ſuſpicion, and flead alive a partial judge, whoſe ſkin he nailed on the judgment ſeat, and appointed his ſon to ſucceed him, telling him to remember where he ſat. He died of a ſmall wound he had given himſelf with his ſword as he mounted on horſeback; and the Egyptians obſerved, that it was the ſame place on which he had wounded their god Apis, and that therefore he was viſited by the hand of the gods. His death happened 521 years before Chriſt. He left no iſſue to ſucceed him, and his throne was uſurped by the magi, and aſcended by Darius ſoon after. Herodot. 2, 3, &c. —Juſtin. 1, c. 9.——Val. Max. 6, c. 3. ——A Perſian of obſcure origin, to whom king Aſtyages gave his daughter Mandane in marriage. The king, who had been terrified by dreams which threatened the loſs of his crown by the hand of his daughter's ſon, had taken this ſtep in hopes that the children of ſo ignoble a bed would ever remain in obſcurity. He was diſappointed. Cyrus, Mandane's ſon, dethroned him when grown to manhood. Herodot. 1, c. 46, 107, &c. —Juſtin. 1, c. 4.——A river of Aſia, which flows from mount Caucaſus into the Cyrus. Mela. 3, c. 5.

Camertes, a friend of Turnus, killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 562.—Vid. Camerinum.

Camilla, queen of the Volſci, was daughter of Metabus and Caſmilla. She was educated in the woods, inured to the labors of hunting, and fed upon the milk of mares. Her father devoted her, when young, to the ſervice of Diana. When ſhe was declared queen, ſhe marched to aſſiſt Turnus againſt Æneas, where ſhe ſignalized herſelf by the numbers that periſhed by her hand. She was ſo ſwift that ſhe could run, or rather fly over a field of corn without bending the blades, and make her way over the ſea without wetting her feet. She died by a wound ſhe received from Aruns. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 803, l. 11, v. 435.

Camilli & Camillæ, the prieſts inſtituted by Romulus for the ſervice of the gods.

Camillus, (L. Furius) a celebrated Roman, called a ſecond Romulus, from his ſervices to his country. He was baniſhed by the people for diſtributing, contrary to his vow, the ſpoils he had obtained at Veii. During his exile, Rome was beſieged by the Gauls under Brennus. In the midſt of their misfortunes, the beſieged Romans elected him dictator, and he forgot their ingratitude, and marched to the relief of his country, which he delivered, after it had been for ſome time in the poſſeſſion of the enemy. He died in the 80th year of his age, B. C. 365, after he had been five times dictator, once cenſor, three times interrex, twice a military tribune, and obtained four triumphs. He conquered the Hernici, Volſci, Latini, & Etrurians, and diſſuaded his countrymen from their intentions of leaving Rome to reſide at Veii. When he beſieged Faliſci, he rejected with proper indignation, the offers of a ſchoolmaſter, who had betrayed into his hands the ſons of the moſt worthy citizens. Plut in Vitâ.—Liv. 5.—Flor. 1, c, 13.—Diod. 14.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 825. ——A name of Mercury.——An intimate friend of Cicero.

Camīro & Clytia, two daughters of Pandarus of Crete. When their parents were dead, they were left to the care of Venus; who, with the other goddeſſes, brought them up with tenderneſs, and aſked Jupiter to grant them kind huſbands. Jupiter, to puniſh upon them the crime of their father, who was acceſſary to the impiety of Tantalus, ordered the harpies to carry them away and deliver them to the furies. Pauſ. 10. c. 30.—Homer. Od. 20, v. 66.

Camīrus & Camīra, a town of Rhodes, which received its name from Camirus, a ſon of Hercules and Jole. Homer. Il. 2, v. 163.

Camissares, a governor of part of Cilicia, father to Datames. C. Nep. in Dat.

Camma, a woman of Galatia, who avenged the death of her huſband Sinetus upon his murderer Sinorix, by making him drink in a cup, of which the liquor was poiſoned, on pretence of marrying him, according to the cuſtoms of their country, which which required that the bridegroom and his bride ſhould drink out of the ſame veſſel. She eſcaped by refuſing to drink on pretence of illneſs. Polyæn. 8.

CAMŒNÆ, a name given to the muſes, from the ſweetneſs and melody of their ſongs a cantu amœno, or, according to Varro, from carmen. Varro de L. L. 5, c. 7.

CAMPĀNA LEX, or Julian agrarian law, was enacted by J. Cæſar, A. U. C. 691, to divide ſome lands among the people.

CAMPĀNIA, a country of Italy, of which Capua was the capital, bounded by Latium, Samnium, Picenum, and part of the Mediterranean Sea. It is celebrated for its delightful views, and for its fertility. Capua is often called Campana urbs. Strab. 5.—Cic. de leg. Ag. c. 35.—Juſtin. 20, c. 1, l. 22, c. 1.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—Mela. 2, c. 4.—Flor. 1, c. 16.

CAMPSA, a town near Pallene. Herodot. 7, c. 123.

CAMPUS MARTIUS, a large plain at Rome, without the walls of the city, where the Roman youths performed their exerciſes, and learnt to wreſtle and box, to throw the diſcus, hurl the javelin, ride a horſe, drive a chariot, &c. The public aſſemblies were held there, and the officers of ſtate choſen, and audience given to foreign ambaſſadors. It was adorned with ſtatues, columns, arches, and porticoes, and its pleaſant ſituation made it very frequented. It was called Martius, becauſe dedicated to Mars. It was ſometimes called Tiberinus, from its cloſeneſs to the Tiber. It was given to the Roman people by a veſtal virgin; but they were deprived of it by Tarquin the Proud, who made it a private field, and ſowed corn in it. When Tarquin was driven from Rome, the people recovered it, and threw away into the Tiber, the corn which had grown there, deeming it unlawful for any man to eat of the produce of that land. The ſheaves which were thrown into the river ſtopped in a ſhallow ford, and by the accumulated collection of mud became firm ground, and formed an iſland, which was called the Holy Iſland, or the iſland of Æſculapius. Dead carcaſes were generally burnt in the Campus Martius. Strab. 5.—Liv. 2, c. 5, l. 6, c. 20.

It was begun by Servius Tullius, finiſhed by Tarquin Superbus, and conſecrated by the conſul Horatius after the expulſion of the Tarquins from Rome. It was built upon four acres of ground; the front was adorned with three rows of pillars, and the other ſides with two. The aſcent to it from the ground, was by an hundred ſteps. The magnificence and richneſs of this temple are almoſt incredible. All the conſuls ſucceſſively made donations to the capitol, and Auguſtus beſtowed upon it at one time 2,000 pounds weight of gold. Its threſholds were made of braſs, and its roof was gold. It was adorned with veſſels and ſhields of ſolid ſilver, with golden chariots, &c. It was burnt during the civil wars of Marius, and Sylla rebuilt it, but died before the dedication, which was performed by Q. Catulus. It was again deſtroyed in the troubles under Vitellius; and Veſpaſian, who endeavoured to repair it, ſaw it again in ruins at his death. Domitian raiſed it again, for the laſt time, and made it more grand and magnificent than any of his predeceſſors, and ſpent 12,000 talents in gilding it.—When they firſt dug for the foundations, they found a man's head called Tolius, found and entire in the ground, and from thence drew an omen of the future greatneſs of the Roman empire. The hill was from that circumſtance called Capitolium, a capite Toli. The conſuls and magiſtrates offered ſacrifices there, when they firſt entered upon their offices, and the proceſſion in triumphs was always conducted to the capitol. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 136, l. 8, v. 347.—Tacit. 3. Hiſt. c. 72.—Plut. in Poplic.—Liv. 1, 10, &c.—Plin. 33, &c.—Sueton. in Aug. c. 30.

CAPPĂDŎCIA, a country of Aſia Minor, between the Halys, the Euphrates, and the Euxine. It receives its name from the river Cappadox, which ſeparates it from Galatia. The inhabitants were called Syrians and Leuco-Syrians by the Greeks. They were of a dull and ſubmiſſive diſpoſition, and addicted to every vice, according to the ancients, who wrote this virulent epigram againſt them:

Vipera Cappadocem nocitura momordit; at illa
Guſtato periit ſanguine Cappadocis.

When they were offered their freedom and independence by the Romans, they refuſed it, and begged of them a king, and they received Ariobarzanes. It was ſome time after governed by a Roman proconſul. Though the ancients have ridiculed this country for the unfruitfulneſs of its ſoil and the manners of its inhabitants, yet it can boaſt of the birth of the geographer Strabo, among other illuſtrious characters.

The

The horſes of this country were in general eſteem, and with theſe they paid their tributes to the king of Perſia, while under his power, for want of money.—The kings of Cappadocia moſtly bore the name of Ariarathes. Horat. 1, ep. 6, v. 39.—Plin. 6, c. 3.—Curt. 3 & 4.—Strab. 11 & 16.—Herodot. 1, c. 73, l. 5, c. 49.—Mela. 1. c. 2, l. 3, c. 8.

CARNEĂDES, a philoſopher of Cyrene in Africa, founder of a ſect called the third or new academy. The Athenians ſent him with Diogenes the ſtoic and Critolaus the peripatetic, as ambaſſador to Rome, B. C. 155. TheRoman youth were extremely fond of the company of theſe learned philoſophers; and when Carneades, in a ſpeech, had given an accurate and judicious diſſertation upon juſtice, and in another ſpeech confuted all the arguments he had advanced, and apparently given no exiſtence to the virtue he had ſo much commended; a report prevailed all over Rome, that a Grecian was come, who had ſo captivated by his words the riſing generation, that they forgot their uſual amuſements, and ran mad after philoſophy. When this reached the ears of Cato the cenſor, he gave immediate audience to the Athenian ambaſſadors in the ſenate, and diſmiſſed them in haſte, expreſſing his apprehenſion of their corrupting the opinions of the Roman people, whoſe only profeſſion, he ſternly obſerved, was arms and war. Carneades denied that any thing could be perceived or underſtood in the world, and he was the firſt who introduced an univerſal ſuſpenſion of aſſent. He died in the 90th year of his age, B. C. 128. Cic. ad Attic. 12 ep. 23. de Orat. 1 & 2.—Plin. 7, c. 30.—Lactantius 5, c. 14.—Val. Max. 8, c. 8.

CARTHĀGĬNIENSES, the inhabitants of Carthage, a rich and commercial nation. Vid. Carthago.

CARTHĀGO, a celebrated city of Africa, the rival of Rome, and long the capital of the country, and miſtreſs of Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia. The preciſe time of its foundation is unknown, yet writers ſeem to agree that it was firſt built by Dido, about 869 years before the Chriſtian era, or, according to others 72, or 93 years before the foundation of Rome. This city and republic floriſhed for 737 years, and the time of its greateſt glory was under Annibal and Amilcar. During the firſt Punic war, it contained no leſs than 700,000 inhabitants. It maintained three famous wars againſt Rome, called the Punic wars, [Vid. Punicum Bellum.] in the 3d of which Carthage was totally deſtroyed by Scipio the ſecond Africanus, B. C. 147, and only 5000 perſons were found within the walls. It was 23 miles in circumference; and when it was ſet on fire by the Romans, it burned inceſſantly during 17 days. After the deſtruction of Carthage, Utica became powerful, and the Romans thought themſelves ſecure; and as they had no rival to diſpute with them in the field, they fell into indolence and inactivity. Cæfar planted a ſmall colony on the ruins of Carthage. Auguſtus ſent there 3000 men; and Adrian, after the example of his imperial predeceſſors, rebuilt part of it, which he called Adrianopolis. Carthage was conquered from the Romans by the arms of Genſeric, A. D. 439; and it was for more than a century the ſeat of the Vandal empire in Africa, and fell into the hands of the Saracens in the 7th century. The Carthaginians were governed as a republic, and had two perſons yearly choſen among them with regal authority. They were very ſuperſtitious, and generally offered human victims to their gods; an unnatural cuſtom, which their allies wiſhed them to aboliſh, but in vain. They bore the character of a faithleſs and treacherous people, and the proverb Punica fides is well known. Strab. 17.—Virg. Æn. 1, &c.—Mela. 1, &c.—Ptol. 4.—Juſtin.—Liv. 4, &c.—Patere. 1 & 2.—Plut. in Annib. &c. —Cic.——Nŏva, a town built in Spain, on the coaſts of the Mediterranean, by Aſdrubal the Carthaginian general. Caspium mare, or Hyrcānum, a large sea in the form of a lake, which has no communication with other seas, and lies between the Caspian and Hyrcanian mountains, at the north of Parthia, receiving in its capacious bed the tribute of several large rivers. Ancient authors assure us, that it produced enormous serpents and fishes, different in color and kind from those of all other waters. The eastern parts are more particularly called the Hyrcanian sea, and the western the Caspian. It is now called the sea of Sala or Baku. The Caspian is about 680 miles long, and in no part more than 260 in breadth. There are no tides in it, and on account of its numerous shoals it is navigable to vessels drawing only nine or ten feet water. It has strong currents, and, like inland seas, is liable to violent storms. Some navigators examined it in 1708, by order of the Czar Peter, and after the labor of three years, a map of its extent was published. Its waters are described as brackish, and not impregnated with salt so much as the wide ocean. Herodot. 1, c. 202, &c.—Curt. 3, c. 2. l. 6, c. 4. l. 7, c. 3.—Strab. 11.—Mela. 1, c. 2. l. 3, c. 5 & 6.—Plin. 6, c. 13.—*Dionys. Cassandāne, the mother of Cambyses by Cyrus. Herodot. 2, c. 1. l. 3, c. 2.

Cassander, son of Antipater, made himself master of Macedonia after his father's death, where he reigned for 18 years. He married Thessalonica, the sister of Alexander, to strengthen himself on his throne. Olympias, the mother of Alexander, wished to keep the kingdom of Macedonia for Alexander's young children; and therefore she destroyed the relations of Cassander, who besieged her in the town of Pydna, and put her to death. Roxane, with her son Alexander, and Barsena the mother of Hercules, both wives of Alexander, shared the fate of Olympias with their children. Antigonus, who had been for some time upon friendly terms with Cassander, declared war against him; and Cassander, to make himself equal with his adversary, made a league with Lysimachus and Seleucus, and obtained a memorable victory at Ipsus, B. C. 301. He died three years after this victory, of a dropsy. His son Antipater killed his mother; and for this unnatural murder, he was put to death by his brother Alexander, who, to strengthen himself, invited Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, from Asia. Demetrius took advantage of the invitation, and put to death Alexander, and ascended the throne of Macedonia. Paus. 1, c. 25.—Diod. 19.—Justin. 12, 13, &c.

Cassandra, daughter of Priam and Hecuba, was passionately loved by Apollo, who promised to grant her whatever she might require, if she would gratify his passion. She asked the power of knowing futurity; and as soon as she had received it, she refused to perform her promise, and slighted Apollo. The god, in his disappointment, wetted her lips with his tongue, and by this action effected that no credit or reliance should ever be put upon her predictions, however true or faithful they might be. Some maintain that she received the gift of prophecy with her brother Helenus, by being placed when young one night in the temple of Apollo, where serpents were found wreathed round their bodies, and licking their ears, which circumstance gave them the knowledge of futurity. She was looked upon by the Trojans as insane, and she was even confined, and her predictions were disregarded. She was courted by many princes during the Trojan war. When Troy was taken, she fled for shelter to the temple of Minerva, where Ajax found her, and offered her violence, with the greatest cruelty, at the foot of Minerva's statue. In the division of the spoils of Troy, Agamemnon, who was enamoured of her, took her as his wife, and returned with her to Greece. She repeatedly foretold to him the sudden calamities that awaited his return; but he gave no credit to her, and was assassinated by his wife Clytemnestra. Cassandra shared his fate, and saw all her prophecies but too truly fulfilled. [Vid. Agamemnon.] Æschyl. in Agam.—Homer. Il. 13, v. 363. Od. 4.—Hygin. fab. 117.—*Virg. Cassiŏpe & Cassiŏpēa, married Cepheus, king of Æthiopia, by whom she had Andromeda. She boasted herself to be fairer than the Nereides; upon which Neptune, at the request of these despised nymphs, punished the insolence of Cassiope, and sent a huge sea monster to ravage Æthiopia. The wrath of Neptune could be appeased only by exposing Andromeda, whom Cassiope tenderly loved, to the fury of a sea monster; and just as she was going to be devoured, Perseus delivered her. [*Vid. C. Cassius, a celebrated Roman, who made himself known by being first quæstor to Crassus in his expedition against Parthia, from which he extricated himself with uncommon address. He followed the interest of Pompey; and when Cæsar had obtained the victory in the plains of Pharsalia, Cassius was one of those who owed their life to the mercy of the conqueror. He married Junia the sister of Brutus, and with him he resolved to murder the man to whom he was indebted for his life, on account of his oppressive ambition; and before he stabbed Cæsar, he addressed himself to the statue of Pompey, who had fallen by the avarice of him he was going to assassinate. When the provinces were divided among Cæsar's murderers, Cassius received Africa; and when his party had lost ground at Rome, by the superior influence of Augustus and M. Antony, he retired to Philippi, with his friend Brutus and their adherents. In the battle that was fought there the wing which Cassius commanded was defeated, and his camp was plundered. In this unsuccessful moment he suddenly gave up all hopes of recovering his losses, and concluded that Brutus was conquered and ruined as well as himself. Fearful to fall into the enemy's hands, he ordered one of his freed-men to run him through, and he perished by that very sword which had given wounds to Cæsar. His body was honored with a magnificent funeral by his friend Brutus, who declared over him that he deserved to be called the last of the Romans. If he was brave, he was equally learned. Some of his letters are still extant among Cicero's epistles. He was a strict follower of the doctrine of Epicurus. He was often too rash and too violent, and many of the wrong steps which Brutus took are to be ascribed to the prevailing advice of Cassius. He is allowed by Paterculus to have been a better commander than Brutus, though a less sincere friend. The day after Cæsar's murder he dined at the house of Antony, who asked him whether he had then a dagger concealed in his bosom; yes, replied he, if you aspire to tyranny. Suet. in Cæs. & Aug.—Plut. in Brut. & Cæs.—Paterc. 2, c. 46.—Dio. 40.——A Roman citizen, who condemned his son to death, on pretence of his raising commotions in the state. *Val. Castor & Pollux, were twin brothers, ſons of Jupiter, by Leda, the wife of Tyndarus, king of Sparta. The manner of their birth is uncommon. Jupiter, who was enamoured of Leda, changed himſelf into a beautiful ſwan, and deſired Venus to metamorphoſe herſelf into an eagle. After this transformation the goddeſs purſued the god with apparent ferocity, and Jupiter fled for refuge into the arms of Leda, who was bathing in the Eurotas. Jupiter took advantage of his ſituation, and nine months after, Leda, who was already pregnant, brought forth two eggs, from one of which came Pollux and Helena; and from the other, Caſtor and Clytemneſtra. The two former were the offſpring of Jupiter, and the latter were believed to be the children of Tyndarus. Some ſuppoſe that Leda brought forth only one egg, from which Caſtor and Pollux ſprung. Mercury, immediately after their birth, carried the two brothers to Pallena, where they were educated; and as ſoon as they had arrived to years of maturity, they embarked with Jaſon to go in queſt of the golden fleece. In this expedition both behaved with ſuperior courage: Pollux conquered and ſlew Amycus, in the combat of the ceſtus, and was ever after reckoned the god and patron of boxing and wreſtling. Caſtor diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the management of horſes. The brothers cleared the Helleſpont, and the neighbouring ſeas, from pirates, after their return from Colchis, from which circumſtance they have been always deemed the friends of navigation. During the Argonautic expedition, in a violent ſtorm, two flames of fire were ſeen to play around the heads of the ſons of Leda, and immediately the tempeſt ceaſed, and the ſea was calmed. From this occurrence their power to protect ſailors has been more firmly credited, and the two mentioned fires, which are very common in ſtorms, have ſince been known by the name of Caſtor and Pollux; and when they both appeared, it was a ſign of fair weather; but if only one was ſeen, it prognoſticated ſtorms, and the aid of Caſtor and Pollux was conſequently ſolicited. Caſtor and Pollux made war againſt the Athenians to recover their ſiſter Helen, whom Theſeus had carried away; and from their clemency to the conquered, they acquired the ſirname of Anaces, or benefactors. They were initiated in the ſacred myſteries of the Cabiri, and in thoſe of Ceres of Eleuſis. They were invited to a feaſt when Lynceus and Idas were going to celebrate their marriage with Phœbe and Talaira, the daughters of Leucippus, who was brother to Tyndarus. Their behaviour after this invitation was cruel. They became enamoured of the two women whoſe nuptials they were to celebrate, and reſolved to carry them away and marry them. This violent ſtep provoked Lynceus and Idas: a battle enſued, and Caſtor killed Lynceus, and was killed by Idas. Pollux revenged the death of his brother, by killing Idas; and as he was immortal, and tenderly attached to his brother, he entreated Jupiter to reſtore him to life, or to be deprived himſelf of immortality. Jupiter permitted Caſtor to ſhare the immortality of his brother; and conſequently, as long as the one was upon earth, ſo long was the other detained in the infernal regions, and they alternately lived and died every day; or, according to others, every ſix months. This act of fraternal love Jupiter rewarded by making the two brothers conſtellations in heaven, under the name of Gemini, which never appears together, but when one riſes the other ſets, and ſo on alternately. Caſtor made Talaira mother of Anogon, and Phœbe had Mneſileus by Pollux. They received divine honors after death, and were generally called Dioſcuri, ſons of Jupiter. White lambs were more particularly offered on their altars, and the ancients were fond of ſwearing by the divinity of the Dioſcuri, by the expreſſions of Ædepol and Ædaſtor. Among the Romans there prevailed many public reports, at different times, that Caſtor and Pollux had made their appearance to the Roman armies; and, mounted on white ſteeds, had marched at the head of their troops, and furiouſly attacked the enemy.

my. Their ſirnames were many, and they were generally repreſented mounted on two white horſes, armed with ſpears, and riding ſide by ſide, with their head covered with a bonnet, on whoſe top glittered a ſtar. *Ovid. L. Sergius Cătĭlīna, a celebrated Roman, deſcended of a noble family. When he had ſquandered away his fortune by his debaucheries and extravagance, and been refuſed the conſulſhip, he ſecretly meditated the ruin of his country, and conſpired with many of the moſt illuſtrious of the Romans, as diſſolute as himſelf, to extirpate the ſenate, plunder the treaſury, and ſet Rome on fire. This conſpiracy was timely diſcovered by the conſul Cicero, whom he had reſolved to murder; and Catiline, after he had declared his intentions in the full ſenate, and attempted to vindicate himſelf, on ſeeing five of his accomplices arreſted, retired to Gaul, where his partizans were aſſembling an army; while Cicero at Rome puniſhed the condemned conſpirators. Petreius, the other conſul's lieutenant, attacked Catiline's ill diſciplined troops, and routed them. Catiline was killed in the engagement, bravely fighting, about the middle of December, B. C. 63. His character has been deſervedly branded with the foulеſt infamy; and to the violence he offered to a veſtal, he added the more atrocious murder of his own brother, for which he would have ſuffered death, had not friends and bribes prevailed over juſtice. It has been reported that Catiline and the other conſpirators drank human blood, to make their oaths more firm and inviolable. Salluſt has written an account of the conſpiracy. Cic. in Catil.—*Virg. CATĪNA, a town of Sicily, called alſo Catana. [Vid. Catana.]——Another of Arcadia.

M. CATIUS, an epicurean philoſopher of Inſubria, who wrote a treatiſe in four books, on the nature of things, and the ſummum bonum, and an account of the doctrine and tenets of Epicurus. But as he was not a ſound or faithful follower of the Epicurean philoſophy, he has been ridiculed by Horat. 2, Sat. 4.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.——Veſtinus a military tribune in M. Antony's army. Cic. div. 10, c. 23.

CATIZI, a people of the Pygmæans, ſuppoſed to have been driven from their country by cranes. Plin. 4, c. 11.

CATO, a ſirname of the Porcian family, rendered illuſtrious by M. Porcius Cato, a celebrated Roman, afterwards called Cenſorius, from his having exerciſed the office of cenſor. He roſe to all the honors of the ſtate, and the firſt battle he ever ſaw was againſt Annibal, at the age of ſeventeen, where he behaved with uncommon valor. In his quæſtorſhip, under Africanus againſt Carthage, and in his expedition in Spain, againſt the Celtiberians, and in Greece, he diſplayed equal proofs of his courage and prudence. He was remarkable for his love of temperance; he never drank but water, and was always ſatisfied with whatever meats were laid upon his table by his ſervants, whom he never reproved with an angry word. During his cenſorſhip, which he obtained, though he had made many declarations of his future ſeverity if ever in office, he behaved with the greateſt rigor and impartiality, ſhewed himſelf an enemy to all luxury and diſſipation, and even accuſed his colleague of embezzling the public money. He is famous for the great oppoſition which he made againſt the introduction of the finer arts of Greece into Italy, and his treatment of Carneades is well known. This prejudice aroſe from an apprehenſion that the learning and luxury of Athens would deſtroy the valor and ſimplicity of the Roman people; and he often obſerved to his ſon, that the Romans would be certainly ruined whenever they began to be infected with Greek. It appears, however, that he changed his opinion, and made himſelf remarkable for the knowledge of Greek, which he acquired in his old age. He himſelf educated his ſon, and inſtructed him in writing and grammar. He taught him dexterouſly to throw the javelin, and inured him to the labors of the field, and to bear cold and heat with the ſame indifference, and to ſwim acroſs the moſt rapid rivers with eaſe and boldneſs. He was univerſally deemed ſo ſtrict in his morals, that Virgil makes him one of the judges of hell. He repented only of three things during his life; to have gone by ſea when he could go by land, to have paſſed a day inactive, and to have told a ſecret to his wife. A ſtatue was raiſed to his memory, and he diſtinguiſhed himſelf as much for his knowledge of agriculture as his political life. In Cicero's age there were 150 orations of his, beſides letters, and a celebrated work called Origines, of which the firſt book gave an hiſtory of the Roman monarchy; the ſecond and third an account of the neighbouring cities of Italy; the fourth a detail of the firſt, and the fifth of the ſecond Punic war; and in the others the Roman hiſtory was brought down to the war of the Luſitanians, carried on by Ser. Galba. Some fragments of the Origines remain, ſuppoſed by ſome to be ſuppoſititious. Cato's treatiſe, De re ruſticâ, was edited by Auſon. Pompna, 8vo. Ant. Plant. 1590; but the beſt editon of Cato, &c. ſeems to be Geſner's, 2 vols. 4to. Lipſ. 1735. Cato died in an extreme old age, about 150 B. C.; and Cicero, to ſhew his reſpect for him, has introduced him in his treatiſe on old age, as the principal character. Plin. 7, c. 14. Plutarch & C. Nepos have written an account of his life. Cic. Acad. & de Senect. &c.——Marcus, the ſon of the cenſor, married the daughter of P. Æmylius. He loſt his ſword in a battle, and though wounded and tired, he went to his friends, and, with their aſſiſtance, renewed the battle, and recovered his ſword. Plut. in Cat.——A courageous Roman, grandfather to Cato the cenſor. He had five horſes killed under him in battles. Plut. in Cat.——Valerius, a grammarian in the time of Sylla, who inſtructed at Rome many noble pupils, and wrote ſome poems. Ovid. 2, Triſt. 1, v. 436.——Marcus, ſirnamed Uticenſis, from his death at Utica, was great grandſon to the cenſor of the ſame name. The early virtues that appeared in his childhood, ſeemed to promiſe a great man; and at the age of fourteen, he earneſtly aſked his preceptor for a ſword, to ſtab the tyrant Sylla. He was auſtere in his morals, and a ſtrict follower of the tenets of the Stoics: he was careleſs of his dreſs, often appeared barefooted in public, and never travelled but on foot. He was ſuch a lover of diſcipline, that in whatever office he was employed, he always reformed its its abuſes, and reſtored the ancient regulations. When he was ſet over the troops, in the capacity of a commander, his removal was univerſally lamented, and deemed almoſt a public loſs by his affectionate ſoldiers. His fondneſs for candor was ſo great, that the veracity of Cato became proverbial. In his viſits to his friends, he wiſhed to give as little moleſtation as poſſible; and the importuning civilities of king Dejotarus ſo diſpleaſed him, when he was at his court, that he haſtened away from his preſence. He was very jealous of the ſafety and liberty of the republic, and watched carefully over the conduct of Pompey, whoſe power and influence were great. He often expreſſed his diſlike to ſerve the office of a tribune; but when he ſaw a man of corrupted principles apply for it, he offered himſelf a candidate to oppoſe him, and obtained the tribuneſhip. In the conſpiracy of Catiline, he ſupported Cicero, and was the chief cauſe that the conſpirators were capitally puniſhed. When the provinces of Gaul were decreed for five years to Cæſar, Cato obſerved to the ſenators, that they had introduced a tyrant into the capitol. He was ſent to Cyprus againſt Ptolemy, who had rebelled, by his enemies, who hoped that the difficulty of the expedition would injure his reputation. But his prudence extricated him from every danger. Ptolemy ſubmitted, and after a ſucceſsful campaign, Cato was received at Rome with the moſt diſtinguiſhing honors, which he, however, modeſtly declined. When the firſt triumvirate was formed between Cæſar, Pompey, and Craſſus, Cato oppoſed them with all his might, and with an independent ſpirit foretold to the Roman people all the misfortunes which ſoon after followed. After repeated applications he was made pretor, but he ſeemed rather to diſgrace than ſupport the dignity of that office, by the meanneſs of his dreſs. He applied for the conſulſhip, but could never obtain it. When Cæſar had paſſed the Rubicon, Cato adviſed the Roman ſenate to deliver the care of the republic into the hands of Pompey; and when his advice had been complied with, he followed him with his ſon to Dyrrachium, where, after a ſmall victory there, he was entruſted with the care of the ammunitions, and of 15 cohorts. After the battle of Pharſalia, Cato took the command of the Corcyrean fleet; and when he heard of Pompey's death, on the coaſt of Africa, he traverſed the deſerts of Libya, to join himſelf to Scipio. He refuſed to take the command of the army in Africa, a circumſtance of which he afterwards repented. When Scipio had been defeated, partly for not paying regard to Cato's advice, Cato fortified himſelf in Utica, but, however, not with the intentions of ſupporting a ſiege. When Cæſar approached near the city, Cato diſdained to fly, and rather than fall alive into the conqueror's hands, he ſtabbed himſelf, after he had read Plato's treatiſe on the immortality of the ſoul, B. C. 46, in the 59th year of his age. He had firſt married Attilia, a woman whoſe licentious conduct obliged him to divorce her. Afterwards he united himſelf to Martia, daughter of Philip. Hortenſius, his friend, wiſhed to raiſe children by Martia, and therefore obtained her from Cato. After the death of Hortenſius, Cato took her again. This conduct was ridiculed by the Romans, who obſerved that Martia had entered the houſe of Hortenſius very poor, but returned to the bed of Cato loaded with treaſures. It was obſerved that Cato always appeared in mourning, and never laid himſelf down at his meals ſince the defeat of Pompey, but always ſat down, contrary to the cuſtom of the Romans, as if depreſſed with the recollection that the ſupporters of republican liberty were decaying. Plutarch has written an account of his life. Lucan. 1, v. 128, &c.—Val. Max. 2, c. 10.—Horat. 3, od. 21.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 841. l. 8, v. 670.

CATULLUS, C. or Q. VALERIUS, a poet of Verona, whoſe compoſitions, elegant and ſimple, are the offspring of a luxuriant imagination. He was acquainted with the moſt diſtinguiſhed people of his age, and directed his ſatyr againſt Cæſar, whoſe only revenge was to invite the poet to a good ſupper. Catullus was the firſt Roman who imitated with ſucceſs the Greek writers, and introduced their numbers among the Latins. Though the pages of the poet are occaſionally diſfigured with licentious expreſſions, the whole is written with great purity of ſtile. Catullus died in the 46th year of his age, B. C. 40. The beſt editions of his works, which conſiſt only of epigrams, are that of Vulpius, 4to. Patavii, 1737, and that of Barbou, 12mo. Paris 1754

CAUCĂSUS, a celebrated mountain between the Euxine and Caſpian ſeas, which may be conſidered as the continuation of the ridge of mount Taurus. Its height is immenſe. It was inhabited anciently by various ſavage nations who lived upon the wild fruits of the earth. It was covered with ſnow in ſome parts, and in others it was variegated with fruitful orchards and plantations. The inhabitants formerly were ſuppoſed to gather gold on the ſhores of their rivulets in ſheep ſkins, but now they live without making uſe of money. Prometheus was tied on the top of Caucaſus by Jupiter, and continually devoured by vultures, according to ancient authors. The paſſes near this mountain, called Caucaſiæ portæ, bear now the name of Derbent, and it is ſuppoſed that through them the Sarmatians called Huns, made their way, when they invaded the provinces of Rome. Plin. 6, c. 11.—Strab. 11.—Herodot. 4, c. 203, &c.—*Virg. Cecrops, a native of Sais in Egypt, who led a colony to Attica about 1556 years before the chriſtian era, and reigned over part of the country which was called from him Cecropia. He ſoftened and poliſhed the rude and uncultivated manners of the inhabitants, and drew them from the country to inhabit 12 ſmall villages which he had founded. He gave them laws and regulations, and introduced among them the worſhip of thoſe deities which were held in adoration in Egypt. He married the daughter of Actæus a Grecian prince, and was deemed the firſt founder of Athens. He taught his ſubjects to cultivate the olive, and inſtructed them to look upon Minerva as the watchful patroneſs of their city. It is ſaid that he was the firſt who raiſed an altar to Jupiter in Greece, and offered him ſacrifices. After a reign of 50 years, ſpent in regulating his newly formed kingdom, and in poliſhing the minds of his ſubjects, Cecrops died, leaving three daughters, Aglauros, Herſe, and Pandroſos. He was ſucceeded by Cranaus, a native of the country. Some time after, Theſeus, one of his ſucceſſors on the throne, formed the twelve villages which he had eſtabliſhed, into one city, to which the name of Athens was given. [Vid. Athenæ.] Some authors have deſcribed Cecrops as a monſter, half a man and half a ſerpent; and this fable is explained by the recollection that he was maſter of two languages, the Greek and Egyptian; or that he had the command over two countries, Egypt and Greece. Others explain it by an alluſion to the regulations which Cecrops made amongſt the inhabitants concerning marriage and the union of the two ſexes. Pauſ. 1, c. 5.—Strab. 9.—Juſtin 2, c. 6.—Herodot. 8, c. 44.—Apollod. 3, c. 14.—*Ovid. CENSORES, two magiſtrates of great authority at Rome, firſt created, B. C. 443. Their office was to number the people, eſtimate the poſſeſſions of every citizen, reform and watch over the manners of the people, and regulate the taxes. Their power was alſo extended over private families; they puniſhed irregularity, and inſpected the management and education of the Roman youth. They could inquire into the expences of every citizen, and even degrade a ſenator from all his privileges and honors, if guilty of any extravagance. This puniſhment was generally executed in paſſing over the offender's name in calling the liſt of the ſenators. The office of public cenſor was originally exerciſed by the kings. Servius Tullius, the ſixth king of Rome, firſt eſtabliſhed a cenſus, by which every man was obliged to come to be regiſtered, and give in writing the place of his reſidence, his name, his quality, the number of his children, of his tenants, eſtates, and domeſtics, &c. The ends of the cenſus were very ſalutary to the Roman republic. They knew their own ſtrength, their ability to ſupport a war, or to make a levy of troops, or raiſe a tribute. It was required that every knight ſhould be poſſeſſed of 400,000 ſeſterces, to enjoy the rights and privileges of his order; and a ſenator was entitled to ſit in the ſenate, if he was really worth 800,000 ſeſterces. This laborious taſk of numbering and reviewing the people, was, after the expulſion of the Tarquins, one of the duties and privileges of the conſuls. But when the republic was become more powerful, and when the number of its citizens was increaſed, the conſuls were found unable to make the cenſus, on account of the multiplicity of buſineſs. After it had been neglected for 16 years, two new magiſtrates called cenſors were elected. They remained in office for five years, and every fifth year they made a cenſus of all the citizens in the campus martius, and offered a ſolemn ſacrifice, and made a luſtration in the name of all the Roman people. This ſpace of time was called a luſtrum, and ten were commonly ex- After the pr. office of the time unaltered, their power, abridge office, and a law was m by Mamercus Æmilius, to of the cenſorſhip to 18 months. ſecond Punic war, they were always choſe from ſuch perſons as had been conſuls; their office was more honorable, though leſs powerful, than that of the conſuls; the badges of their office were the ſame, but the cenſors were not allowed to have lictors to walk before them as the conſuls. When one of the cenſors died, no one was elected in his room till the five years were expired, and his colleague immediately reſigned. This circumſtance originated from the death of a cenſor before the ſack of Rome by Brennus, and was ever after deemed an unfortunate event to the republic. The emperors aboliſhed the cenſors, and took upon themſelves to execute their office.

CENSORĪNUS, Ap. Cl. was compelled, after many ſervices to the ſtate, to aſſume the imperial purple by the ſoldiers, by whom he was murdered ſome days after, A. D. 270.——Martius, a conſul, to whom, as a particular friend, Horace addreſſed his 4 od. 8.——A grammarian of the third century, whoſe book, De die natali, is extant, beſt edited in 8vo, by Haverkamp, L. Bat. 1767. It treats of the birth of man, of years, months, and days.

CENTARETUS, a Galatian, who when Antiochus was killed, mounted his horſe in the the greateſt exultation. The horſe, as if conſcious of diſgrace, immediately leaped down a precipice, and killed himſelf and his rider. Plin. 8, c. 42.

CENTAURI, a people of Theſſaly, half men and half horſes. They were the offſpring of Centaurus, ſon of Apollo, by Stilbia, daughter of the Peneus According to ſome, the Centaurs were the fruit of Ixion's adventure with the cloud in the ſhape of Juno, or, as others aſſert, of the union of Centaurus with the mares of Magneſia. This fable of the exiſtence of the Centaurs, monſters ſupported upon the four legs of a horſe, ariſes from the ancient people of Theſſaly having tamed horſes, and having appeared to their neighbours mounted on horſeback, a ſight very uncommon at that time, and which, when at a diſtance, ſeems only one body, and conſequently one creature. Some derive the name απο του κεντειν ταυρους, goading bulls, becauſe they went on horſeback after their bulls which had ſtrayed, or becauſe they hunted wild bulls with horſes. Some of the ancients have maintained, that monſters like the Centaurs can have exiſted in the natural courſe of things. Plutarch in Sympoſ. mentions one ſeen by Periander tyrant of Corinth; and Pliny 7, c. 3, ſays, that he ſaw one embalmed in honey, which had been brought to Rome from Egypt in the reign of Claudius. The battle of the Centaurs with the Lapithæ is famous in hiſtory. Ovid has elegantly deſcribed it, and it has alſo employed the pen of Heſiod, Valerius Flaccus, &c. and Pauſanias in Eliac. ſays, it was repreſented in the temple of Jupiter at Olympia, and alſo at Athens by Phidias and Parrhaſius according to Pliny 36, c. 5. The origin of this battle was a quarrel at the marriage of Hippodamia with Pirithous, where the Centaurs, intoxicated with wine, behaved with rudeneſs, and even offered violence to the women that were preſent. Such an inſult irritated Hercules, Theſeus, and the reſt of the Lapithæ, who defended the women, wounded and defeated the Centaurs, and obliged them to leave their country, and retire to Arcadia. Here their inſolence was a ſecond time puniſhed by Hercules, who, when he was going to hunt the boar Erymanthus, was kindly entertained by the Centaur Pholus, who gave him wine which belonged to the reſt of the Centaurs, but had been given them on condition of their treating Hercules with it, whenever he paſſed through their territory. They reſented the liberty which Hercules took with their wine, and attacked him with uncommon fury. The hero defended himſelf with his arrows, and defeated his adverſaries, who fled for ſafety to the Centaur Chiron. Chiron had been the preceptor of Hercules, and therefore they hoped that he would deſiſt in his preſence. Hercules, though awed at the ſight of Chiron, did not deſiſt, but, in the midſt of the engagement, he wounded his preceptor in the knee, who, in the exceſſive pain he ſuffered, exchanged immortality for death. The death of Chiron irritated Hercules the more, and the Centaurs that were preſent, were all extirpated by his hand, and indeed few eſcaped the common deſtruction. The moſt celebrated of the Centaurs were Chiron, Eurytus, Amycus, Gryneus, Caumas, Lycidas, Arneus, Medon, Rhœtus, Piſenor, Mermeros, Pholus, &c. Diod. 4.—Heſiod. in Scut. Hercul.—*Homer. CENTUMVĬRI, the members of a court of juſtice at Rome. They were originally choſen, three from the 35 tribes of the people, and though 105 they were always called Centumvirs. They were afterwards encreaſed to the number of 180, and ſtill kept their original name. The pretor ſent to their tribunal cauſes of the greateſt importance, as their knowledge of the law was extenſive. They were generally ſummoned by the Decemviri, who ſeemed to be the chiefeſt among them; and they aſſembled in the Baſilica, or public court, and had their tribunal diſtinguiſhed by a ſpear with an iron head, whence a decree of their court was called Haſtæ judicium: their ſentences were very impartial, and without appeal. Cic. de orat. 1, c. 38.—Quintil. 4, 5, & 11.—Plin. 6, ep. 33.

CENTUM CELLUM, a ſea-port town of Etruria built by Trajan, who had there a villa. It is now Civita Vecchia, and belongs to the Pope. Plin. 6, ep. 31.

CENTŬRIA, a diviſion of the people among the Romans, conſiſting of a hundred. The Roman people were originally divided into three tribes, and each tribe into 10 Curiæ. Servius Tullius made a cenſus; and when he had the place of habitation, name, and profeſſion of every citizen, which amounted to 80,000 men, all able to bear arms; he divided them into ſix claſſes, and each claſs into ſeveral centuries or companies of a hundred men. The firſt claſs conſiſted of 80 centuries, 40 of which were compoſed of men from the age of 45 and upwards, appointed to guard the city. The 40 others were young men from 17 to 45 years of age, appointed to go to war, and fight the enemies of Rome. Their arms were all the ſame, that is, a buckler, a cuiraſs, a helmet, cuiſhes of braſs, with a ſword, a lance, and a javelin; and as they were of the moſt illuſtrious citizens, they were called by way of eminence, Claſſici, and their inferiors infra claſſem. They were to be worth 1,100,000 aſſes, a ſum equivalent to 1800 pounds Engliſh money. The ſecond, third, and fourth claſſes, conſiſted each of 20 centuries, ten of which were compoſed of the more aged, and the others of the younger ſort of people. Their arms were a large ſhield, a ſpear, and a javelin; they were to be worth in the ſecond claſs, 75,000 aſſes, or about 121l. In the third, 50,000, or about 80l.; and in the fourth, 25,000, or about 40l. The fifth claſs conſiſted of 30 centuries, three of which were carpenters by trade, and the others of different profeſſions, ſuch as were neceſſary in a camp. They were all armed with ſlings and ſtones. They were to be worth 11,000 aſſes, or about 18l. The ſixth claſs contained only one centuria, compriſing the whole body of the pooreſt citizens, who where called Proletarii, as their only ſervice to the ſtate was procreating children. They were alſo called capite cenſi, as the cenſor took notice of their perſon, not of their eſtate. In the public aſſemblies in the Campus Martius, at the election of public magiſtrates, or at the trial of capital crimes, the people gave their vote by centuries, whence the aſſembly was called comitia centuriata. In theſe public aſſemblies, which were never convened only by the conſuls at the permiſſion of the ſenate, or by the dictator, in the abſence of the conſuls, ſome of the people appeared under arms, for fear of an attack from ſome foreign enemy. When a law was propoſed in the public aſſemblies, its neceſſity was explained, and the advantages it would produce to the ſtate were enlarged upon in a harangue; after which it was expoſed in the moſt conſpicuous parts of the city three market days, that the people might ſee and conſider. Expoſing it to public view, was called proponere legem, and explaining it promulgare legem. He who merely propoſed it, was called lator legis; and he who dwelt upon its importance and utility, and wiſhed it to be enforced, was called auctor legis. When the aſſembly was to be held, the auguries were conſulted by the conſul, who, after haranguing the people, and reminding them to have in view the good of the republic, diſmiſſed them to their reſpective centuries, that their votes might be gathered. They gave their votes vivâ voce, till the year of Rome A. U. C. 615, when they changed the cuſtom, and gave their approbation or diſapprobation by ballots thrown into an urn. If the firſt claſs was unanimous, the others were not conſulted, as the firſt was ſuperior to all the others in number; but if they were not unanimous, they proceeded to conſult the reſt, and the majority decided the queſtion. This advantage of the firſt claſs gave offence to the reſt; and it was afterwards ſettled, that one claſs of the ſix ſhould be drawn by lot, to give its votes firſt, without regard to rank or priority. After all the votes had been gathered, the conſul declared aloud, that the law which had been propoſed was duly and conſtitutionally approved. The ſame ceremonies were obſerved in the election of conſuls, pretors, &c. The word Centuria is alſo applied to a ſubdiviſion of one of the Roman legions which conſiſted of an hundred men, and was the half of a manipulus, the ſixth part of a cohort, and the ſixtieth part of a legion. The commander of a centuria was called centurion, and he was diſtinguiſhed from the reſt by the branch of a vine which he carried in his hand.

Cephălon, a Greek of Ionia, who wrote an history of Troy, besides an epitome of universal history from the age of Ninus to Alexander, which he divided into nine books, inscribed with the name of the nine muses. He affected not to know the place of his birth, expecting it would be disputed like Homer's. He lived in the reign of Adrian.

Cĕphălus, son of Deioneus, king of Thessaly, by Diomede, daughter of Xuthus, married Procris, daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens. Aurora fell in love with him, and carried him away; but he refused to listen to her addresses, and was impatient to return to Procris. The goddess sent him back; and to try the fidelity of his wife, she made him put on a different form, and he arrived at the house of Procris in the habit of a merchant. Procris was deaf to every offer; but she suffered herself to be seduced by the gold of this stranger, who discovered himself the very moment that Procris had yielded up her virtue. This circumstance so ashamed Procris, that she fled from her husband, and devoted herself to hunting in the island of Eubœa, where she was admitted among the attendants of Diana, who presented her with a dog always sure of his prey, and a dart which never missed its aim, and always returned to the hands of its mistress of its own accord. Some say that the dog was a present from Minos, because Procris had cured his wounds. After this, Procris returned in disguise to Cephalus, who was willing to disgrace himself by some unnatural concessions to obtain the dog and the dart of Procris. Procris discovered herself at the moment that Cephalus shewed himself faithless, and a reconciliation was easily made between them. They loved one another with more tenderness than before, and Cephalus received from his wife the presents of Diana. As he was particularly fond of hunting, he every morning early repaired to the woods, and after much toil and fatigue, laid himself down in the cool shade, and earnestly called for Aura, or the refreshing breeze. This ambiguous word was mistaken for the name of a mistress; and some informer reported to the jealous Procris, that Cephalus daily paid a visit to a mistress, whose name was Aura. Procris too readily believed the information, and secretly followed her husband into the woods. According to his daily custom, Cephalus retired to the cool, and called after Aura. At the name of Aura, Procris eagerly lifted up her head to see her expected rival. Her motion occasioned a rustling among the leaves of the bush that concealed her; and as Cephalus listened, he thought it to be a wild beast, and he let fly his unerring dart. Procris was struck to the heart, and instantly expired in the arms of her husband, confessing that ill-grounded jealousy was the cause of her death. According to Apollodorus, there were two persons of the name of Cephalus; one, son of Mercury and Herse, carried away by Aurora, with whom he dwelt in Syria, and by whom he had a son called Tithonus. The other married Procris, and was the cause of the tragical events mentioned above. *Ovid. CEREĀLIA, feſtivals in honor of Ceres; firſt inſtituted at Rome by Memmius the edile, and celebrated on the 19th of April. Perſons in mourning were not permitted to appear at the celebration; therefore they were not obſerved after the battle of Cannæ. They are the ſame as the Theſmophoria of the Greeks. Vid. Theſmophoria.

CERES, the goddeſs of corn and of harveſts, was daughter of Saturn and Veſta. She had a daughter by Jupiter, whom ſhe called Pherephata, fruit bearing, and afterwards Proſerpine. This daughter was carried away by Pluto, as ſhe was gathering flowers in the plains near Enna. The rape of Proſerpine was grievous to Ceres, who ſought her all over Sicily; and when night came, ſhe lighted two torches in the flames of mount Ætna, to continue her ſearch by night all over the world. She at laſt found her veil near the fountain Cyane; but no intelligence could be received of the place of her concealment, till at laſt the nymph Arethuſa informed her that her daughter had been carried away by Pluto. No ſooner had Ceres heard this, than ſhe flew to heaven with her chariot drawn by two dragons, and demanded of Jupiter the reſtoration of her daughter. The endeavours of Jupiter to ſoften her by repreſenting Pluto as a powerful god, to become her ſon-in-law, proved fruitleſs, and the reſtoration was granted, provided Proſerpine had not eaten any thing in the kingdom of Pluto. Ceres upon this repaired to Pluto, but Proſerpine had eaten the grains of a pomegranate which ſhe had gathered as ſhe walked over the Elyſian fields, and Aſcalaphus, the only one who had ſeen her, diſcovered it to make his court to Pluto. The return of Proſerpine upon earth, was therefore impracticable; but Aſcalaphus, for his unſolicited information, was changed into an owl. [Vid. Aſcalaphus.] The grief of Ceres for the loſs of her daughter was ſo great, that Jupiter granted Proſerpine to paſs ſix months with her mother, and the reſt of the year with Pluto. During the inquiries of Ceres for her daughter, the cultivation of the earth was neglected, and the ground became barren; therefore, to repair the loſs which mankind had ſuffered by her abſence, the goddeſs went to Attica, which was become the moſt deſolate country in the world, and inſtructed Triptolemus of Eleuſis in every thing which concerned agriculture. She taught him how to plough the ground, to ſow and reap the corn, to make bread, and to take particular care of fruit trees. After theſe inſtructions, ſhe gave him her chariot, and commanded him to travel all over the world, and communicate his knowledge of agriculture to the rude inhabitants, who hitherto lived upon acorns and the roots of the earth. [Vid. Triptolemus.] Her beneficence to mankind made Ceres reſpected. Sicily was ſuppoſed to be the favorite retreat of the goddeſs, and Diodorus ſays, that ſhe and her daughter made their firſt appearance to mankind in Sicily, which Pluto received as a nuptial dowry from Jupiter when he married Proſerpine. The Sicilians made a yearly ſacrifice to Ceres, every man according to his abilities; and the fountain of Cyane, through which Pluto opened himſelf a paſſage with his trident, when carrying away Proſerpine, was publicly honored with an offering of bulls, and the blood of the victims was ſhed in the waters of the fountain. Beſides theſe, other ceremonies were obſerved in honor of the goddeſſes who had ſo peculiarly favored the iſland. The commemoration of the rape was celebrated about the beginning of the harveſt, and the ſearch of Ceres at the time that corn is ſown in the earth. The latter feſtival continued ſix ſucceſſive days; and during the celebration, the votaries of Ceres made uſe of ſome free and wanton expreſſions, as that language had made the goddeſs ſmile while melancholy for the loſs of her daughter. Attica, which had been ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed by the goddeſs, gratefully remembered her favors in the celebration of the Eleuſinian myſteries. [Vid. Eleuſinia.] Ceres alſo performed the duties of a legiſlator, and the Sicilians found the advantages of her ſalutary laws; hence, her ſirname of Theſmophora. She is the ſame as the Iſis of the Egyptians, and her worſhip, it is ſaid, was firſt brought into Greece by Erechtheus. She met with different adventures when ſhe travelled over the earth, and the impudence of Stellio was ſeverely puniſhed. To avoid the importunities of Neptune, ſhe changed herſelf into a mare; but the god took advantage of her metamorphoſis, and from their union aroſe the horſe Arion. [Vid. Arion.] The birth of this monſter ſo offended Ceres, that ſhe withdrew herſelf from the ſight of mankind; and the earth would have periſhed for want of her aſſiſtance, had not Pan diſcovered her in Arcadia, and given information of it to Jupiter. The Parcæ were ſent by the god to comfort her, and at their perſuaſion ſhe returned to Sicily, where her ſtatues repreſented her veiled in black, with the head of a horſe, and holding a dove in one hand, and in the other a dolphin. In their ſacrifices, the ancients offered Ceres a pregnant ſow, as that animal often injures and deſtroys the productions of the earth. While the corn was yet in graſs, they offered her a ram, after the victim had been led three times round the field. Ceres was repreſented with a garland of ears of corn on her head, holding in one hand a lighted torch, and in the other a poppy, which was ſacred to her. She appears as a countrywoman mounted on the back of an ox, and carrying a baſket on her left arm, and holding a hoe; and ſometimes ſhe rides in a chariot drawn by winged dragons. She was ſuppoſed to be the ſame as Rhea, Tellus, Cybele, Bona Dea, Berecynthia, &c. The Romans paid her great adoration, and her feſtivals were yearly celebrated by the Roman matrons on the month of April, during eight days. Theſe matrons abſtained during ſeveral days from the uſe of wine and every carnal enjoyment. They always bore lighted torches in commemoration of the goddeſs; and whoever came to theſe feſtivals without a previous initiation, was puniſhed with death. Ceres is metaphorically called bread and corn, as the word Bacchus is ſometimes uſed to ſignify wine. Apollod. 1, c. 5. l. 2, c. 1. l. 3, c. 12 & 14.—Pauſ. 1, c. 31. l. 2, c. 34. l. 3, c. 23. l. 8, c. 25, &c.—Diod. 1, &c.—*Heſiod. CHALESTRA, a town of Macedonia. Herodot. 7, c. 123.

CHALONĪTIS, a country of Media.

CHALŸBES & CALŸBES, a people of Aſia Minor, near Pontus, once very powerful, and poſſeſſed of a great extent of country, abounding in iron mines, where the inhabitants worked naked. The Calybes attacked the ten thouſand in their retreat, and behaved with much ſpirit and courage. They were partly conquered by Crœſus, king of Lydia. Some authors imagine that the Calybes are a nation of Spain. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 421.—Strab. 12, &c.—Apollon. 2, v. 375.—Xenoph. Anab. 4, &c.—Herodot. 1, c. 28.—Juſtin. 44, c. 3.

CHALYBON, now ſuppoſed to be Aleppo, a town of Syria, which gave the name of Chalybonitis to the neighbouring country.

CHALYBONĪTIS, a country of Syria, ſo famous for its wines that the kings of Perſia drank no other.

CHALYBS, a river of Spain, where Juſtin 44, c. 3, places the people called Calybes.

CHAMANI & CHAMAVIRI, a people of Germany. Tacit. in Germ.

CHANE, a river between Armenia and Albania, falling into the Caſpian ſea.

CHAON, a mountain of Peloponneſus.

CHAŎNES, a people of Epirus.

CHAŎNIA, a mountainous part of Epirus, which receives its name from Chaon, a ſon of Priam, inadvertently killed by his brother Helenus. There was a wood near, where doves (Chaoniæ aves) were ſaid to deliver oracles. The words Chaonius victus are by ancient authors applied to acorns, the food of the firſt inhabitants. Lucan. 6, v. 426. Claudian. de Proſ. rapt. 3, v. 47.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 335.—Propert. 1, el. 9.—Ovid. A. A. 1.

CHAONITIS, a country of Aſſyria.

CHAOS, a rude and ſhapeleſs maſs of matter, and confuſed aſſemblage of inactive elements, which, as the poets ſuppoſe, preexiſted the formation of the world, and from which the univerſe was formed by the hand and power of a ſuperior being. This doctrine was firſt eſtabliſhed by Heſiod, from whom the ſucceeding poets have copied it. Chaos was deemed, by ſome, as one of the oldeſt of the gods, and invoked as one of the infernal deities. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 510.—Ovid. Met. 1, fab. 1.

CHARĂDRA, a town of Phocis. Herodot. 8. c. 33.

CHARĀDROS, a river of Phocis, falling into the Cephiſus. Stat. Theb. 4, v. 46.

CHARĬCLES, one of the 30 tyrants ſet over Athens by the Lacedæmonians. Xenoph. Memor. 1.—Ariſt. 5.—Polit. c. 6.——A famous phyſician under Tiberius. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 50.

CHARICLĪDES, an officer of Dionyſius the younger, whom Dion gained to dethrone the tyrant. Diod. 16.

CHARĬCLO, the mother of Tireſias, greatly favored by Minerva. Apollod. 3, c. 6.——A daughter of Apollo, who married the centaur Chiron. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 635

CHARIDĒMUS, a Roman expoſed to wild beaſts. Martial. 1, ep. 44.——An Athenian, baniſhed by Alexander, and killed by Darius, &c.

CHARĬLA, a feſtival obſerved once in nine years by the Delphians. It owes its origin to this circumſtance: In a great famine the people of Delphi aſſembled and applied to their king to relieve their wants. He accordingly diſtributed the little corn he had among the nobleſt; but as a poor little girl, called Charila, begged the king with more than common earneſtneſs, he beat her with his ſhoe, and the girl, unable to bear his treatment, hanged herſelf in her girdle. The famine increaſed; and the oracle told the king, that to relieve his people, he muſt atone for the murder of Charila. Upon this a feſtival was inſtituted, with expiatory rites. The king preſided over this inſtitution, and diſtributed pulſe and corn to ſuch as attended. Charila's image was brought before the king, who ſtruck it with his ſhoe; after which it was carried to a deſolate place, where they put a halter round its neck, and buried it where Charila was buried. Plut. in Quæſt. Græc.

CHARILĀUS & CHARILLUS, a ſon of Polydectes king of Sparta, educated and protected by his uncle Lycurgus. He made war againſt Argos, and attacked Tegea. He was taken priſoner, and releaſed on promiſing that he would ceaſe from war, an engagement he ſoon broke. He died in the 64th year of his age. Pauſ. 2, 36, l. 6, c. 8.——A Spartan, who changed the monarchical power into an ariſtocracy. Ariſtot. Polit. 5, c. 12.

CHARISIUS, an orator at Athens. Cic. in B. 83.

CHARISTIA, feſtivals at Rome, celebrated by the diſtribution of mutual preſents. Val. Max. 2, c. 1.—Ovid. Faſt. 1.

CHARĬTES & GRATIÆ, the Graces, daughters of Venus by Jupiter or Bacchus, are three in number, Aglaia, Thalia, and Euphroſyne. They were the conſtant attendants of Venus, and they were repreſented as three young, beautiful, and modeſt virgins, all holding one another by the hand. They preſided over kindneſs and all good offices, and their worſhip was the ſame as that of the nine Muſes, with whom they had a temple in common. They were generally repreſented naked, becauſe kindneſſes ought to be done with ſincerity and candor. The moderns explain the allegory of their holding their hands joined, by obſerving, that there ought to be a perpetual and never ceaſing intercourſe of kindneſs and benevolence among friends. Their youth denotes the conſtant remembrance that we ought ever to have of kindneſſes received; and their virgin purity and innocence teaches us, that acts of benevolence ought to be done without any expectations of reſtoration, and that we ought never to ſuffer others or ourſelves to be guilty of baſe or impure favors.

CHARITON, a writer of Aphrodiſium, at the latter end of the 4th century. He compoſed a Greek romance, called The Loves of Chæreas and Callirhoe, which has been much admired for its elegance, and the originality of the characters it deſcribes. There is a very learned edition of Chariton, by Reiſke, with D'Orville's notes, 2 vols. 4to. Amſt. 1750.

CHARMĀDAS, a philoſopher of uncommon memory. Plin. 7, c. 24.

CHARME & CARME, the mother of Britomartis by Jupiter.

CHARMIDES, a Lacedæmonian, ſent by his king to quell ſeditions in Crete. Pauſ. 3, c. 2.——A boxer. Id. 6, c. 7.——A philoſopher of the third academy, B.C. 95.

CHARMĪNUS, an Athenian general, who defeated the Peloponneſians. Thucyd. 8, c. 42.

CHARMIONE,

CHARMIONE, a ſervant maid of Cleopatra, who ſtabbed herſelf after the example of her miſtreſs. Plut. in Anton.

CHARMIS, a phyſician of Marſeilles, in Nero's age, who uſed cold baths for his patients, and preſcribed medicines contrary to thoſe of his contemporaries. Plin. 21, c. 1.

CHARMOSYNA, a feſtival in Egypt. Plut. de Iſid.

CHARMOTAS, a part of Arabia.

CHARMUS, a poet of Syracuſe.

CHARON, a Theban, who received into his houſe Pelopidas and his friends, when they delivered Thebes from tyranny, &c. Plut. in Pelop.——An hiſtorian of Lampſacus, who wrote two books on Perſia, beſides other treatiſes, B. C. 479.——An hiſtorian of Naucratis, who wrote an hiſtory of his country, and of Egypt.——A Carthaginian writer, &c.——A god of hell, ſon of Erebus and Nox, who conducted the ſouls of the dead in a boat over the river Styx and Acheron, to the infernal regions, for an obolus. Such as had not been honored with a funeral were not permitted to enter his boat, without previouſly wandering on the ſhore for one hundred years. If any living perſon preſented himſelf to croſs the Stygian lake, he could not be admitted before he ſhewed Charon a golden bough, which he received from the Sibyl; and Charon was impriſoned for one year, becauſe he had ferried over, againſt his own will, Hercules, without this paſſport. Charon is repreſented as an old robuſt man, with a hideous countenance, long white beard, and piercing eyes. His garment is ragged and filthy, and his forehead is covered with wrinkles. As all the dead were obliged to pay a ſmall piece of money for their admiſſion, it was always uſual, among the ancients, to place under the tongue of the deceaſed a piece of money for Charon. This fable of Charon and his boat is borrowed from the Egyptians, whoſe dead were carried acroſs a lake, where ſentence was paſſed over them, and according to their good or bad actions, they were honored with a ſplendid burial, or left unnoticed in the open air. Vid. Acheruſia. Diod. 1.—Senec. in Herc. Fur. act. 3, v. 765.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 298, &c.

CHARONDAS, a man of Catana, who gave laws to the people of Thurium, and made a law that no man ſhould be permitted to come armed into the aſſembly. He inadvertently broke this law, and when told of it, he fell upon his ſword, B. C. 446. Val. Max. 6, c. 5.

CHAROPS & CHARŎPES, a Trojan, killed by Ulyſſes. Homer. Il.——A powerful Epirot who aſſiſted Flaminius when making war againſt Philip the king of Macedonia. Plut. in Flam.——The firſt decennial archon at Athens. Paterc. 1, c. 8.

CHARYBDIS, a dangerous whirlpool on the coaſt of Sicily, oppoſite another whirlpool called Scylla, on the coaſt of Italy. It was very dangerous to ſailors, and it proved fatal to part of the fleet of Ulyſſes. The exact ſituation of the Charybdis is not diſcovered by the moderns, as no whirlpool ſufficiently tremendous is now found to correſpond to the deſcription of the ancients. The words became a proverb, to ſhew that in our eagerneſs to avoid an evil, we fall into a greater. The name of Charybdis was properly beſtowed on miſtreſſes who repay affection and tenderneſs with ingratitude. It is ſuppoſed that Charybdis was an avaricious woman, who ſtole the oxen of Hercules, for which theft ſhe was ſtruck with thunder by Jupiter, and changed into a whirlpool. Lycophr. in Caſſ.—Homer. Od. 12.—Propert. 3. el. 11.—Ital. 14.—Ovid. in Ibin. de Ponto, 4, el. 10. Amor. 2, el. 16.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 420.

Incidit in Scyllam qui vult vitare Charybdim,

CHERSIPHO, an architect, &c. Plin. 36, c. 14.

CHERSONĒSUS, a Greek word, rendered by the Latins Peninſula. There were many of theſe among the ancients, of which theſe five are the moſt celebrated: one called Peloponneſus; one called Thracian, at the ſouth of Thrace, and weſt of the Helleſpont, where Miltiades led a colony of Athenians, and built a wall acroſs the Iſthmus. From its Iſthmus to its further ſhores, it meaſured 420 ſtadia, extending between the bay of Melas and the Helleſpont. The third, called Taurica, now Crim Tartary, was ſituate near the Palus Mæotis. The fourth, called Cimbrica, now Jutland, is in the northern parts of Germany; and the fifth, ſirnamed Aurea, lies in India, beyond the Ganges. Herodot. 6, c. 33. l. 7, c. 58.—Liv. 31, c. 16.—Cic. ad Br. 2.——Alſo a peninſula near Alexandria in Egypt. Hirt. Alex. 10.

CHILO, a Spartan philoſopher, who has been called one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece. He died through exceſs of joy, in the arms of his ſon, who had obtained a victory at Olympia, B. C. 597. Plin. 7, c. 33.—Laert.——One of the Ephori at Sparta, B. C. 556.

CHILONIS, the wife of Theopompus king of Sparta. Polyæn. 8.

CHIMÆRA, a celebrated monſter, ſprung from Echidna and Typhon, which had three heads, that of a lion, of a goat, and a dragon, and continually vomited flames. The foreparts of its body were thoſe of a lion, the middle was that of a goat, and the hinder parts were thoſe of a dragon. It generally lived in Lycia, about the reign of Jobates, by whoſe orders Bellerophon, mounted on the horſe Pegaſus, overcame it. This fabulous tradition is explained by the recollection that there was a burning mountain in Lycia, whoſe top was the reſort of lions, on account of its deſolate wilderneſs; the middle, which was fruitful, was covered with goats; and at the bottom the marſhy ground abounded with ſerpents. Bellerophon is ſaid to have conquered the Chimæra, becauſe he firſt made his habitation on that mountain. Plutarch ſays, that it is the captain of ſome pirates, who adorned their ſhip with the images of a lion, a goat, and a dragon. Heſiod. Theog. v. 322.—Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 2, c. 3.—Lucret. 5, v. 903.—Ovid. 9 Met. v. 646.—Virg. Æn. 6, CHION, a Greek writer, whoſe epiſtles were edited cum notis, Cobergi, 8vo. Lipſ. 1765.

CHIŎNE, a daughter of Dædalion, of whom Apollo and Mercury became enamoured. To enjoy her company, Mercury lulled her to ſleep with his Caduceus, and Apollo, in the night, under the form of an old woman, obtained the ſame favors as Mercury. From this embrace Chione became mother of Philammon and Autolycus, the former of whom, as being ſon of Apollo, became an excellent muſician; and the latter was equally notorious for his robberies, of which his father Mercury was the patron. Chione grew ſo proud of her commerce with the gods, that ſhe even preferred her beauty to that of Juno, for which impiety ſhe was killed by the goddeſs, and changed into a hawk. Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 8.——A daughter of Boreas and Orithyia, who had Eumolpus by Neptune. She threw her ſon into the ſea, but he was preſerved by his father. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Pauſ. 1, c. 38.——A famous proſtitute. Martial. 3, ep. 34.

CHIONIDES, an Athenian poet, ſuppoſed by ſome to be the inventor of comedy.

CHIOS, now Scio, an iſland in the Ægean ſea, between Leſbos and Samos, on the coaſt of Aſia Minor, which receives its name, as ſome ſuppoſe, from Chione, or from χιων, ſnow, which was very frequent there. It was well inhabited, and could once equip a hundred ſhips; and its chief town, called Chios, had a beautiful harbour which could contain 80 ſhips. The wine of this iſland, ſo much celebrated by the ancients, is ſtill in general eſteem. Chios was anciently called Æthalia, Macris, and Pityaſa. There was no adultery committed there for the ſpace of 700 years. Plut. de Virt. Mul.—Horat. 3, od. 19, v. 5. 1, ſat. 10, v. 24.—Pauſ. 7, c. 4.—Mela. 2, v. 2.—Strab. 2.

CHIRON, a centaur, half a man and half a horſe, ſon of Philyra and Saturn, who had changed himſelf into a horſe, to eſcape the enquiries of his wife Rhea. Chiron was famous for his knowledge of muſic, medicine, and ſhooting. He taught mankind the uſe of plants and medicinal herbs; and he inſtructed, in all the polite arts, the greateſt heroes of his age; ſuch as Achilles, Æſculapius, Hercules, &c. He was wounded in the knee by a poiſoned arrow, by Hercules, in his purſuit of the centaurs. Hercules flew to his aſſiſtance; but as the wound was incurable, and the cauſe of the moſt excruciating pains, Chiron begged Jupiter to deprive him of immortality. His prayers were heard, and he was placed by the god among the conſtellations, under the name of Sagittarius. Heſiod. in Scuto.—Homer. Il. 11.—Pauſ. 3, c. 18. l. 5, c. 19. l. 9, c. 31.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 676.—Apollod. 2, c. 5. l. 3, c. 13.—Horat. epod. 13.

CHLOE, a ſirname of Ceres at Athens. Her yearly feſtivals, called Chloeia, were celebrated with much mirth and rejoicing, and a ram was always ſacrificed to her. The name of Chloe is ſuppoſed to bear the ſame ſignification as Flava, ſo often applied to the goddeſs of corn. The name, from its ſignification, (χλοη herba virens) has generally been applied to women poſſeſſed of beauty, and of ſimplicity.

CHLOREUS, a prieſt of Cybele, who came with Æneas into Italy, and was killed by Turnus. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 768.——Another, &c.

CHŒRĬLUS, a tragic poet of Athens, who wrote 150 tragedies, of which 13 obtained the the prize.——An hiſtorian of Samos.——Two other poets, one of whom was very intimate with Herodotus. He wrote a poem on the victory which the Athenians had obtained over Xerxes, and on account of the excellence of the compoſition, he received a piece of gold for each verſe from the Athenians, and was publicly ranked with Homer as a poet. The other was one of Alexander's flatterers and friends. It is ſaid the prince promiſed him as many pieces of gold as there ſhould be good verſes in his poetry, and as many ſlaps on the forehead as there were bad; and in conſequence of this, ſcarce ſix of his verſes in each poem were entitled to gold, while the reſt were rewarded with the caſtigation. Plut. in Alex.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 232.

CHRYSOSTOM, a biſhop of Conſtantinople, who died A. D. 407, in his 53d year. He was a great diſciplinarian, and by ſeverely laſhing the vices of his age, he procured himſelf many enemies. He was baniſhed for oppoſing the raiſing a ſtatue to the empreſs, after having diſplayed his abilities as an elegant preacher, a ſound theologician, and a faithful interpreter of ſcripture. Chryſoſtom's works were nobly, and correctly edited, without a Latin verſion, by Saville, 8 vols. fol. Etonæ, 1613. They have appeared, with a tranſlation at Paris, edit. Benedict. Montfaucon, 13 vols. fol. 1718.

CHRYSOTHĔMIS, a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemneſtra.——A Cretan, who firſt obtained the poetical prize at the Pythian games. Pauſ. 10, c. 7.

CHRYXUS, a leader of the Boii, grandſon to Brennus, who took Rome. Sil. 4, v. 148.

CHTHONIA, a daughter of Erechtheus, who married Butes. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—A ſirname of Ceres, from a temple built to her by Chthonia, at Hermione. She had a feſtival there called by the ſame name, and celebrated every ſummer. During the celebration, the prieſts of the goddeſs marched in proceſſion, accompanied by the magiſtrates, and a crowd of women and boys in white apparel, with garlands of flowers on their heads. Behind was dragged an untamed heifer, juſt taken from the herd. When they came to the temple, the victim was let looſe, and four old women armed with ſcythes, ſacrificed the heifer, and killed her by cutting her throat. A ſecond, a third, and a fourth victim, was in a like manner diſpatched by the old women; and it was obſervable, that they all fell on the ſame ſide. Pauſ. Corinth.

CHTHONIUS, a centaur, killed by Neſtor in a battle at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 441.——One of the ſoldiers who ſprang from the dragon's teeth ſown by Cadmus. Hygin. fab. 178.——A ſon of Ægyptus and Calliadne. Apollod. 2, c. 1.

CIBARĪTIS, a country of Aſia near the Mæander.

CIBYRA now BURUN, a town of Phrygia of which the inhabitants were dexterous hunters. Horat. 1, ep. 6, v. 33.—Cic. [illegible] Ver. 4, c. 13. Attic. 5, ep. 2.——[illegible] Caria.

M. T. CICERO, born at Arpinum, [illegible] ſon of a Roman knight, and lineally deſcended from the ancient kings of the Sabines. His mother's name was Helvia. After diſplaying many promiſing abilities at ſchool, he was taught philoſophy by Philo, and law by Mutius Scævola. He acquired and perfected a taſte for military knowledge under Sylla, in the Marſic [illegible] war, and retired from Rome, which was divided into factions, to indulge his philoſophic propenſities. He was naturally of a weak and delicate conſtitution, and he viſited Greece on account of his health; though, perhaps, the true cauſe of his abſence from Rome might be attributed to his fear of Sylla. His friends, who were well acquainted with his ſuperior abilities, were anxious for his return; and when at laſt he obeyed their ſolicitations, he applied himſelf with uncommon diligence to oratory, and was ſoon diſtinguiſhed above all the ſpeakers of his age in the Roman forum. When he went to Sicily as quæſtor, he behaved with great juſtice and moderation; and the Sicilians remembered with gratitude the eloquence of Cicero, their common patron, who had delivered them from the tyranny and avarice of Verres. After he had paſſed through the offices of edile and prætor, he ſtood a candidate for the conſulſhip, A. U. C. 689; and the patricians and the plebeians were equally anxious to raiſe him to that dignity, againſt the efforts and bribery of Catiline. His new ſituation was critical, and required circumſpection. Catiline, with many diſſolute and deſperate Romans, had conſpired againſt their country, and combined to murder Cicero himſelf. In this dilemma, Cicero, in full ſenate, accuſed Catiline of treaſon againſt the ſtate; but as his evidence was not clear, his efforts were unavailing. He, however, ſtood upon his guard, and by the information of his friends, and the diſcovery of Fulvia, his life was ſaved from the dagger of Marcius and Cethegus, whom Catiline had ſent to aſſaſſinate him. After this, Cicero commanded Catiline, in the ſenate, to leave the city; and this deſperate conſpirator marched out in triumph to meet the 20,000 men who were aſſembled to ſupport his cauſe. The lieutenant of C. Antony, the other conſul, defeated them in Gaul; and Cicero, at Rome, puniſhed the reſt of the conſpirators with death. This capital puniſhment, though inveighed againſt by J. Cæſar as too ſevere, was ſupported by the opinion of Lutatius Catulus, and Cato, and confirmed by the whole ſenate. After this memorable deliverance, Cicero received the thanks of all the people, and was ſtiled The father of his country, and a ſecond founder of Rome. The vehemence with which he had attacked Clodius, proved injurious to him; and when his enemy was made tribune, Cicero was baniſhed from Rome, though 20,000 young men were ſupporters of his innocence. He was not, however, deſerted in his baniſhment. Wherever he went, he was received with the higheſt marks of approbation and reverence; and when the faction had ſubſided at Rome, the whole ſenate and people were unanimous for his return. After ſixteen months abſence, he entered Rome with univerſal ſatisfaction; and when he was ſent, with the power of proconſul, to Cilicia, his integrity and prudence made him ſucceſsful againſt the enemy, and at his return, he was honored with a triumph which the factions prevented him to enjoy. After much heſitation, during the civil commotions between Cæſar and Pompey, he joined himſelf to the latter, and followed him to Greece. When victory had declared in favor of Cæſar, at the battle of Pharſalia, Cicero went to Brunduſium, and was reconciled to the conqueror, who treated him with great humanity. From this time Cicero retired into the country, and ſeldom viſited Rome. When Cæſar had been ſtabbed in the ſenate, Cicero recommended a general amneſty, and was the moſt earneſt to decree the provinces to Brutus and Caſſius. But when he ſaw the intereſt of Cæſar's murderers decreaſe, and Antony come into power, he retired to Athens. He ſoon after returned, but lived in perpetual fear of aſſaſſination. Auguſtus courted the approbation of Cicero, and expreſſed his wiſh to be his colleague in the conſulſhip. But his wiſh was not ſincere; he ſoon forgot his former profeſſions of friendſhip; and when the two conſuls had been killed at Mutina, Auguſtus joined his intereſt to that of Antony, and the triumvirate was ſoon after formed. The great enmity which Cicero bore to Antony was fatal to him; and Auguſtus, Antony, and Lepidus, the triumvirs, to deſtroy all cauſe of quarrel, and each to diſpatch his enemies, produced their liſt of proſcription. About two hundred were doomed to death, and Cicero was among the number upon the liſt of Antony. Auguſtus yielded a man to whom he partly owed his greatneſs, and Cicero was purſued by the emiſſaries of Antony, among whom was Popilius, whom he had defended upon an accuſation of parricide. He had fled in a litter towards the ſea of Caieta; and when the aſſaſſins came up to him, he put his head out of the litter, and it was ſevered from the body by Herennius. This memorable event happened in December, 43 B. C. after the enjoyment of life for 63 years, 11 months, and five days. The head and right hand of the orator were carried to Rome, and hung up in the Roman forum; and ſo inveterate was Antony's hatred againſt the unfortunate man, that even Fulvia the triumvir's wife, wreaked her vengeance upon his head, and drew the tongue out of the mouth, and bored it through repeatedly with a gold bodkin, bodkin, verifying in this act of inhumanity, what Cicero had once obſerved, that no animal is more revengeful than a woman. Cicero has acquired more real fame by his literary compoſitions, than by his ſpirited exertions as a Roman ſenator. The learning and the abilities which he poſſeſſed, have been the admiration of every age and country, and his ſtyle has always been accounted as the true ſtandard of pure latinity. The words naſcitur poeta have been verified in his attempts to write poetry; and the ſatyr of Martial, Carmina quod ſcribit muſis et Apolline nullo, though ſevere, is true. He once formed a deſign to write the hiſtory of his country, but he was diſappointed. He tranſlated many of the Greek writers, poets as well as hiſtorians, for his own improvement. When he travelled into Aſia, he was attended by moſt of the learned men of his age; and his ſtay at Rhodes, in the ſchool of the famous Molo, conduced not a little to perfect his judgment. Like his countrymen, he was not deſtitute of ambition, and the arrogant expectations with which he returned from his quæſtorſhip in Sicily are well known. He was of a timid diſpoſition; and he who ſhone as the father of Roman eloquence, never aſcended the pulpit to harangue, without feeling a ſecret emotion of dread. His conduct, during the civil wars, is far from that of a patriot; and when we view him, dubious and irreſolute, ſorry not to follow Pompey, and yet afraid to oppoſe Cæſar, the judgment would almoſt brand him with the name of coward. In his private character, however, Cicero was of an amiable diſpoſition; and though he was too elated with proſperity, and debaſed by adverſity, the affability of the friend conciliated the good graces of all. He married Terentia, whom he afterwards divorced, and by whom he had a ſon and a daughter. He afterwards married a young woman, to whom he was guardian; and becauſe ſhe ſeemed elated at the death of his daughter Tullia, he repudiated her. The works of this celebrated man, of which, according to ſome, the tenth part is ſcarce extant, have been edited by the beſt ſcholars in every country. The moſt valuable editions of the works complete, are that of Verburgius, 2 vols. fol. Amſt. 1724.—that of Olivet, 9 vols. 4to. Geneva, 1758.—the Oxford edition in 10 vols. 4to, 1782.—and that of Lallemand, 12mo. 14 vols. Paris apud Barbou, 1768. Plutarch. in vitâ.—Quintil.—Dio. Caſſ.—Appian.—Florus.—C Nep. in Attic.—Eutrop.—Cic. &c.—— Marcus, the ſon of Cicero, was taken by Auguſtus as his colleague in the conſulſhip. He revenged his father's death, by throwing public diſhonor upon the memory of Antony. He diſgraced his father's virtues, and was ſo fond of drinking, that Pliny obſerves, he wiſhed to deprive Antony of the honor of being the greateſt drunkard in the Roman empire. Plut. in Cic.—— Quintus, the brother of the orator, was Cæſar's lieutenant in Gaul, and proconſul of Aſia, for three years. He was proſcribed with his ſon at the ſame time as his brother Tully. Plut. in Cic.—Appian.

Cichyris, a town of Epirus.

Cicŏnes, a people of Thrace near the Hebrus. Ulyſſes, at his return from Troy, conquered them, and plundered their chief city Iſmarus. They tore to pieces, Orpheus, for his obſcene indulgences. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 83. l. 15, v. 313.—Virg. G. 4, v. 520, &c.—Mela. 2, c. 2.

Cilissa, a town of Phrygia.

Cilix, a ſon of Phœnix, or according to Herodotus, of Agenor, who gave his name to Cilicia. Apollod. 3, c. 1.—Herodot. 7, c. 91.

Cilla, a town of Africa Propria. Diod. 20.——A town of Æolia. Herodot. 1, c. 149.——Of Troas, which received its name according to Theopompus, from a certain Cillus, who was one of Hippodamia's ſuitors, and killed by Œnomaus. Homer. Il. 1, v. 38.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 174.

Cilles, a general of Ptolemy, conquered by Demetrius. Diod. 19.

Cillus, a charioteer of Pelops, in whoſe honor a city was built. Strab. 13.

Cilnius, the ſirname of Mœcenas.

Cilo, Jun. an oppreſſive governor of Bithynia and Pontus. The provinces carried their complaints againſt him to Rome, but ſuch was the noiſe of the flatterers that attended the emperor Claudius, that he was unable unable to hear them; and when he aſked what they had ſaid, he was told by one of Cilo's friends, that they returned thanks for his good adminiſtration; upon which the emperor ſaid, Let Cilo be continued two years longer in his province. Dio. 60.—Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 21.

CIMBER, TULL. one of Cæſar's murderers. He laid hold of the dictator's robe, which was a ſignal for the reſt to ſtrike. Plut. in Cæſ.

CIMBERIUS, a chief of the Suevi.

CIMBRI, a people of Germany, who invaded the Roman empire with a large army, and were conquered by Marius. Flor. 3, c. 3.

CIMBRĬCUM BELLUM, was begun by the Cimbri and Teutones, by an invaſion of the Roman territories, B. C. 109. Theſe barbarians were ſo courageous, and even deſperate, that they faſtened their firſt ranks each to the other, with cords. In the firſt battle they deſtroyed 80,000 Romans, under the conſuls Manlius and Servilius Cæpio. But when Marius, in his ſecond conſulſhip, was choſen to carry on the war he met the Teutones at Aquæ Sextiæ, where, after a bloody engagement, he left dead on the field of battle 20,000, and took 90,000 priſoners, B. C. 102. The Cimbri, who had formed another army, had already penetrated into Italy, where they were met at the river Atheſis, by Marius and his colleague Catulus, a year after. An engagement enſued, and 140,000 of them were ſlain. This laſt battle put an end to this dreadful war, and the two conſuls entered Rome in triumph. Flor. 3, c. 3.—Plin. 7, c. 22. l. 17, c. 1.—Mela. 3, c. 3.—Paterc. 2, c. 12.—Plut. in Mario.

CIMĬNUS, now Viterbe, a lake and mountain of Etruria. Virg. Æn. 7. v. 697.—Liv. 9, c. 36.

CIMMĔRII, a people near the Palus Mœotis, who invaded Aſia Minor, and ſeized upon the kingdom of Cyaxares. After they had been maſters of the country for 28 years, they were driven back by Alyattes king of Lydia. Herodot. 1, c. 6, &c. l. 4, c. 1, &c.——Another nation on the weſtern coaſt of Italy, generally imagined to have lived in caves near the ſea-ſhore of Campania, and there, in concealing themſelves from the light of the ſun, to have made their retreat the receptacle of their plunder. In conſequence of this manner of living, the country which they inhabited, was ſuppoſed to be ſo gloomy, that, to mention a great obſcurity, the expreſſion of Cimmerian darkneſs has proverbially been uſed; and Homer, according to Plutarch, drew his images of hell and Pluto from the gloomy and diſmal country where they dwelt. Homer. Od. 13.—Virg. Æn. 6.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 592, &c.—Strab. 5.

CIMMĔRIS, a town of Troas, formerly called Edonis. Plin. 5, c. 30.

CIMMĔRIUM, now Crim, a town of Taurica Cherſoneſus, whoſe inhabitants are called Cimmerii. Mela. 1, c. 19.

CIMŌLIS & CINOLIS, a town of Paphlagonia.

CIMŌLUS, now Argentiera, an iſland in the Cretan ſea, producing chalk and fuller's earth. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 463.—Plin. 35, c. 16.

CIMON, an Athenian, ſon of Miltiades and Hegiſipyle, famous for his debaucheries in his youth, and the reformation of his morals when arrived to years of diſcretion. When his father died, he was impriſoned, becauſe unable to pay the fine laid upon him by the Athenians; but he was releaſed from confinement by his ſiſter and wife Elpinice. (Vid. Elpinice.) He behaved with great courage at the battle of Salamis, and rendered himſelf popular by his munificence and valor. He defeated the Perſian fleet, and took 200 ſhips, and totally routed their land army, the very ſame day. The money that he obtained by his victories, was not applied to his own private uſe; but with it he fortified and embelliſhed the city. He ſome time after loſt all his popularity, and was baniſhed by the Athenians, who declared war againſt the Lacedæmonians. He was recalled from his exile, and at his return, he made a reconciliation between Lacedæmon and his countrymen. He was afterwards appointed to carry on the war againſt Perſia in Egypt, and Cyprus, with a fleet of 200 ſhips; and on the coaſt of Aſia, he gave battle to the enemy, and totally ruined their fleet. He died as he was beſieging the town of Citium in Cyprus, B. C. 449, in the 51ſt year of his age. He may be called the laſt of the Greeks, whoſe ſpirit and boldneſs defeated the armies of the barbarians. He was ſuch an inveterate enemy to the Perſian power, that he formed a plan of totally deſtroying it; and in his wars, he had ſo reduced the Perſians, that they promiſed in a treaty, not to paſs the Chelidonian iſlands with their fleet, or to approach within a day's journey of the Grecian ſeas. The munificence of Cimon has been highly extolled by his biographers, and he has been deſervedly praiſed for leaving his gardens open to the public. Thucyd. 1, c. 100 and 112.—Juſtin. 2, c. 15.—Diod. 11.—Plut. & C. Nep. in vitâ.——An Athenian, father of Miltiades. Herodot. 6, c. 34.——A Roman, ſupported in priſon by the milk of his daughter.——An Athenian, who wrote an account of the war of the Amazons againſt his country.

Cinæthon, an ancient poet of Lacedæmon, &c. Vid. Cinethon.

Cinaradas, one of the deſcendants of Cinyras, who preſided over the ceremonies of Venus at Paphos. Tacit. 2. Hiſt. c. 3.

Cincia lex, was enacted by M. Cincius, tribune of the people, A. U. C. 549. By it no man was permitted to take any money as a giſt or a fee in judging a cauſe. Liv. 34. c. 4.

L. Q. Cincinnātus, a celebrated Roman, who was informed, as he ploughed his field, that the ſenate had choſen him dictator. Upon this he left his ploughed land with regret, and repaired to the field of battle, where his countrymen were cloſely beſieged by the Volſci and Æqui. He conquered the enemy, and returned to Rome in triumph; and 16 days after his appointment, he laid down his office, and retired back to plough his fields. In his 80th year, he was again ſummoned againſt Præneſte as dictator; and after a ſucceſsful campaign, he reſigned the abſolute power he had enjoyed only 21 days, nobly diſregarding the rewards that were offered him by the ſenate. He floriſhed about 460 years before Chriſt. Liv. 3, c. 26.—Flor. 1, c. 11.—Cic. de Finib. 4.

L. Cincius Alimentus, a prætor of Sicily in the ſecond Punic war, who wrote annals in Greek. Dionyſ. Hal. 1.—— Marcus, a tribune of the people, A. U. C. 549.

Cineas, a Theſſalian, miniſter and friend to Pyrrhus king of Epirus. He was ſent to Rome by his maſter to ſue for a peace, which he, however, could not obtain. He told Pyrrhus, that the Roman ſenate were a venerable aſſembly of kings; and obſerved, that to fight with them, was to fight againſt another Hydra. He was of ſuch a retentive memory, that the day after his arrival at Rome, he could ſalute every ſenator and knight by his name. Plin. 7, c. 24.—Cic. ad Fam. 9, ep. 25.——A king of Theſſaly. Herodot. 5, c. 63.——An Athenian, &c. Polyæn. 2, c. 32.

Claudius I. (Tiber. Druſus Nero) ſon of Druſus, Livia's ſecond ſon, ſucceeded as emperor of Rome, after the murder of Caligula, whoſe memory he endeavoured to annihilate. He made himſelf popular for a while, by taking particular care of the city, and by adorning and beautifying it with buildings. He paſſed over into Britain, and gained a triumph for victories which his generals had won, and ſuffered himſelf to be governed by favorites, whoſe licentiouſneſs and avarice plundered the ſtate, and impoveriſhed the provinces. He married four wives, one of whom, called Meſſalina, he put to death on account of her luſt and debauchery. He was at laſt poiſoned by another called Agrippina, who wiſhed to raiſe her ſon Nero to the throne. The poiſon was conveyed in muſhrooms; but as it did not operate faſt enough, his phyſician, by order of the empreſs, made him ſwallow a poiſoned feather. He died in the 63d year of his age, 13 October, A. D. 54, after a reign of 13 years; diſtinguiſhed neither by humanity nor courage, but debaſed by weakneſs and irreſolution. He was ſucceeded by Nero. Tacit. Ann. 11, &c.—Dio. 60.—Juv. 6, v. 619.—Suet. in vitâ.——The ſecond emperor of that name, was a Dalmatian, who ſucceeded Gallienus. He conquered the Goths, Scythians, and Heruli, and killed no leſs than 300,000 in a battle; and after a reign of about two years, died of the plague in Pannonia. The excellence of his character, marked with bravery, and tempered with juſtice and benevolence, is well known by theſe words of the ſenate, addreſſed to him: Claudi Auguſte, tu frater, tu pater, tu amicus, tu bonus ſenator, tu vere princeps.——Nero a conſul, with Liv. Salinator, who defeated and killed Aſdrubal, near the river Metaurum, as he was paſſing from Spain into Italy, to go to the aſſiſtance of his brother Annibal. Liv. 27, &c.—Horat. 4, od. 4, v. 37.—Sueton. in Tib.——The father of the emperor Tiberius, quæſtor to Cæſar in the wars of Alexandria.——Pollos, an hiſtorian. Plin. 7, ep. 51.——Pontius, a general of the Samnites, who conquered the Romans at Furcæ Caudinæ, and made them paſs under the yoke. Liv. 9, c. 1, &c.——Petilius, a dictator, A. U. C. 442.——Appius, an orator. Cic. in Brut. Vid. Appius.——App. Cæcus, a Roman cenſor, who built an aqueduct A. U. C. 441, which brought water to Rome from Tuſculum, at the diſtance of ſeven or eight miles. The water was called Appia, and it was the firſt that was brought to the city from the country. Before his age, the Romans were ſatisfied with the waters of the Tiber, or of the fountains and wells in the city. [Vid. Appius.]——A prætor of Sicily.——Publius, a great enemy to Cicero. Vid. Clodius.——Marcellus. Vid. Marcellus.——Pulcher, a conſul, who, when conſulting the ſacred chickens, ordered them to be dipped in water, becauſe they would not eat. Liv. ep. 19. He was unſucceſsful in his expedition againſt the Carthaginians in Sicily, and diſgraced on his return to Rome.——Tiberius Nero, was elder brother of Druſus, and ſon of Livia Druſilla, who married Auguſtus, after his divorce of Scribonia. He married Livia, the emperor's daughter by Scribonia, and ſucceeded in the empire by the name of Tiberius. Vid. Tiberius. Horat.

rat. 1, ep. 3, v. 2.——The name of Claudius is common to many Roman conſuls, and other officers of ſtate; but nothing is recorded of them, and their name is but barely mentioned. Liv.

C. 371. Diod. 15.—Paus. 9, c. 13.—Xenoph.——A son-in-law of Leonidas king of Sparta, who, for a while, usurped the kingdom, after the expulsion of his father-in-law. When Leonidas was recalled, Cleombrotus was banished; and his wife, Chelonis, who had accompanied her father, now accompanied her husband in his exile. Paus. 3, c. 6.—Plut. in Ag. & Cleom.——A youth of Ambracia, who killed himself after reading Plato's treatise upon the immortality of the soul. Cic. in Tusc. 1, c. 34.—Ovid. in Ib. 493.

Cleomēdes, a famous athlete of Astypalæa, above Crete. In a combat at Olympia, he killed one of his antagonists by a blow with his fist. On account of this accidental murder, he was deprived of the victory, and he became delirious. In his return to Astypalæa, he entered a school, and pulled down the pillars which supported the roof, and crushed to death 60 boys. He was pursued with stones, and he fled for shelter into a tomb, whose doors he so strongly secured, that his pursuers were obliged to break them for access. When the tomb was opened, Cleomedes could not be found either dead or alive. The oracle of Delphi was consulted, and gave this answer, Ultimus heroum Cleomedes Astypalæus. Upon this they offered sacrifices to him as a god. Paus. 6, c, 9.—Plut. in Rom.

Cleomĕnes 1st, king of Sparta, conquered the Argives, and burnt 5000 of them by setting fire to a grove where they had fled. and freed Athens from the tyranny of the Pisistratidæ. By bribing the oracle, he pronounced Demaratus, his colleague on the throne, illegitimate, because he refused to punish the people of Ægina, who had deserted the Greeks. He killed himself in a fit of madness, 491 B.C. Herodot. 5, 6, & 7. —Paus. 8, c. 3, &c.——The 2d, succeeded his brother Agesipolis 2d. He reigned 61 years in the greatest tranquillity, and was father to Acrotatus and Cleonymus, and was succeeded by Areus 1st, son of Acrotatus. Paus. 3, c. 6.——The 3d, succeeded his father Leonidas. He was of an enterprizing spirit, and resolved to restore the ancient discipline of Lycurgus in its full force, by banishing luxury and intemperance. He killed the Ephori, and removed by poison his royal colleague Eurydamides, and made his own brother, Euclidas, king, against the laws of the state, which forbade more than one of the same family to sit on the throne. He made war against the Achæans, and attempted to destroy their league. Aratus, the general of the Achæans, who supposed himself inferior to his enemy, called Antigonus to his assistance; and Cleomenes, when he had fought the unfortunate battle of Sellasia, B.C. 222, retired into Egypt, to the court of Ptolemy Evergetes, where his wife and children had fled before him. Ptolemy received him with great cordiality; but his successor, weak and suspicious, soon expressed his jealousy of this noble stranger, and imprisoned him. Cleomenes killed himself, and his body was flead, and exposed on a cross, B. C. 219. Polyb. 6.—Plut. in vitâ—Justin. 28, c. 4.——A man appointed by Alexander to receive the tributes of Egypt and Africa. Curt. 4, c. 8.——A man placed as arbitrator between the Athenians and the people of Megara.——An historian.——A dithyrambic poet of Rhegium.——A Sicilian, contemporary with Verres, whose in-

Il.* 9, v. 552.—Pauſ. 4, c. 2.——One of the Danaides. Apollod. 2, c. 1.——A daughter of Amyntas of Epheſus. Pauſ. 1, c. 44.——A wife of Tigranes king of Armenia, ſiſter of Mithridates. Juſtin. 38, v. 3.——A daughter of Tros and Callirhoe. Apollod. 3, c. 12.——A daughter of Ptolemy Philometor, who married Alexander Bala, and afterwards Nicanor. She killed Seleucus, Nicanor's ſon, becauſe he aſcended the throne without her conſent. She was ſuſpected of preparing poiſon for Antiochus her ſon, and compelled to drink it herſelf, B. C. 120.——A wife and ſiſter of Ptolemy Evergetes, who raiſed her ſon Alexander, a minor, to the throne of Egypt, in preference to his elder brother, Ptolemy Lathurus, whoſe intereſt the people favored. As Alexander was odious, Cleopatra ſuffered Lathurus to aſcend the throne, on condition, however, that he ſhould repudiate his ſiſter and wife, called Cleopatra, and marry Seleuca, his younger ſiſter. She afterwards raiſed her favorite, Alexander, to the throne; but her cruelties were ſo odious, that he fled to avoid her tyranny. Cleopatra laid ſnares for him: and when Alexander heard it, he put her to death. Juſtin. 39, c. 3 & 4.——A queen of Egypt, daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, and ſiſter and wife to Ptolemy Dionyſius, celebrated for her beauty and her cunning. She admitted Cæſar to her arms, to influence him to give her the kingdom, in preference to her brother, who had expelled her, and had a ſon by him, called Cæſarion. As ſhe had ſupported Brutus, Antony, in his expedition to Parthia, ſummoned her to appear before him. She arrayed herſelf in the moſt magnificent apparel, and appeared before her judge in the moſt captivating attire. Her artifice ſucceeded; Antony became enamoured of her, and publicly married her, forgetful of his connections with Octavia, the ſiſter of Auguſtus. He gave her the greateſt part of the eaſtern provinces of the Roman empire. This behaviour was the cauſe of a rupture between Auguſtus and Antony; and theſe two celebrated Romans met at Actium, where Cleopatra, by flying with ſixty ſail, ruined ruined the intereſt of Antony, and he was defeated. Cleopatra had retired to Egypt, where ſoon after Antony followed her. Antony killed himſelf upon the falſe information that Cleopatra was dead; and as his wound was not mortal, he was carried to the queen, who drew him up by a cord from one of the windows of the monument, where ſhe had retired and concealed herſelf. Antony ſoon after died of his wounds; and Cleopatra, after ſhe had received preſſing invitations from Auguſtus, and even pretended declarations of love, deſtroyed herſelf by the bite of an aſp, not to fall into the conqueror's hands. She had previouſly attempted to ſtab herſelf, and had once made a reſolution to ſtarve herſelf. Cleopatra was a voluptuous and extravagant woman, and in one of the feaſts ſhe gave to Antony at Alexandria, ſhe melted pearls into her drink to render her entertainment more ſumptuous and expenſive. She was fond of appearing dreſſed as the goddeſs Iſis; and ſhe adviſed Antony to make war againſt the richeſt nations, to ſupport her debaucheries. Her beauty has been greatly commended, and her mental perfections ſo highly celebrated, that ſhe has been deſcribed as capable of giving audience to the ambaſſadors of ſeven different nations, and of ſpeaking their various languages as fluently as her own. In Antony's abſence, ſhe improved the public library of Alexandria, with the addition of that of Pergamus. Two treatiſes, de medicamine faciei epiſtolæ eroticæ, and de morbis mulierum, have been falſely attributed to her. She died B. C. 30 years, after a reign of 24 years. Egypt became a Roman province at her death. Flor. 4, c. 11.—Appian. 5. bell. civ.—Plut. in Pomp. & Ant.—Horat. 1, od. 37, v. 21, &c.—Strab. 17.——A daughter of Ptolemy Epiphanes, who married Philometor, and afterwards Phyſcon of Cyrene.

Pb. Clōdius, a Roman deſcended from an illuſtrious family, and remarkable for his licentiouſneſs, avarice, and ambition. He committed inceſt with his three ſiſters, and introduced himſelf in women's cloaths into the houſe of J. Cæſar, whilſt Pompeia, Cæſar's wife, of whom he was enamoured, was celebrating the myſteries of Ceres, where no man was permitted to appear He was accuſed for this violation of human and divine laws; but he corrupted his judges, and by that means ſcreened himſelf from juſtice. He deſcended from a patrician into a plebeian family to become a tribune. He was ſuch an enemy to Cato, that he made him go with prætorian power, in an expedition againſt Ptolemy king of Cyprus, that, by the difficulty of the campaign, he might ruin his reputation, and deſtroy his intereſt at Rome during his abſence. Cato, however, by his uncommon ſucceſs, fruſtrated the views of Clodius. He was alſo an inveterate enemy to Cicero; and, by his influence, he baniſhed him from Rome, partly on pretence that he had puniſhed with death, and without trial, the adherents of Catiline. He wreaked his vengeance upon Cicero's houſe, which he burnt, and ſet all his goods to ſale; which, however, to his great mortification, no one offered to buy. In ſpite of Clodius, Cicero was recalled, and all his goods reſtored to him. She was born, together with her brother Caſtor, from one of the eggs which her mother brought forth after her amour with Jupiter, under the form of a ſwan. Clytemneſtra married Agamemnon king of Argos. She had before married Tantalus, ſon of Thyeſtes, according to ſome authors. When Agamemnon went to the Trojan war, he left his couſin Ægyſthus to take care of his wife, of his family, and all his domeſtic affairs. Beſides this, a certain favorite muſician was appointed by Agamemnon, to watch over the conduct of the guardian, as well as that of Clytemneſtra. In the abſence of Agamemnon, Ægyſthus made his court to Clytemneſtra, and publicly lived with her. Her infidelity reached the ears of Agamemnon before the walls of Troy, and he reſolved to take full revenge upon the adulterers at his return. He was prevented from putting his ſchemes into execution; Clytemneſtra, with her adulterer, murdered him at his arrival, as he came out of the bath, or, according to other accounts, as he ſat down at a feaſt prepared to celebrate his happy return. Caſſandra, whom Agamemnon had brought from Troy, ſhared his fate; and Oreſtes would alſo have been deprived of his life, like his father, had not his ſiſter Electra removed him from the reach of Clytemneſtra. After this murder, Clytemneſtra publicly married Ægyſthus, and he aſcended the throne of Argos. Oreſtes, after an abſence of ſeven years, returned to Mycenæ, reſolved to avenge his father's murder. He concealed himſelf in the houſe of his ſiſter Electra, who had been married by the adulterers to a perſon of mean extraction and indigent circumſtances His death was publicly announced; and when Ægyſthus and Clytemneſtra repaired to the temple of Apollo, to return thanks to the god, for the death of the ſurviving ſon of Agamemnon, Oreſtes, who with his faithful friend Pylades, had concealed himſelf in the temple, ruſhed upon the adulterers, and killed them with his own hand. They were buried without the walls of the city, as their remains were deemed unworthy to be laid in the ſepulchre of Agamemnon. Vid. Ægyſthus, Agamemnon, Oreſtes, Electra.—Diod. 4.—*Homer. Colonia Agrippina, a city of Germany on the Rhine, now Cologne.——Equeſtris, a town on the Lake of Geneva, now Noyon.——Morinorum, a town of Gaul, now Terrouen, in Artois.——Norbenſis, a town of Spain, now Alcantara.——Trajana, or Ulpia, a town of Germany, now Kellen, near Cleves.——Valentia, a town of Spain, which now bears the ſame name.

Colōnos, an eminence near Athens, where Œdipus retired during his baniſhment, from which circumſtance Sophocles has given the title of Œdipus Coloneus to one of his tragedies.

Colŏphon, a town of Ionia, at a ſmall diſtance from the ſea, firſt built by Mopſus the ſon of Manto, and colonized by the ſons of Codrus. It was the native country of Mimnermus, Nicander, and Xenophanes, and one of the cities which diſputed for the honor of having given birth to Homer. Apollo had a temple there. Strab. 14.—Pauſ. 7, c. 3.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 54.—Cic. pro Arch. Poet. 8.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 8.

Colosse & Colossis, a large town of Phrygia, near Laodicea, of which the government was democratical, and the firſt ruler called archon. One of the firſt chriſtian churches was eſtabliſhed there, and one of St. Paul's epiſtles was addreſſed to it. Plin. 21, c. 9.

Colossus, a celebrated brazen image at Rhodes, which paſſed for one of the ſeven wonders of the world. Its feet were upon the two moles, which formed the entrance of the harbour, and ſhips paſſed full ſail between its legs. It was 70 cubits, or 105 feet high, and every thing in equal proportion, and few could claſp round its thumb. It was the work of Chares, the diſciple of Lyſippus, and the artiſt was 12 years in making it. It was begun 300 years before Chriſt; and after it had remained unhurt during 56 or 88 years, it was partly demoliſhed by an earthquake, 224 B. C. A winding ſtaircaſe ran to the top, from which could eaſily be diſcerned the ſhores of Syria, and the ſhips that ſailed on the coaſt of Egypt, by the help of glaſſes, which were hung on the neck of the ſtatue. It remained in ruins for the ſpace of 894 years; and the Rhodians, who had received ſeveral large contributions to repair it, divided the money among themſelves, and fruſtrated the expectations of the donors, by ſaying that the oracle of Delphi forbade them to raiſe it up again from its ruins. In the year 672 of the Chriſtian era, it was ſold by the Saracens, who were maſters of the iſland, to a Jewiſh merchant of Edeſſa, who loaded 900 camels with the braſs, whoſe value has been eſtimated at 36,000 pounds Engliſh money.

Colotes, a Teian painter, diſciple of Phidias. Plin. 35, c. 8.——A diſciple of Epictetus.——A follower of Epicurus, accuſed of ignorance by Plut.——A ſculptor, who made a ſtatue of Æſculapius. Strab. 8.

Colpe, a city of Ionia. Plin. 5, c. 29.

COLUMBA, a dove, the ſymbol of Venus among the poets. This bird was ſacred to Venus, and received divine honors in Syria. Doves diſappeared once every year at Eryx, where Venus had a temple, and they were ſaid to accompany the goddeſs to Libya, whither ſhe went to paſs nine days, after which they returned. Doves were ſuppoſed to give oracles in the oaks of the foreſt of Dodona. Tibull. 1, el. 7, v. 17.—Ælian. V. H. 1, c. 15.

COLUBRARIA, now Monte Colubre, a ſmall iſland at the eaſt of Spain, ſuppoſed to be the ſame as Ophiuſa. Plin. 3, c. 5.

COLUMELLA, (L. Jun. Moderatus), a native of Gades, who wrote twelve books on agriculture, of which, the tenth, on gardening, is in verſe. The ſtyle is elegant, and the work diſplays the genius of a naturaliſt, and the labors of an accurate obſerver. The beſt edition of Columella is that of Geſner, 2 vols. 4to. Lipſ. 1735, and reprinted there 1772.

COLUMNÆ HERCŬLIS, a name given to two mountains on the extremeſt parts of Spain and Africa, at the entrance into the Mediterranean. They were called Calpe and Abyla, the former on the coaſt of Spain, and the latter on the ſide of Africa, at the diſtance of only 18 miles. They are reckoned the boundaries of the labors of Hercules, and they were ſuppoſed to have been joined, till the hero ſeparated them, and opened a communication between the Mediterranean and Atlantic ſeas.——Protei, the boundaries of Egypt, or the extent of the kingdom of Proteus. Alexandria was ſuppoſed to be built near them, though Homer places them in the iſland Pharos. Odyſ. 4, v. 351.—Virg. Æn. 11, v. 262.

COLŪTHUS, a native of Lycopolis in Egypt, who wrote a poem on the rape of Helen, in imitation of Homer. The compoſition remained long unknown, till it was diſcovered at Lycopolis in the 15th century, by the learned cardinal Beſſarion. Coluthus was, as ſome ſuppoſe, a contemporary of Tryphiodorus.

COLYTTUS, a tribe in Athens.

COMAGĒNA, a part of Syria above Cilicia, extending, on the eaſt, as far as the Euphrates. Its chief town was called Samoſata. Strab. 11 & 17.

COMĀNA (æ, & orum), a town of Pontus. Hiſt. Alex. 34.——Another in Cappadocia, famous for a temple of Bellona, where there were above 6000 miniſters of both ſexes. The chief prieſt among them was very powerful, and knew no ſuperior but the king of the country. This high office was generally conferred upon one of the royal family. Hirt. Alex. 66.—Flacc. 7, v. 636.—Strab. 12.

COMĀNIA, a country of Aſia.

COMAREA, the ancient name of Cape Comorin in India.

COMĂRI, a people of Aſia, Mela. 1, c. 2.

COMĂRUS, a port in the bay of Ambracia near Nicopolis.

COMASTUS, a place of Perſia.

COMBABUS, a favorite of Stratonice, wife of Antiochus.

COMBE, a daughter of the Ophius, who firſt invented a brazen ſuit of armour. She was changed into a bird, and eſcaped from her children, who had conſpired to murder her. Ovid. Met. 7. v. 382.

COMBI or OMBI, a city of Egypt on the Nile. Juv. 15, v. 35.

COMBRĒA, a town near Pallene. Herodot. 7, c. 123.

COMBUTIS, a general under Brennus. Pauſ. 10, c. 22.

COMĒTES, the father of Aſterion, and one of the Argonauts. Flacc. 1, v. 356.—One of the Centaurs, killed at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 284.——A man killed at the chace of the Calydonian boar. Pauſ. 8, c. 45.——One of the Magi, intimate with Cambyſes king of Perſia. Juſtin. 1, c. 9.——An adulterer of Ægiale.——A ſon of Oreſtes.

COMETHO, a daughter of Pterilaus, who deprived her father of a golden hair in his head, upon which depended his fate. She was put to death by Amphitryon for her perfidy. Apollod. 2, c. 4.

Q. COMINIUS, a Roman knight, who wrote ſome illiberal verſes againſt Tiberius. Tacit. 4, Ann. c. 31.

COMITIA, (orum), an aſſembly of the Roman people. The word is derived from Comitium, the place where they were convened, quaſi a cum eundo. The Comitium was a large hall, which was left uncovered at the top, in the firſt ages of the republic; ſo that the aſſembly was often diſſolved in rainy weather. The Comitia were called, ſome conſularia, for the election of the conſuls; others prætoria, for the election of prætors, &c. Theſe aſſemblies were more generally known by the name of Comitia, Curiata, Centuriata, and Tributa. The Curiata was when the people gave their votes by curiæ. The Centuriata were not convened in later times. (Vid. Centuria.) Another aſſembly was called Comitia tributa, where the votes were received from the whole tribes together. At firſt the Roman people were divided only into three tribes; but as their numbers increaſed, the tribes were at laſt ſwelled to 35. The object of theſe aſſemblies was the electing of magiſtrates and all the public officers of ſtate. They could be diſſolved by one of the tribunes, bunes, if he differed in opinion from the reſt of his colleagues. If one among the people was taken with the falling ſickneſs, the whole aſſembly was immediately diſſolved, whence that diſeaſe is called morbus comitalis. After the cuſtom of giving their votes vivâ voce had been aboliſhed, every one of the aſſembly, in the enacting of a law, was preſented with two ballots, on one of which were the letters U. R. that is uti rogas, be it as it is required; on the other was an A. that is antiquo, which bears the ſame meaning as antiquam volo, I forbid it, the old law is more preferable. If the number of ballots with U. R. was ſuperior to the A's, the law was approved conſtitutionally; if not, it was rejected. Only the chief magiſtrates, and ſometimes the pontifices, had the privilege of convening theſe aſſemblies. There were only theſe eight of the magiſtrates who had the power of propoſing a law, the conſuls, the dictator, the prætor, the interrex, the decemvirs, the military tribunes, the kings, and the triumvirs. Theſe were called majores magiſtratus; to whom one of the minores magiſtratus was added, the tribune of the people.

Comius, a man appointed king over the Attrebates, by J. Cæſar, for his ſervices. Cæſ. bell. G. 4, c. 21.

Commagēne. Vid. Comagena.

Commŏdus, (L. Aurelius Antoninus) ſon of M. Antoninus, ſucceeded his father in the Roman empire. He was naturally cruel, and fond of indulging his licentious propenſities; and regardleſs of the inſtructions of philoſophers, and of the decencies of nature, he corrupted his own ſiſters, and kept 300 women, and as many boys, for his illicit pleaſures. Deſirous to be called Hercules, like that hero, he adorned his ſhoulders with a lion's ſkin, and armed his hand with a knotted club. He ſhowed himſelf naked in public, and fought with the gladiators, and boaſted of his dexterity in killing the wild beaſts in the amphitheatre. He required divine honors from the ſenate, and they were granted. He was wont to put ſuch an immenſe quantity of gold duſt in his hair, that when he appeared bare-headed in the ſunſhine, his head glittered as if ſurrounded with ſun-beams. Martia, one of his concubines, whoſe death he had prepared, poiſoned him; but as the poiſon did not quickly operate, he was ſtrangled by a wreſtler. He died in the 31ſt year of his age, and the 13th of his reign, A. D. 192. It has been obſerved, that he never truſted himſelf to a barber, but always burnt his beard, in imitation of the tyrant Dionyſius. Herodian.

Commoris, a village of Cilicia. Cic. Fam. 15, ep. 4.

Comon, a general of Meſſenia. Pauſ 4, c. 26.

Compĭtālia, feſtivals celebrated by the Romans the 12th of January and the 6th of March, in the croſs ways, in honor of the houſehold gods called Lares. Tarquin the Proud firſt inſtituted them, on account of an oracle which ordered him to offer heads to the Lares. He ſacrificed to them human victims; but J. Brutus, after the expulſion of the Tarquins, thought it ſufficient to offer them only poppy heads, and men of ſtraw. The ſlaves were generally the miniſters, and, during the celebration, they enjoyed their freedom. Varro. de L. L. 5, c. 3.—Ovid. Faſt. 5, v. 140.—Dionyſ. Hal. 4.

Compsa, now Conſa, a town of the Hirpini in Italy, at the eaſt of Veſuvius.

Compsatus, a river of Thrace, falling into the lake Biſtonis. Herodot. 7, c. 109.

Compusa, a town of Bithynia.

Comum, now Como, a town at the north of Inſubria, at the bottom of the lake Como, in the modern duchy of Milan. It was afterwards called Novo Comum by J. Cæſar, who tranſplanted a colony there, though it reſumed its ancient name. It was the birth place of the younger Pliny. Plin. 3, c. 18. —Liv. 33, c. 36 & 37.—Suet. in Jul. 28.—Plin. 1, ep. 3.—Cic. Fam. 13, ep. 35.

Comus, the god of revelry, feaſting, and nocturnal entertainments. During his feſtivals, men and women exchanged each other's dreſs. He was repreſented as a young and drunken man, with a garland of flowers on his head, and a torch in his hand, which ſeemed falling. He is more generally ſeen ſleeping upon his legs, and turning himſelf when the heat of the falling torch ſcorched his ſide. Philoſtrat. 2, Icon.—Plut. Queſt. Rom.

Concāni, a people of Spain, who lived chiefly on milk mixed with horſe's blood. Their chief town, Concana, is now called Santilana, or Cangas de onis. Virg. G. 3, v. 463.—Sil. 3, v. 361.—Horat. 3, od. 4, v. 34.

Concerdia, a town belonging to Venice in Italy.

Concordia, the goddeſs of peace and concord at Rome, to whom Camillus firſt raiſed a temple in the capitol, where the magiſtrates often aſſembled for the tranſaction of public buſineſs. She had, beſides this, other temples and ſtatues, and was addreſſed to promote the peace and union of families and citizens. Plut. in Camil.—Plin. 33, c. 1.—Cic. pro Domo.

Condate, a town of Gaul, now Rennes (Rhedonum urbs) in Britany.

Condalus, an avaricious officer, &c. Ariſtot. Polit.

CONDIVICNUM, a town of Gaul, now Nantes in Britany.

CONETODŪNUS & COTUATUS, two deſperate Gauls, who raiſed their countrymen againſt Rome, &c. Cæſ. bell. G. 7, c. 3.

CONFLUENTES, a town at the confluence of the Moſelle and Rhine, now Coblentz.

CONFUCIUS, a Chineſe philoſopher, as much honored among his countrymen as a monarch. He died about 479 years B. C.

CONGĒDUS, a river of Spain. Martial. 1, ep. 50, v. 9.

CONIACI, a people of Spain, at the head of the Iberus. Strab. 3.

CONIMBRICA, a town of Spain, now Coimbra, of Portugal.

CONISALTUS, a god worſhipped at Athens, with the ſame ceremonies as Priapus at Lampſacus. Strab. 3.

CONISCI, a people of Spain.

CONNĪDAS, the preceptor of Theſeus, in whoſe honor the Athenians inſtituted a feſtival called Connideia. It was then uſual to ſacrifice to him a ram. Plut. in Theſ.

CONON, a famous general of Athens, ſon of Timotheus. He was made governor of all the iſlands of the Athenians, and was defeated in a naval battle by Lyſander, near the Ægoſpotamos. He retired in voluntary baniſhment to Evagoras king of Cyprus, and afterwards to Artaxerxes king of Perſia, by whoſe aſſiſtance he freed his country from ſlavery. He defeated the Spartans near Cnidos, in an engagement where Piſander, the enemy's admiral, was killed. By his means the Athenians fortified their city with a ſtrong wall, and attempted to recover Ionia and Æolia. He was perfidiouſly betrayed by a Perſian, and died in priſon, B. C. 393. C. Nep. in vitâ.—Plut. in Lyſ. & Artax.—Iſocrates.——A Greek aſtronomer of Samos, who, to gain the favor of Ptolemy Evergetes, publicly declared that the queen's locks, which had been dedicated in the temple of Venus, and had ſince diſappeared, were become a conſtellation. He was intimate with Archimedes, and floriſhed 247 B. C. Catull. 67.—Virg. Ecl. 3, v. 40.——A Grecian mythologiſt, in the age of Julius Cæſar, who wrote a book which contained 40 fables, ſtill extant.——There was a treatiſe written on Italy by a man of the ſame name.

CONSENTES, the name which the Romans gave to the twelve ſuperior gods, the Dii majorum gentium. The word ſignifies as much as conſentientes, that is, who conſented to the deliberations of Jupiter's council. They were twelve in number, whoſe names Ennius has briefly expreſſed in theſe lines:

Juno, Veſta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars, Mercurius, Jovi, Neptunus, Vulcanus, Apollo.

CONSILINUM, a town of Italy. Mela. 2, c. 4.

CONSTANS, a ſon of Conſtantine. Vid. Conſtantinus.

CONSTANTIA, a grand-daughter of the great Conſtantine, who married the emperor Gratian.

CONSTANTĪNA, a princeſs, wife of the emperor Gallus.——Another.

CONSTANTINOPŎLIS, (Stamboul) formerly Byzantium, the capital of Thrace, a noble and magnificent city, built by Conſtantine the Great, and ſolemnly dedicated A. D. 330. It was the capital of the eaſtern Roman empire, and was called, after its foundation, Roma nova, on account of its greatneſs, which ſeemed to rival Rome. The beauty of its ſituation, with all its conveniences, have been the admiration of every age. Conſtantinople became long the aſylum of ſcience and of learned men, but upon its conqueſt by Mahomet the II, 28th of May 1453, the profeſſors retired from the barbarity of their victors, and found in Italy the protection which their learning deſerved. This migration was highly favorable to the cauſe of ſcience, and whilſt the Pope, the head of the houſe of Medicis, and the emperor, munificently ſupported the fugitives, other princes imitated their example, and equally contributed to the revival of literature in Europe.

CONSTANTĪNUS, ſirnamed the Great, from the greatneſs of his exploits, was ſon of Conſtantius. As ſoon as he became independent, he aſſumed the title of Auguſtus, and made war againſt Licinius, his brother-in-law, and colleague on the throne, becauſe he was cruel and ambitious. He conquered him, and obliged him to lay aſide the imperial power. It is ſaid, that as he was going to fight againſt Maxentius, one of his rivals, he ſaw a croſs in the ſky, with this inſcription, ἐν τούτῳ νίκα in hoc vince. From this circumſtance cumſtance he became a convert to chriſtianity, and obtained an eaſy victory, ever after adopting a croſs or labarum as his ſtandard. After the death of Diocletian, Maximian, Maxentius, Maximinus, and Lucinius, who had reigned together, though in a ſubordinate manner, Conſtantine became ſole emperor, and began to reform the ſtate. He founded a city in a moſt eligible ſituation, where old Byzantium formerly ſtood, and called it by his own name, Conſtantinopolis. Thither he tranſported part of the Roman ſenate; and by keeping his court there, he made it the rival of Rome, in population and magnificence. From that time the two imperial cities began to look upon each other with an eye of envy; and ſoon after the age of Conſtantine, a ſeparation was made of the two empires, and Rome was called the capital of the weſtern, and Conſtantinopolis was called the capital of the eaſtern, dominions of Rome. The emperor has been diſtinguiſhed for perſonal courage, and praiſed for the protection he extended to the chriſtians. He at firſt perſecuted the Arians, but afterwards inclined to their opinions. His murder of his ſon Criſpus has been deſervedly cenſured. By removing the Roman legions from the garriſons on the rivers, he opened an eaſy paſſage to the barbarians, and rendered his ſoldiers unwarlike. He defeated 100,000 Goths, and received into his territories 300,000 Sarmatians, who had been baniſhed by their ſlaves, and allowed them land to cultivate. Conſtantine was learned, and preached, as well as compoſed, many ſermons, one of which remains. He died A. D. 337, after a reign of 31 years of the greateſt glory and ſucceſs. He left three ſons, Conſtantinus, Conſtans, and Conſtantius, among whom he divided his empire. The firſt, who had Gaul, Spain, and Britain for his portion, was conquered by the armies of his brother Conſtans, and killed in the 25th year of his age, A. D. 340. Magnentius, the governor of the provinces of Rhætia, murdered Conſtans in his bed, after a reign of 13 years, over Italy, Africa, and Illyricum; and Conſtantius, the only ſurviving brother, now become the ſole emperor, A. D. 353, puniſhed his brother's murderer, and gave way to cruelty and oppreſſion. He viſited Rome, where he diſplayed a triumph, and died in his march againſt Julian, who had been proclaimed independent emperor by his ſoldiers.——The name of Conſtantine was very common to the emperors of the eaſt, in a later period. ——A private ſoldier in Britain, raiſed on account of his name to the imperial dignity. ——A general of Beliſarius.

Constantius Chlorus, ſon of Eutropius, and father of the great Conſtantine, merited the title of Cæſar, which he obtained, by his victories in Britain and Germany. He became the colleague of Galerius, on the abdication of Diocletian; and after bearing the character of a humane and benevolent prince, he died at York, and made his ſon his ſucceſſor, A. D. 306.——The ſecond ſon of Conſtantine the Great. Vid. Conſtantinus.——The father of Julian and Gallus, was ſon of Conſtantius by Theodora, and died A. D. 337.——A Roman general of Nyſſa, who married Placidia, the ſiſter of Honorius, and was proclaimed emperor, an honor he enjoyed only ſeven months. He died univerſally regretted, 421 A. D. and was ſucceeded by his ſon Valentinian in the weſt.——One of the ſervants of Attila.

Consuāles Ludi or Consuālia, feſtivals at Rome in honor of Conſus, the god of counſel, whoſe altar Romulus diſcovered under the ground. This altar was always covered except at the feſtival, when a mule was ſacrificed, and games and horſe-races exhibited in honor of Neptune. It was during theſe feſtivals that Romulus carried away the Sabine women who had aſſembled to be ſpectators of the games. They were firſt inſtituted by Romulus. Some ſay that Romulus only regulated and re-inſtituted them after they had been before eſtabliſhed by Evander. During the celebration, which happened about the middle of Auguſt, the horſes were exempted from all labors, and were led through the ſtreets adorned with garlands and flowers.

Consul, a magiſtrate at Rome, with regal authority for the ſpace of one year. There were two conſuls, a conſulendo, annually choſen in the Campus Martius. The two firſt conſuls were L. Jun. Brutus, and L. Tarquinius Collatinus, choſen A. U. C. 244, after the expulſion of the Tarquins. In the firſt ages of the republic, the two conſuls were always choſen from Patrician families, or noblemen; but the people obtained the privilege A. U. C. 388, of electing one of the conſuls from their own body; and ſometimes both were plebeians. The firſt conſul among the plebeians was L. Sextius. It was required that every candidate for the conſulſhip ſhould be 43 years of age, called legitimum tempus. He was always to appear at the election as a private man, without a retinue; and it was requiſite, before he canvaſſed for the office, to have diſcharged the inferior functions of quæſtor, edile, and prætor. Sometimes theſe qualifications were diſregarded. Val. Corvinus was made a conſul in his 23d year, and Scipio in his 24th. Young Marius, Pompey, and Auguſtus, were alſo under the proper age when they were inveſted with the office, and Pompey had never been quæſtor or prætor. The power of the consuls was unbounded, and they knew no superior but the gods and the laws; but after the expiration of their office, their conduct was minutely scrutinized by the people, and misbehaviour was often punished by the laws. The badge of their office was the prætexta, a robe fringed with purple, afterwards exchanged for the toga picta or palmata. They were preceded by 12 lictors, carrying the fasces or bundle of sticks, in the middle of which appeared an ax. The ax, as being the characteristic rather of tyranny than of freedom, was taken away from the fasces by Valerius Poplicola, but it was restored by his successor. The consuls took it by turns, monthly, to be preceded by the lictors while at Rome, lest the appearance of two persons with the badges of royal authority, should raise apprehensions in the multitude. While one appeared publicly in state, only a crier walked before the other, and the lictors followed behind without the fasces. Their authority was equal; yet the Valerian law gave the right of priority to the older, and the Julian law to him who had the most children, and he was generally called consul major or prior. As their power was absolute, they presided over the senate, and could convene and dismiss it at pleasure. The senators were their counsellors; and among the Romans, the manner of reckoning their years was by the name of the consuls, and by M. Tull. Cicerone & L. Antonio Consulibus, for instance, the year of Rome 689 was always understood. This custom lasted from the year of Rome 244 till the year 1294, or 541st year of the christian era, when the consular office was totally suppressed by Justinian. In public assemblies the consuls sat in ivory chairs, and held in their hands an ivory wand, called scipio eburneus, which had an eagle on its top, as a sign of dignity and power. When they had drawn by lot the provinces over which they were to preside during their consulship, they went to the capitol to offer their prayers to the gods, and entreat them to protect the republic: after this they departed from the city, arrayed in their military dress, and preceded by the lictors. Sometimes the provinces were assigned them, without drawing by lot, by the will and appointment of the senators. At their departure, they were provided by the state with whatever was requisite during their expedition. In their provinces they were both attended by the 12 lictors, and equally invested with legal authority. They were not permitted to return to Rome without the special command of the senate, and they always remained in the province till the arrival of their successor. At their return they harangued the people, and solemnly protested that they had done nothing against the laws or interest of their country, but had faithfully and diligently endeavoured to promote the greatness and welfare of the state. No man could be consul two following years; yet this institution was sometimes broken, and we find Marius re-elected consul, after the expiration of his office, during the Cimbrian war. The office of consul, so dignified during the times of the commonwealth, became a mere title under the emperors, and retained nothing of its authority but the useless ensigns of original dignity. Even the office of consul, which was originally annual, was reduced to two or three months by J. Cæsar; but they who were admitted on the first of January denominated the year, and were called ordinarii. Their successors, during the year, were distinguished by the name of suffecti. Tiberius and Claudius abridged the time of the consulship, and the emperor Commodus made no less than 25 consuls in one year. Constantine the Great renewed the original institution, and permitted them to be a whole year in office.———Here is annexed a list of the consuls from the establishment of the consular power to the battle of Actium, in which it may be said that the authority of the consuls was totally extinguished.

The two first consuls, chosen about the middle of June, A. U. C. 244, were L. Jun. Brutus, and L. Tarq. Collatinus. Collatinus retired from Rome as being of the family of the Tarquins, and Pub. Valerius was chosen in his room. When Brutus was killed in battle, Sp. Lucretius was elected to succeed him; and after the death of Lucretius, Marcus Horatius was chosen for the rest of the year with Valerius Publicola. The first consulship lasted about 16 months, during which the Romans fought against the Tarquins, and the capitol was dedicated.

Corbŭlo, (Domitius) a prefect of Belgium, who, when governor of Syria, routed the Parthians, deſtroyed Artaxata, and made Tigranes king of Armenia. Nero, jealous of his virtues, ordered him to be murdered; and Corbulo hearing this, fell upon his ſword, exclaiming, I have well deſerved this! A. D. 66. His name was given to a place (Monumentum) in Germany, which ſome ſuppoſe to be modern Groningen. Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 18.

Corcȳra, an iſland in the Ionian ſea, about 12 miles from Buthrotum, on the coaſt of Epirus; famous for the ſhipwreck of Ulyſſes, and the gardens of Alcinous. It has been ſucceſſively called Drepane, Scheria, Scheria, and Phæacia, and now bears the name of Corfu. Some Corinthians, with Cherſicrates at their head, came to ſettle there, when baniſhed from their country, 703 years before the chriſtian era. A colony of Colchis had ſettled there 1349 years before Chriſt. The war which was carried on by the Athenians, againſt the Corcyreans, and was called Corcyrean, became but a preparation for the Peloponneſian war. The people of Corcyra were once ſo hated by the Cretans, that ſuch as were found on the iſland of Crete were always put to death. Ovid. Ib. 512.—*Homer. CORĔSUS, a prieſt of Bacchus at Calydon in Bœotia, who was deeply enamoured of the nymph Callirhoe, who treated him with diſdain. He complained to Bacchus, who viſited the country with a peſtilence. The Calydonians were directed by the oracle, to appeaſe the god by ſacrificing Callirhoe on his altar. The nymph was led to the altar, and Coreſus, who was to ſacrifice her, forgot his reſentment, and ſtabbed himſelf. Callirhoe, conſcious of her ingratitude to the love of Coreſus, killed herſelf on the brink of a fountain, which afterwards bore her name. Pauſ. 7, c. 21.

CORIA, a ſirname of Minerva, among the Arcadians. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 23.

CORINNA, a celebrated woman of Thebes, diſciple to Myrtis. Her father's name was Archelodorus. It is ſaid, that ſhe obtained five times a poetical prize, in which Pindar was her competitor; but it muſt be acknowledged, that her beauty greatly contributed to defeat her rivals. Some few of her verſes remain. Propert. 2, el. 3.—Pauſ. 9, c. 22.——A woman of Theſpis, celebrated for her beauty.—Ovid's miſtreſs was alſo called Corinna. Amor. 2, el. 6.

CORINNUS, an ancient poet in the time of the Trojan war, on which he wrote a poem. Homer, as ſome ſuppoſe, took his ſubject from the poem of Corinnus.

CORINTHIĂCUS SINUS, is now called Gulph of Lepanto.

CORINTHUS, an ancient city of Greece, now called Corito, ſituated on the middle of the Iſthmus of Corinth, at the diſtance of about 60 ſtadia on either ſide from the ſea. It was firſt founded by Siſyphus ſon of Æolus, A. M. 2616, and received its name from Corinthus the ſon of Pelops. Its original name was Ephyre; and it is called Bimaris, becauſe ſituate between the Saronicus Sinus and Criſſeus Sinus. The inhabitants were once very powerful, and had great influence among the Grecian ſtates. They colonized Syracuſe in Sicily, and delivered it from the tyranny of its oppreſſors, by the means of Timoleon. Corinth was totally deſtroyed by L. Mummius, the Roman conſul, and burnt to the ground, 146 B. C. The riches which the Romans found there, were immenſe. During the conflagration, all the metals which were in the city melted and mixed together, and formed that valuable compoſition of metals, which has ſince been known by the name of Corinthium Æs. This however, appears improbable, eſpecially when it is remembered that the artiſts of Corinth made a mixture of copper with ſmall quantities of gold and ſilver, and ſo brilliant was the compoſition, that the appellation of Corinthian braſs afterwards ſtamped an extraordinary value on pieces of inferior worth. There was there a famous temple of Venus, where laſcivious women reſorted, and ſold their pleaſures ſo dear, that many of their lovers were reduced to poverty; whence the proverb of Non cuivis homini contingit adire Corinthum, to ſhew that all voluptuous indulgences are attended with much expence. J. Cæſar planted a colony at Corinth, and endeavoured to raiſe it from its ruins, and reſtore it to its former grandeur. The government of Corinth was monarchical, till 779 years B. C. when officers called Prytanes were inſtituted. The war which has received the name of Corinthian war, becauſe the battles were fought in the neighbourhood of Corinth, was begun B. C. 395, by the combination of the Athenians, Thebans, Corinthians, and Argives, againſt Lacedæmon. Piſander and Ageſilaus diſtinguiſhed themſelves in that war; the former, on the firſt year of hoſtilities, was defeated with the Lacedæmonian fleet, by Conon, near Cnidus; while a few days after, Ageſilaus slaughtered 10,000 of the enemy. The most famous battles were fought at Coronea and Leuctra; but Agesilaus refused to besiege Corinth, lamenting that the Greeks, instead of destroying one another, did not turn their arms against the Persian power. Martial. 9, ep. 58.—Sueton. Tusc. 4, c. 14. in Verr. 4, c. 44.——An actor at Rome. Juv. 8, v. 197.

CORIŎLĀNUS, the surname of C. Martius, from his victory over Corioli, where, from a private soldier, he gained the amplest honors. When master of the place, he accepted as the only reward, the surname of Coriolanus, a horse, and prisoners, and his ancient host, to whom he immediately gave his liberty. After a number of military exploits, and many services to his country, he was refused the consulship by the people, when his fears had for a while influenced them in his favor. This raised his resentment; and when the Romans had received a present of corn from Gelo king of Sicily, Coriolanus insisted that it should be sold for money, and not be given gratis. Upon this, the tribunes raised the people against him for his imprudent advice, and even wished him to be put to death. This rigorous sentence was stopped by the influence of the senators, and Coriolanus submitted to a trial. He was banished by a majority of three tribes, and he immediately retired among the Volsci, to Tullus Aufidius, his greatest enemy, from whom he met a most friendly reception. He advised him to make war against Rome, and he marched at the head of the Volsci as general. The approach of Coriolanus greatly alarmed the Romans, who sent him several embassies to reconcile him to his country, and to solicit his return. He was deaf to all proposals, and bade them prepare for war. He pitched his camp only at the distance of five miles from the city; and his enmity against his country would have been fatal, had not his mother Volumnia, and his wife Vergilia been prevailed upon by the Roman matrons, to go and appease his resentment. The meeting of Coriolanus with his family was tender and affecting. He remained long inexorable; but at last the tears and entreaties of a mother and a wife prevailed over the stern and obstinate resolutions of an enemy, and Coriolanus marched the Volsci from the neighbourhood of Rome. To shew their sense of Volumnia's merit and patriotism, the Romans dedicated a temple to Female Fortune. The behaviour of Coriolanus, however, displeased the Volsci. He was summoned to appear before the people of Antium; but the clamors which his enemies raised, were so prevalent, that he was murdered on the place appointed for his trial, B. C. 488. His body was honored with a magnificent funeral by the Volsci, and the Roman matrons put on mourning for his loss. Some historians say that he died in exile, in an advanced old age. Plut. in vitâ.—Flor. 2, c. 22.

CORIŎLI & CORIOLLA, a town of Latium on the borders of the Volsci, taken by the Romans under Coriolanus. Plin. 3, c. 5.—Plut.—Liv. 2, c. 33.

CORISSUS, a town of Ionia.

CORMASA, a town of Pamphylia. Liv. 38, c. 15.

CORNĒLIA LEX, de Civitate, was enacted A. U. C. 670, by L. Corn. Sylla. It confirmed the Sulpician law, and required that the citizens of the eight newly elected tribes, should be divided among the 35 ancient tribes.——Another, de Judiciis, A. U. C. 673, by the same. It ordained that the prætor should always observe the same invariable method in judicial proceedings, and that the process should not depend upon his will.——Another, de Sumptibus, by the same. It limited the expences which generally attended funerals.——Another, de Religione, by the same, A. U. C. 677. It restored to the college of priests, the privilege of chusing the priests, which, by the Domitian law, had been lodged in the hands of the people.——Another, de Municipiis, by the same; which revoked all the privileges which had been some time before granted to the several towns that had assisted Marius and Cinna in the civil wars.——Another, de Magistratibus, by the same; which gave the power of bearing honors and being promoted before the legal age, to those who had followed the interest of Sylla, while the sons and partizans of his enemies, who had been proscribed, were deprived of the privilege of standing for any office in the state.——Another, de Magistratibus, by the same, A. U. C. 673. It ordained that no person should exercise the same office within ten years distance, or be invested with two different magistracies in one year.——Another, de Magistratibus, by the same, A. U. C. 673. It divested the tribunes of the privilege of making laws, interfering, holding assemblies, and receiving appeals. All such as had been tribunes were incapable of holding any other office in the state by that law.——Another, de Majestate, Majeſtate, by the ſame, A. U. C. 670. It made it treaſon to ſend an army out of a province, or engage in a war without orders, to influence the ſoldiers to ſpare or ranſom a captive general of the enemy, to pardon the leaders of robbers or pirates, or for the abſence of a Roman citizen, to a foreign court, without previous leave. The puniſhment was, aquæ & ignis interdictio.——Another by the ſame, which gave the power to a man accuſed of murder, either by poiſon, weapons, or falſe accuſations, and the ſetting fire to buildings, to chuſe whether the jury that tried him ſhould give their verdict clam or palam, vivâ voce, or by ballots.——Another by the ſame, which made it aquæ & ignis interdictio to ſuch as were guilty of forgery, concealing and altering of wills, corruption, falſe accuſations, and the debaſing or counterfeiting of the public coin; all ſuch as were acceſſary to this offence, were deemed as guilty as the offender.——Another, de pecuniis repetundis, by which a man convicted of peculation or extortion in the provinces, was condemned to ſuffer the aquæ & ignis interdictio.——Another by the ſame, which gave the power to ſuch as were ſent into the provinces with any government, of retaining their command and appointment, without a renewal of it by the ſenate, as was before obſerved.——Another by the ſame, which ordained that the lands of proſcribed perſons ſhould be common, eſpecially thoſe about Volaterræ and Feſulæ in Etruria, which Sylla divided among his ſoldiers.——Another by C. Cornelius, tribune of the people, A. U. C. 686; which ordained that no perſon ſhould be exempted from any law, according to the general cuſtom, unleſs 200 ſenators were preſent in the ſenate; and no perſon thus exempted, could hinder the bill of his exemption from being carried to the people for their concurrence.——Another by Naſica, A. U. C. 582, to make war againſt Perſeus, ſon of Philip, king of Macedonia, if he did not give proper ſatisfaction to the Roman people.

Cornēlia, a daughter of Cinna, who was the firſt wife of J. Cæſar. She became mother of Julia, Pompey's wife, and was ſo affectionately loved by her huſband, that, at her death, he pronounced a funeral oration over her body. Plut. in Cæſ.——A daughter of Metellus Scipio, who married Pompey, after the death of her huſband P. Craſſus. She has been praiſed for her great virtues. When her huſband left her in the bay of Alexandria, to go to ſhore in a ſmall boat, ſhe ſaw him ſtabbed by Achillas, and heard his dying groans without the poſſibility of aiding him. She attributed all his misfortunes to his connection with her. Plut. in Pomp.——A daughter of Scipio Africanus, who was the mother of Tiberius and Caius Gracchus. She was courted by a king; but ſhe preferred being the wife of a Roman citizen, to that of a monarch. Her virtues have been deſervedly commended, as well as the wholeſome principles ſhe inculcated in her two ſons. When a Campanian lady made once a ſhew of her jewels at Cornelia's houſe, and entreated her to favor her with a ſight of her own, Cornelia produced her two ſons, ſaying, Theſe are the only jewels of which I can boaſt. In her life-time, a ſtatue was raiſed to her, with this inſcription, Cornelia mater Gracchorum. Some of her epiſtles are preſerved. Plut. in Gracch.—Juv. 6, v. 167.—Val. Max. 4, c. 4.—Cic in Brut. 58.——A veſtal virgin, buried alive in Domitian's age, as guilty of incontinence. Sueton. in Dom.

Cornēlii, an illuſtrious family at Rome, of whom the moſt diſtinguiſhed were, Caius Cornelius, a ſoothſayer of Padua, who foretold the beginning and iſſue of the battle of Pharſalia.——Dolabella, a friend and admirer of Cleopatra. He told her that Auguſtus intended to remove her from the monument, where ſhe had retired.——An officer of Sylla, whom J. Cæſar bribed to eſcape the proſcription which threatened his life.——Cethegus, a prieſt, degraded from his office for want of attention.——Cn. a man choſen by Marcellus to be his colleague in the conſulſhip.——Balbus, a man who hindered J. Cæſar from riſing up at the arrival of the ſenators.——Coſſus, a military tribune during the time that there were no conſuls in the republic. He offered to Jupiter, the ſpoils called opima.——Balbus, a man of Gades, intimate with Cicero, by whom he was ably defended when accuſed.——A freed man of Sylla the dictator.——Scipio, a man appointed maſter of the horſe, by Camillus, when dictator.——Gallus, an elegiac poet. Vid. Gallus.——Merula, was made conſul by Auguſtus, in the room of Cinna.——Marcellus, a man killed in Spain, by Galba.——C. Nepos, an hiſtorian. Vid. Nepos.——Merula, a conſul, ſent againſt the Boii in Gaul. He killed 1400 of them. His grandſon followed the intereſt of Sylla; and when Marius entered the city, he killed himſelf, by opening his veins.——Gallus, a man who died in the act of copulation Val. Max. 9, c. 12.——Severus an epic poet in the age of Auguſtus, of great genius. He wrote a poem on mount Ætna, and on the death of Cicero.——Thuſcus, a miſchievous perſon.——Lentulus Cethegus, a conſul.——Aur. Celſus, wrote eight books on medicine, still extant.——Cn. and Publ. Scipio. Vid. Scipio.——Lentulus, a high priest, &c. Liv.—Plut.—Val. Max.—Tacit.—Suet.—Polyb.—C. Nep. &c.

Cornĭculum, a town of Latium. Dionys. Hal.

Cornificius, a poet and general in the age of Augustus, employed to accuse Brutus, &c. His sister Cornificia, was also blessed with a poetical genius. Plut. in Brut.——A lieutenant of J. Cæsar. Id. in Cæs.——A friend of Cicero, and his colleague in the office of augur.

Cornĭger, a surname of Bacchus.

Cornūtus, a stoic philosopher, of Africa, preceptor to Persius the satyrist. He wrote some treatises on philosophy and rhetoric. Pers. 5, v. 36.——A prætor of Rome, in the age of Cicero. Cic. 10, ep. 12——A Roman, saved from the proscription of Marius, by his servants, who hung up a dead man in his room, and said it was their master. Plut. in Mario.

Corœbus, a Phrygian, son of Mygdon and Anaximena. He assisted Priam in the Trojan war, with the hopes of being rewarded with the hand of Cassandra for his services. Cassandra advised him in vain to retire from the war. He was killed by Pencleus. Paus 10, c. 27.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 341, &c.——A courier of Elis, killed by Neoptolemus. He obtained a prize at Olympia, B. C. 776, in the 28th olympiad from the institution of Iphitus; but this year has generally been called the first olympiad. Paus. 5, c. 8.——A hero of Argolis, who killed the serpent sent by Apollo to avenge Argos. His country was afflicted with a plague, and he consulted the oracle of Delphi, which commanded him to build a temple, where a tripod which was given him, should fall from his hand. Paus. 1, v. 43.

Corōna, a town of Messenia. Plin. 4, c. 5.

Coronēa, a town of Bœotia, where, in the first year of the Corinthian war, Agesilaus defeated the allied forces of Athens, Thebes, Corinth, and Argos, B. C. 394 C. Nep. in Ages.—Diod. 12.——A town of Peloponnesus—of Corinth—of Cyprus—of Amphracia—of Phthiotis.

Corōnis, a daughter of Phlegias, loved by Apollo. She became pregnant by her lover, who killed her on account of her criminal partiality to Ischys the Thessalian According to some, Diana killed her, for her infidelity to her brother; and Mercury saved the child from her womb, as she was on the burning pile. Others say, that she brought forth her son, and exposed him near Epidaurus, to avoid her father's resentment; and they farther mention, that Apollo had set a crow to watch her behaviour. The child was preserved, and called Æsculapius; and the mother, after death, received divine honors, and had a statue at Sicyon, in her son's temple, which was never exposed to public view. Paus. 2, c. 26.——The daughter of Coronæus, king of Phocis, changed into a crow by Minerva, when flying before Neptune. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 543.——One of the daughters of Atlas and Pleione.

Coronta, a town of Acarnania. Thucyd. 2, c. 102.

Corōnus, a son of Apollo. Paus. 2, c. 5.——A son of Phoroneus king of the Lapithæ. Diod. 4.

Corrhagium, a town of Macedonia. Liv. 31, c. 27.

Corsi, a people of Sardinia, descended from the Corsicans.

Corsia, a town of Bœotia. Paus. 9, c. 24.

Corsĭca, a mountainous island in the Mediterranean, on the coast of Italy. Its inhabitants were savage, and bore the character of robbers, liars, and atheists, according to Seneca, who was exiled among them. They lived to a great age, and fed on honey, which was produced in great abundance, though bitter in taste, from the number of yew trees and hemlock which grew there. Corsica was in the possession of the Carthaginians, and conquered by the Romans, B. C. 231. The Greeks called it Cyrnos. Strab.—Martial. 9, ep. 27.—Plin. 3, c. 6. l. 7, c. 2.—Ovid. 1, Amor. el. 14, v. 10.—Virg. Ecl. 9, v. 30.

Corsote, a town of Armenia.

Corsūra, an island in the bay of Carthage.

Cortōna, an ancient town of Etruria, called Corytum by Virgil. It was at the mouth of the Thrasymene Lake. Dionys. H. 1, c. 20 & 26.—Liv. 9, c. 37. l. 22, c. 4.

Corvīnus, a name given to M. Valerius, from a crow, which assisted him when he was fighting against a Gaul.——An orator. Paterc. 2, c. 36.——Messala, an eloquent orator, in the Augustan age, distinguished for integrity and patriotism, yet ridiculed for his frequent quotations of Greek in his actions. In his old age, he became so forgetful as not even to remember his own name.——One of this family became so poor, that he was obliged, to maintain himself, to be a mercenary shepherd. Juv. 1, v. 108.

T. Coruncānus, the first plebeian who was made high-priest at Rome.——The family of the Coruncani was famous for the number number of great men which it supplied, for the service and honor of the Roman republic. Cic. pro domo.

Corus, a river of Arabia, falling into the Red sea. Herodot. 3, c. 9.

Corybantes, the priests of Cybele, called also Galli. In the celebration of their festivals, they beat their cymbals, and behaved as if delirious. They first inhabited on mount Ida, and from thence passed into Crete, and secretly brought up Jupiter. Some suppose that they receive their name from Corybas son of Jasus and Cybele, who first introduced the rites of his mother into Phrygia. There was a festival at Cnossus in Crete, called Corybantica, in commemoration of the Corybantes, who there educated Jupiter. Paus. 8, c. 37.—Diod. 5.—Horat. 1. od. 16.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 617, l. 10, v. 250.

Corybas, a son of Jasus and Cybele. Diod. 5.——A painter, disciple to Nicomachus. Plin. 35, c. 11.

Corybassa, a city of Mysia.

Corybus, a promontory of Crete.

Corycia, a nymph, mother of Lycorus, by Apollo. Paus. 10, c. 6.

Corycides, the nymphs who inhabited the foot of Parnassus. This name is often applied to the muses. Ovid. Met. v. 320.

Corycius, an old man of Tarentum, whose time was happily employed in taking care of his bees. He is represented by Virgil. G. 4, v. 127, &c. as a contented old man, whose assiduity and diligence are exemplary. Some suppose that the word Corycius, implies not a person of that name, but a native of Corycus, who had settled in Italy.

Corycus, now Curco, a lofty mountain of Cilicia, with a town of the same name, and also a cave, with a grove which produced excellent saffron. Horat. 2, Sat. 4, v. 68.—Lucan. 9, v. 809.—Plin. 5, c. 27.—Cic. ad Fam. 12. ep. 13.—Strab. 14.——Another of Ionia, long the famous retreat of robbers.——Another at the foot of Parnassus, sacred to the muses.

Corydon, a fictitious name of a shepherd, often occurring in the pastorals of Theocritus and Virgil.

Coryla & Coryleum, a village of Paphlagonia.

Corynа, a town of Ionia. Mela. 1, c. 17.

Corymbifer, a surname of Bacchus, from his wearing a crown of corymbi, certain berries that grow on the ivy. Ovid. 1. Fast. v. 393.

Coryneta & Corynetes, a famous robber, son of Vulcan, killed by Theseus. Plut. in Thes.

COTYTTO, the goddeſs of all debauchery, whoſe feſtivals, called Cottytia, were celebrated by the Athenians, Corinthians, Thracians, &c. during the night. Her prieſts were called Baptæ, and nothing but debauchery and wantonneſs prevailed at the celebration. A feſtival of the ſame name was obſerved in Sicily, where the votaries of the goddeſs carried about boughs hung with cakes and fruit, which it was lawful for any perſon to pluck off. It was a capital puniſhment to reveal whatever was ſeen or done at theſe ſacred feſtivals, and it coſt Eupolis his life for an unſeaſonable reflection upon them. The goddeſs Cotytto is ſuppoſed to be the ſame as Proſerpine. Horat. epod. 17, v. 58.—Juv. 2, v. 91.

L. CRASSITIUS, a man who opened a ſchool at Rome. Suet. de Gram. 18.

CRASSUS, a grandfather of Craſſus the Rich, who never laughed. Plin. 7, c. 19.——Publ. Licinius, a Roman high-prieſt, about 131 years, B. C. who went into Aſia with an army againſt Ariſtonicus, where he was killed, and buried at Smyrna.——M. Licinius, a celebrated Roman, ſirnamed Rich, on account of his opulence. At firſt he was very circumſcribed in his circumſtances; but, by educating ſlaves, and ſelling them at a high price, he ſoon enriched himſelf. The cruelties of Cinna obliged him to leave Rome; and he retired to Spain, where he remained concealed for eight months. After Cinna's death he paſſed into Africa, and thence to Italy, where he ſerved Sylla, and ingratiated himſelf in his favor. When the gladiators, with Spartacus at their head, had ſpread an univerſal alarm in Italy, and defeated ſome of the Roman generals, Craſſus was ſent againſt them. A battle was fought, in which Craſſus ſlaughtered 12,000 of the ſlaves, and by this deciſive blow, ſoon put an end to the war, and was honored with an ovatio at his return. He was ſoon after made conſul with Pompey; and in this high office he diſplayed his opulence, by entertaining the populace at 10,000 tables. He was afterwards cenſor, and formed the firſt triumvirate with Pompey and Cæſar. As his love of riches was more predominant than that of glory, Craſſus never imitated the ambitious conduct of his colleagues, but was ſatisfied with the province of Syria, which ſeemed to promiſe an inexhauſtible ſource of wealth. With hopes of enlarging his poſſeſſions, he ſet off from Rome, though the omens proved unfavorable, and every thing ſeemed to threaten his ruin. He croſſed the Euphrates, and, forgetful of the rich cities of Babylon and Seleucia, he haſtened to make himſelf maſter of Parthia. He was betrayed in his march by the delay of Artavaſdes, king of Armenia, and the perfidy of Ariamnes. He was met in a large plain by Surena, the general of the forces of Orodes, king of Parthia; and a battle was fought, in which which 20,000 Romans were killed, and 10,000 taken priſoners. The darkneſs of the night favored the eſcape of the reſt, and Craſſus, forced by the mutiny and turbulence of his ſoldiers, and the treachery of his guides, truſted himſelf to the general of the enemy, on pretence of propoſing terms of accommodation, and he was put to death, B. C. 53. His head was cut off, and ſent to Orodes, who poured melted lead down his throat, and inſulted his misfortunes. The firmneſs with which Craſſus received the news of his ſon's death, who periſhed in that expedition, has been deſervedly commended; and the words that he uttered when he ſurrendered himſelf into the hands of Surena, equally claim our admiration. He was wont often to ſay, that no man ought to be accounted rich, if he could not maintain an army. Though he has been called avaricious, yet he ſhowed himſelf always ready to lend money to his friends without intereſt. He was fond of philoſophy, and his knowledge of hiſtory was great and extenſive. Plutarch has written his life. Flor. 3, c. 11.——Publius, the ſon of the rich Craſſus, went into Parthia with his father. When he ſaw himſelf ſurrounded by the enemy, and without any hope of eſcape, he ordered one of his men to run him through. His head was cut off, and ſhowed with inſolence to his father by the Parthians. Plut. in Craſſ.——L. Licinius, a celebrated Roman orator, commended by Cicero, and introduced in his book de oratore as the principal ſpeaker.——A ſon of Craſſus the rich, killed in the civil wars, after Cæſar's death.

Crastīnus, a man in Cæſar's army, killed at the battle of Pharſalia. Cæſ. bell. G. 3, c. 99.

Cratais, the mother of Scylla.

Cratæus, conſpired againſt Archelaus, &c.—Ariſtot.

Crater, a bay of Campania near Miſenus.

Cratĕrus, one of Alexander's generals. He rendered himſelf conſpicuous by his literary fame, as well as by his valor in the field, and wrote the hiſtory of Alexander's life. He was greatly reſpected and loved by the Macedonian ſoldiers, and Alexander always truſted him with unuſual confidence. After Alexander's death, he ſubdued Greece with Antipater, and paſſed with his colleague into Aſia, where he was killed in a battle againſt Eumenes, B. C. 321. He had received for his ſhare of Alexander's kingdoms, Greece and Epirus. Nep. in Eumen. 2.—Juſtin. 12 & 13.—Curt. 3.—Arrian.—Plut. in Alex.——A phyſician of Aticus, mentioned by Cic. 12, ad Attic. ep. 13.—Horat. 2, Sat. 3, v. 161.——A painter. Plin. 35, c. 11.——An Athenian, who collected into one body, all the decrees which had paſſed in the public aſſemblies at Athens.

Crates, a philoſopher of Bœotia, ſon of Aſcondus, and diſciple of Diogenes the Cynic, B. C. 324. He ſold his eſtates, and gave the money to his fellow-citizens. He was naturally deformed, and he rendered himſelf more hideous, by ſewing ſheep's ſkins to his mantle, and by the ſingularity of his manners. He clothed himſelf as warm as poſſible in the ſummer: but in the winter, his garments were uncommonly thin, and incapable to reſiſt the inclemency of the ſeaſon. Hipparchia, the ſiſter of a philoſopher, became enamoured of him; and as he could not cool her paſſion by repreſenting himſelf as poor and deformed, he married her. He had by her two daughters, whom he gave in marriage to his diſciples, after he had permitted them their company for 30 days, by way of trial. Some of his letters are extant. Diog. in vitâ.——A ſtoic, ſon of Timocrates, who opened a ſchool at Rome, where he taught grammar. Sueton.——A native of Pergamus, who wrote an account of the moſt ſtriking events of every age, B. CREON, king of Corinth, was ſon of Syſiphus. He promiſed his daughter Glauce to Jaſon, who repudiated Medea. To revenge the ſucceſs of her rival, Medea ſent her for a preſent, a gown covered with poiſon. Glauce put it on, and was ſeized with ſudden pains. Her body took fire, and ſhe expired in the greateſt torments. The houſe alſo was conſumed by the fire, and Creon and his family ſhared Glauce's fate. Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 3, c. 7.—Eurip. in Med.—Hygin. fab. 25.—Diod. 4.——A ſon of Menœtius, father to Jocaſta, the wife and mother of Œdipus. At the death of Laius, who had married Jocaſta, Creon aſcended the vacant throne of Thebes. As the ravages of the Sphinx (Vid. Sphinx) were intolerable, Creon offered his crown, and daughter in marriage, to him who could explain the ænigmas which the monſter propoſed. Œdipus was happy in his explanations, and he aſcended the throne of Thebes, and married Jocaſta without knowing that ſhe was his mother, and by her he had two ſons, Polynices and Eteocles. Theſe two ſons mutually agreed, after their father's death, to reign in the kingdom, each alternately. Eteocles firſt aſcended the throne, by right of ſeniority; but when he was once in power, he refuſed to reſign at the appointed time, and his brother led againſt him an army of Argives to ſupport his right. The war was decided by a ſingle combat between the two brothers. They both killed one another, and Creon aſcended the throne, till Leodamas the ſon of Eteocles ſhould be of a ſufficient age to aſſume the reins of government. In his regal capacity, Creon commanded that the Argives, and more particularly Polynices, who was the cauſe of all the bloodſhed, ſhould remain unburied. If this was in any manner diſobeyed, the offenders were to be buried alive. Antigone, the ſiſter of Polynices, tranſgreſſed, and was accordingly puniſhed. Hæmon, the ſon of Creon, who was paſſionately fond of Antigone, killed himſelf on her grave, when his father refuſed to grant her pardon. Creon was afterwards killed by Theſeus, who had made war with him, becauſe he refuſed burial to the Argives. Vid. Eteocles, Polynices, Adraſtus, Oedipus.—Apollod. 3, c. 56, &c.—Pauſ. 1, c. 39. l. 9, c. 5, &c.—*Stat. in Theb.—Sophocl. in Antig.—Æſchyl. Cresus & Ephesus, two men who built the temple of Diana at Epheſus. Pauſ. 7, c. 2.

Creta, one of the largeſt iſlands of the Mediterranean ſea, at the ſouth of all the Cyclades. It was once famous for its hundred cities, and for the laws which the wiſdom of Minos eſtabliſhed there. The inhabitants have been deteſted for their unnatural loves, their falſehood, their piracies, and robberies. Jupiter, as ſome authors report, was educated in that iſland by the Corybantes, and the Cretans boaſted that they could ſhow his tomb. There were different colonies from Phrygia, Doris, Achaia, &c. that eſtabliſhed themſelves there. The iſland, after groaning under the tyranny of democratical uſurpation, and feeling the ſcourge of frequent ſedition, was made a Roman province, B. C. 66, after a war of three years, in which the inhabitants were ſo diſtreſſed, that they were even compelled to drink the water of their cattle. Chalk was produced there, and thence called Creta, and with it the Romans marked their lucky days in their calendar. Horat. 1, od. 36, v. 10. epod. 9.—*Ovid. Critodēmus, an ancient [illegible]. Plin. 5, c. 76.

Critōgnatus, a celebrated warrior of Alesia, when Cæsar was in Gaul. Cæs. bell. Gall.

Critolāus, a citizen of Tegea in Arcadia, who, with two brothers, fought against the two sons of Demostratus of Pheneus, to put an end to a long war between their respective nations. The brothers of Critolaus were both killed, and he alone remained to withstand his three bold antagonists. He conquered them; and when, at his return, his sister deplored the death of one of his antagonists, to whom she was betrothed, he killed her in a fit of resentment. The offence deserved capital punishment; but he was pardoned, on account of the services he had rendered his country. He was afterwards general of the Achæans, and it is said that he poisoned himself, because he had been conquered at Thermopylæ by the Romans. Cic. 3, de Nat. D. ——A peripatetic philosopher of Athens, sent ambassador to Rome, &c. 140 B. C. Cic. 2, de Orat.——An historian who wrote about Epirus.

Crius, a soothsayer, son of Theocles. Paus. 3, c. 13.——A man of Ægina, &c. —Herodot. 6, c. 50.——A river of Achaia, called after a giant of the same name. Paus. 7, c. 27.

Crobialus, a town of Paphlagonia.

Crobyzi, a people of Thrace.

Crŏcăle, one of Diana's attendants. Ovid. Met. 3.

Croceæ, a town of Laconia. Paus. 3, v. 21.

Crocodilopŏlis, a town of Egypt, near the Nile, above Memphis. The crocodiles were held there in the greatest veneration; and they were so tame, that they came to take food from the hand of their feeders. It was afterwards called Arsinoe. Herodot. 2, c. 69.—Strab. 17.

Crocus, a beautiful youth enamoured of the nymph Smilax. He was changed into a flower of the same name, on account of the impatience of his love, and Smilax was metamorphosed into a yew-tree. Ovid. 4, Met. v. 283.

Crœsus, the fifth and last of the Mermnadæ, who reigned in Lydia, was son of Alyattes, and passed for the richest of mankind. He was the first who made the Greeks of Asia tributary to the Lydians. His court was the asylum of learning; and Æsop, the famous fable-writer, among others, lived under his patronage. In a conversation with Solon, Crœsus wished to be thought the happiest of mankind; but the philosopher philoſopher appriſed him of his miſtake, and gave the preference to poverty and domeſtic virtue. Crœſus undertook a war againſt Cyrus the king of Perſia, and marched to meet him with an army of 420,000 men, and 60,000 horſe. After a reign of 14 years, he was defeated, B. C. 548; his capital was beſieged, and he fell into the conqueror's hands, who ordered him to be burnt alive. The pile was already on fire, when Cyrus heard the conquered monarch three times exclaim, Solon! with lamentable energy. He aſked him the reaſon of his exclamation, and Crœſus repeated the converſation he had once had with Solon on human happineſs. Cyrus was moved at the recital, and at the recollection of the inconſtancy of human affairs, he ordered Crœſus to be taken from the burning pile, and he became one of his moſt intimate friends. The kingdom of Lydia became extinct in his perſon, and the power was transferred to Perſia. Crœſus ſurvived Cyrus. The manner of his death is unknown. He is celebrated for the immenſely rich preſents which he made to the temple of Delphi, from which he received an obſcure and ambiguous oracle, which he interpreted in his favor, and which was fulfilled in the deſtruction of his empire. Herodot. 1, c. 26, &c.—Plut. in Solon. 8, c. 24.—Juſtin. 1, c. 7.

CROMI, a people of Arcadia.

CROMĪTIS, a country of Arcadia.

CROMMYON & CROMYON, a place of Attica, where Hercules killed a large ſow that laid waſte the neighbouring country. Ovid. Met. 7.—Xen.——A town near Corinth. Pauſ. 2, c. 1.

CROMNA, a town of Bithynia.

CROMUS, a ſon of Neptune. Pauſ. 2, c. 1.——A ſon of Lycaon. Id. 8. c. 3.

CRONIA, a feſtival at Athens, in honor of Saturn. The Rhodians obſerved the ſame feſtival, and generally ſacrificed to the god a condemned malefactor.

CRONIUM, a town of Elis—of Sicily.

CROPHI, a mountain of Egypt, near which were the ſources of the Nile, according to ſome traditions, in the city of Sais. Herodot. 2, c. 28.

CROSSÆA, a country ſituate partly in Thrace, and partly in Macedonia. Herodot. 7, c. 123.

CROTĂLUS, a navigable river of Italy. Plin. 3, c. 10.

CROTON, a man killed by Hercules, by whom he was afterwards greatly honored. Diod. 4.

CRŎTŌNA, a town of Italy, ſtill known by the ſame name, in the bay of Tarentum, founded 759 years before the Auguſtan age, by a colony from Achaia. The inhabitants were excellent warriors, and great wreſtlers. Democedes, Alcmæon, Milo, &c. were natives of this place. It was ſurrounded with a wall twelve miles in circumference, before the arrival of Pyrrhus in Italy. Crotona ſtruggled in vain againſt the attacks of Dionyſius of Sicily who took it. It ſuffered likewiſe in the wars of Pyrrhus and Annibal. Herodot. 8, c. 47.—Strab. 6.—Plin. 2, c. 96.—Liv. 1, c. 18. l. 24, c. 3.—Juſtin. 20, c. 2.

CROTONIATÆ, the inhabitants of Crotona. Cic. de inv. 2, c. 1.

CROTONIATIS, a part of Italy, of which Crotona is the capital. Thucyd. 7, c. 35.

CRUSTŬMIUM, CRUSTUNUS & CRUSTURNENIUS, now Conca, a river flowing from the Apennines, by Ariminum. Lucan. 2, v. 406.

CRYNIS, a river of Bithynia.

CRYPTA, a paſſage through mount Pauſilypus. Vid. Pauſilypus.

CTEĂTUS, one of the Grecian chiefs before Troy. Pauſ. 5, c. 4.

CTEMĔNE, a town of Theſſaly.

CTENOS, a harbour of Cherſoneſus Taurica.

CTESIAS a Greek hiſtorian and phyſician of Cnidos, taken priſoner by Artaxerxes Mnemon at the battle of Cunaxa. He cured the king's wounds, and was his phyſician for 17 years. He wrote an hiſtory of the Aſſyrians and Perſians, which Juſtin and Diodorus have partially preferred to that of Herodotus. Some fragments of his compoſitions have been preſerved by Photius, and are to be found in Weſſeling's edition of Herodotus. Strab. 1.—Athen. 12.—Plut. in Artax.——A ſycophant of Athens.——An hiſtorian of Epheſus.

CTESIBIUS, a mathematician of Alexandria, who floriſhed 135 years B. C. He was the inventor of the pump, and other hydraulic inſtruments. He alſo invented a clepſydra, or a water clock. This invention of meaſuring time by water was wonderful and ingenious. Water was made to drop upon wheels, which it turned. The wheels communicated municated their regular motion to a ſmall wooden image, which, by a gradual riſe, pointed with a ſtick to the proper hours and months, which were engraved on a column near the machine. This artful invention gave riſe to many improvements; and the modern manner of meaſuring time with an hour-glaſs is in imitation of the clepſydra of Cteſibius. Vitruv. de Archit. 9, c. 9.——A cynic philoſopher.——An hiſtorian, who flouriſhed 254 years B. C. and died in his 104th year. Plut. in Dem.

Cteſĭcles, a general of Zacynthos, &c.

Cteſidēmus, a painter who had Antiphilus for pupil. Plin. 35, c. 10.

Cteſilŏchus, a noble painter, who repreſented Jupiter as bringing forth Bacchus. Plin. 35, c. 11.

Cteſĭphon, an Athenian, who adviſed his fellow citizens publicly to preſent Demoſthenes with a golden crown for his probity and virtue. This was oppoſed by the orator Æſchines, the rival of Demoſthenes, who accuſed Cteſiphon of ſeditious views. Demoſthenes undertook the defence of his friend, in a celebrated oration ſtill extant, and Æſchines was baniſhed.——A Greek architect, who made the plan of Diana's temple at Epheſus.——An elegiac poet, whom king Attalus ſet over his poſſeſſions in Æolia. Athen. 13.——A Greek hiſtorian, who wrote an hiſtory of Bœotia, beſides a treatiſe on trees and plants. Plut. in Theſ.——A large village of Aſſyria, now Elwodain, on the banks of the Tigris, where the kings of Parthia generally reſided in winter on account of the mildneſs of the climate. Strab. 15.—Plin. 6, c. 26.

Cteſippus, a ſon of Chabrias. After his father's death he was received into the houſe of Phocion, the friend of Chabrias. Phocion attempted in vain to correct his natural foibles and extravagances. Plut. in Phoc.——A man who wrote an hiſtory of Scythia.——One of the deſcendants of Hercules.

Ctimĕne, the youngeſt daughter of Laertes by Anticlea. Homer. Od. 15, v. 334.

Cularo, a town of the Allobroges in Gaul, called afterwards Gratianopolis, and now Grenoble. Cic. ep.

Cuma & Cumæ, a town of Æolia, in Aſia Minor. The inhabitants have been accuſed of ſtupidity for not laying a tax upon all the goods which entered their harbour during 300 years. They were called Cumani, Strab. 13.—Patere. 1, c. 4.——A city of Campania, near Puteoli, founded by a colony from Chalcis and Cumæ, of Æolia, before the Trojan war. The inhabitants were called Cumæi and Cumani. There was one of the Sibyls that fixed her reſidence in a cave in the neighbourhood, and was called the Cumæan Sibyl. Vid. Sibyllæ.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 712. Faſt. 4, v. 158. Pont. 2, el. 8, v. 41.—Cic. Rull. 2, c. 26.—Patere. 1, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 441.—Liv. 4.—Ptol. 3.—Strab. 5.

Cumānum, a country houſe of Pompey near Cumæ. Cic. ad Attic. 4, ep. 10.——Another of Varro. Id. Acad. 1, c. 1.

Cunaxa, a place of Aſſyria, 500 ſtadia from Babylon, famous for a battle fought there between Artaxerxes and his brother Cyrus the younger, B. C. 401. The latter entered the field of battle with 113,000 men, and the former's forces amounted to 900,000 men. The valor and the retreat of the 10,000 Greeks, who were among the troops of Cyrus, are well known, and have been celebrated by the pen of Xenophon, who was preſent at the battle, and who had the principal care of the retreat. Plut. in Artax.—Cteſias.

Cuneus, a cape of Spain, now Algarve, extending into the ſea in the form of a wedge. Mela. 3, c. 1.—Plin. 4, c. 22.

Cupāvo, a ſon of Cycnus who aſſiſted Æneas againſt Turnus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 186.

Cupentus, a friend of Turnus, killed by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 539.

Cupīdo, a celebrated deity among the ancients, god of love, and love itſelf. There are different traditions concerning his parents. Cicero mentions three Cupids; one, ſon of Mercury and Diana; another, ſon of Mercury and Venus; and the third, of Mars and Venus. Plato mentions two. Heſiod, the moſt ancient theogoniſt, ſpeaks only of one, who, as he ſays, was produced at the ſame time as Chaos and the Earth. There are, according to the more received opinions, two Cupids, one of whom is a lively ingenious youth, ſon of Jupiter and Venus; whilſt the other, ſon of Nox and Erebus, is diſtinguiſhed by his debauchery and riotous diſpoſition. Cupid is repreſented as a winged infant, naked, armed with a bow and a quiver full of arrows. On gems, and all other pieces of antiquity, he is repreſented as amuſing himſelf with ſome childiſh diverſion. Sometimes he appears driving a hoop, throwing a quoit, playing with a nymph, catching a butterfly, or trying to burn with a torch; at other times he plays upon a horn before his mother, or cloſely embraces a ſwan, or with one foot raiſed in the air, he, in a muſing poſture, ſeems to meditate ſome trick. Sometimes, like a conqueror, he marches triumphantly with a helmet on his head, a ſpear on his ſhoulder, and a buckler on his arm, intimating, that even Mars himſelf owns the ſuperiority of love. His power was generally known by his riding on the back of a lion, or on a dolphin, or breaking to pieces the thunderbolts of Jupiter. Among the ancients he was worshiped with the same solemnity as his mother Venus, and as his influence was extended over the heavens, the sea, and the earth, and even the empire of the dead, his divinity was universally acknowledged, and vows, prayers, and sacrifices were daily offered to him. According to some accounts, the union of Cupid with Chaos gave birth to men, and all the animals which inhabit the earth, and even the gods themselves were the offspring of love before the foundation of the world. Cupid, like the rest of the gods, assumed different shapes; and we find him in the Æneid putting on, at the request of his mother, the form of Ascanius, and going to Dido's court where he inspired the queen with love. Virg Æn. 1, v. 693, &c.—Cic. de Nat D. 3.—Ovid. 1, Met. fab. 10.—Hesiod. Theog. v. 121, &c.—Oppian. Hali. 4. Cyneg. 2.—Bion. Idyll. 3.—Moschus.—Eurip. in Hippol.—Theocrit. Idyll. 3, 11, &c.

Cupiennius, a friend of Augustus, who made himself ridiculous for the nicety and effeminacy of his dress. Horat. 1, Sat. 2, v. 36.

Cures, a town of the Sabines, of which Tatius was king. The inhabitants, called Quirites, were carried to Rome, of which they became citizens. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 292, 8, v. 638.—Liv. 1, c. 13.—Macrob. 1, c. 9.—Ovid Fast. 2, v. 477, & 480, l. 3, v. 94.

Curētes, a people of Crete, called also Corybantes, who, according to Ovid, were produced from rain. Their knowledge of all the arts was extensive, and they communicated it to many parts of ancient Greece. They were entrusted with the education of Jupiter, and to prevent his being discovered by his father, they invented a kind of dance, and drowned his cries in the harsh sounds of their shields and cymbals. Virg. G. 4, v. 151.—Strab.—Paus. 4, c. 33.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 282. Fast. 4, v. 210.

Curētis, a name given to Crete, as being the residence of the Curetes. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 136.

Curia, a division of the Roman tribes. Romulus originally divided the people into three tribes, and each tribe into 10 Curiæ. Over each Curia was appointed a priest, who officiated at the sacrifices of his respective assembly. The sacrifices were called Curionia, and the priest Curio. He was to be above the age of fifty. His morals were to be pure and unexceptionable, and his body free from all defects. The Curiones were elected by their respective Curiæ, and above them was a superior priest called Curio maximus, chosen by all the Curiæ in a public assembly.——The word Curia was also applied to public edifices among the Romans. These were generally of two sorts, divine and civil. In the former were held the assemblies of the priests, and of every religious order, for the regulation of religious sacrifices and ceremonies. The other was appointed for the senate, where they assembled for the dispatch of public business. The Curia was solemnly consecrated by the Augurs, before a lawful assembly could be convened there. There were three at Rome which more particularly claim our attention; Curia Hostilia, built by king Tullus Hostilius; Curia Pompeii, where Julius Cæsar was murdered; and Curia Augusti, the palace and court of the emperor Augustus.——A town of the Rhœti, now Coire, the capital of the Grisons.

Curia lex, de Comitiis, was enacted by M. Curius Dentatus the tribune. It forbade the convening of the Comitia, for the election of magistrates, without a previous permission from the senate.

Curias. Vid. Curium.

Curiatii, a family of Alba, which was carried to Rome by Tullus Hostilius, and entered among the Patricians. The three Curiatii, who engaged the Horatii, and lost the victory, were of this family. Flor. 1, c. 3.—Dionys. Hal. 3.—Liv. 1, c. 24.

Q. Curio, an excellent orator, who called Cæsar in full senate, Omnium mulierum virum, et omnium virorum mulierem. Tacit. 21. ann. c. 7.—Suet. in Cæs. 49.—Cic. in Brut.——His son, C. Scribonius, was tribune of the people, and an intimate friend of Cæsar. He saved Cæsar's life as he returned from the senate-house, after the debates concerning the punishments which ought to be inflicted on the adherents of Catiline. He killed himself in Africa. Flor. 4, c. 2.—Plut. in Pomp. & Cæs. 49.—Val. Max. 9, c. 1.—Lucan. v. 268.

Curiosolitæ, a people among the Celtæ who inhabited the country which now forms Lower Britanny. Cæs. bell. G. 2, c. 34. l. 3, c. 11.

Curium, a town of Cyprus, at a small distance from which, on the south of the island, there is a cape which bears the name of Curias. Herodot. 5, c. 113.

Curius Dentātus Marcus Annius, a Roman, celebrated for his fortitude and frugality. He was three times consul, and was twice honored with a triumph. He obtained decisive victories over the Samnites, the Sabines, and the Lucanians, and defeated Pyrrhus near Tarentum. The ambassadors of the Samnites visited his cottage, while he was boiling some vegetables in an earthern earthern pot, and they attempted to bribe him by the offer of large preſents. He refuſed their offers with contempt, and ſaid, I prefer my earthern pots to all your veſſels of gold and ſilver, and it is my wiſh to command thoſe who are in poſſeſſion of money, while I am deprived of it, and live in poverty. Plut. in Cat. Cenſ.—Horat. 1, od. 12, v. 41.—Flor. 1, c. 15.——A lieutenant of Cæſar's cavalry, to whom ſix cohorts of Pompey revolted, &c. Cæſ. 1 bell. Civ. 24.

CURTIA, a patrician family, which migrated with Tatius to Rome.

CURTILLUS, a celebrated epicure, &c. Horat. 2, Sat. 8, v. 52.

M. CURTIUS, a Roman youth who devoted himſelf to the gods Manes for the ſafety of his country, about 360 years B. C. A wide gap called afterwards Curtius lacus, had ſuddenly opened in the forum, and the oracle had ſaid that it never would cloſe before Rome threw into it whatever it had moſt precious. Curtius immediately perceived that no leſs than a human ſacrifice was required. He armed himſelf, mounted his horſe, and ſolemnly threw himſelf into the gulf, which inſtantly cloſed over his head. Liv. 7, c. 6.—Val. Max. 5, c. 6. ——Q. Rufus. Vid. Quintus.——Nicias, a grammarian intimate with Pompey, &c. Suet. de Gr.——Montanus, an orator and poet under Veſpaſian. Tacit. 4 Ann.——Atticus, a Roman knight, who accompanied Tiberius in his retreat into Campania. Tacit. An. 4.——Lacus, the gulf into which Curtius leaped. Vid. M. Curtius.——Fons, a ſtream which conveyed water to Rome from the diſtance of 40 miles, by an aqueduct ſo elevated as to be diſtributed through all the hills of the city. Plin. 36, c. 15.

CURŪLIS MAGISTRATUS, a ſtate officer at Rome, who had the privilege of ſitting in an ivory chair in public aſſemblies. The dictator, the conſuls, the cenſors, the prætors, and ediles, claimed that privilege, and therefore were called curules magiſtratus. The ſenators who had paſſed through the above mentioned offices were generally carried to the ſenate-houſe in ivory chairs, as all generals in their triumphant proceſſion to the capitol. When names of diſtinction began to be known among the Romans, the deſcendants of curule magiſtrates were called nobles, the firſt of a family who diſcharged that office were known by the name of noti, and thoſe that had never been in office were called ignobiles.

CUSSÆI, a nation of Aſia, deſtroyed by Alexander to appeaſe the manes of Hephæſtion. Plut. in Alex.

CUSUS, a river of Hungary falling into the Danube, now the Vag.

CUTIIA, a town of the Sabines, near a lake which contained a floating iſland, and of which the water was of an unuſually cold quality. Plin. 3, c. 12. l. 31, c. 2.—Seneca. Q. N. 3, c. 25.—Liv. 26, c. 11.

CYAMOSŌRUS, a river of Sicily.

CYĂNE, a nymph of Syracuſe, to whom her father offered violence in a fit of drunkenneſs. She dragged her raviſher to the altar, where ſhe ſacrificed him, and killed herſelf to ſtop a peſtilence, which, from that circumſtance, had already begun to afflict the country. Plut. in Parall.——A nymph of Sicily, who endeavoured to aſſiſt Proſerpine when ſhe was carried away by Pluto. The god changed her into a fountain now called Piſme, a few miles from Syracuſe. Ovid. 5, Met. v. 112.——A town of Lycia. Plin. 5, c. 27.——An innkeeper, &c. Juv. 8, v. 162.

CYĂNEÆ, now the Pavorane, two rugged iſlands at the entrance of the Euxine ſea, about 20 ſtadia from the mouth of the Thracian Boſporus. One of them is on the ſide of Aſia, and the other on the European coaſt, and, according to Strabo, there is only a ſpace of 20 furlongs between them. The waves of the ſea, which continually break againſt them with a violent noiſe, fill the air with a darkening foam, and render the paſſage extremely dangerous. The ancients ſuppoſed that theſe iſlands floated, and even ſometimes united to cruſh veſſels into pieces when they paſſed through the ſtraits. This tradition aroſe from their appearing, like all other objects, to draw nearer when navigators approached them. They were ſometimes called Symplegades and Planetæ. Their true ſituation and form was firſt explored and aſcertained by the Argonauts. Plin. 6, c. 12.—Herodot. 4, c. 85.—Apollon. 2.—Ovid. Triſt. 1, el. 9, v. 34.

CYANEE & CYANEA, a daughter of the Mæander, mother of Byblis and Caunus, by Miletus, Apollo's ſon. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 451.

CYANEUS, a large river of Colchis.

CYANIPPE, a daughter of Adraſtus.

CYANIPPUS, a Syracuſan, who derided the orgies of Bacchus, for which impiety the god ſo inebriated him, that he offered violence to his daughter Cyane, who ſacrificed him on the altar. Plut. in Parall.——A Theſſalian, whoſe wife met with the ſame fate as Procris. Plut. in Parall.

CYARAXES, or CYAXARES, ſon of Phraortes, was king of Media and Perſia. He bravely defended his kingdom, which the Scythians had invaded. He made war againſt Alyattes, king of Lydia, and ſubjected to his power all Aſia beyond the river Halys. He died after a reign of 40 years, years, B.C. 585. Diod. 2.—Herodot. 1, c. 73. & 103.——Another prince, ſuppoſed by ſome to be the ſame as Darius the Mede. He was ſon of Aſtyages, king of Media. He added ſeven provinces to his father's dominions, and made war againſt the Aſſyrians, whom Cyrus favored. Xen. Cyrop. 1.

CYBĒBE, a name of Cybele, from κυβεβαν, becauſe in the celebration of her feſtivals men were driven to madneſs.

CYBĔLE, a goddeſs, daughter of Cœlus and Terra, and wife of Saturn. She is ſuppoſed to be the ſame as Ceres, Rhea, Ops, Veſta, Bona Mater, Magna Mater, Pereſynthia, Dindymene, &c. According to Diodorus, ſhe was the daughter of a Lydian prince; and as ſoon as ſhe was born ſhe was expoſed on a mountain. She was preſerved and ſuckled by ſome of the wild beaſts of the foreſt, and received the name of Cybele from the mountain where her life had been preſerved. When ſhe returned to her father's court, ſhe had an intrigue with Atys, a beautiful youth, whom her father mutilated, &c. All the mythologiſts are unanimous in mentioning the amours of Atys and Cybele. The partiality of the goddeſs for Atys ſeems to ariſe from his having firſt introduced her worſhip in Phrygia. She enjoined him perpetual celibacy, and the violation of his promiſe was expiated by voluntary mutilation. In Phrygia the feſtivals of Cybele were obſerved with the greateſt ſolemnity. Her prieſts, called Corybantes, Galli, &c. were not admitted in the ſervice of the goddeſs without a previous mutilation. In the celebration of the feſtivals, they imitated the manners of madmen, and filled the air with dreadful ſhrieks and howlings, mixed with the confuſed noiſe of drums, tabrets, bucklers and ſpears. This was in commemoration of the ſorrow of Cybele for the loſs of her favorite Atys. Cybele was generally repreſented as a robuſt woman, far advanced in her pregnancy, to intimate the fecundity of the earth. She held keys in her hand, and her head was crowned with riſing turrets, and ſometimes with the leaves of an oak. She ſometimes appears riding in a chariot drawn by two tame lions; Atys follows by her ſide, carrying a ball in his hand, and ſupporting himſelf upon a fir-tree, which is ſacred to the goddeſs. Sometimes Cybele is repreſented with a ſceptre in her hand, with her head covered with a tower. She is alſo ſeen with many breaſts, to ſhew that the earth gives aliments to all living creatures; and ſhe generally carries two lions under her arms. From Phrygia the worſhip of Cybele paſſed into Greece, and was ſolemnly eſtabliſhed at Eleuſis, under the name of the Eleuſinian myſteries of Ceres. The Romans, by order of the Sibylline books, brought the ſtatue of the goddeſs from Peſſinus into Italy; and when the ſhip which carried it had run on a ſhallow bank of the Tiber, the virtue and innocence of Claudia were vindicated in removing it with her girdle. It is ſuppoſed that the myſteries of Cybele were firſt known about 1580 years B. C. The Romans were particularly ſuperſtitious in waſhing every year, on the 6th of the calends of April, the ſhrine of this goddeſs, in the waters of the river Almon. There prevailed many obſcenities in the obſervation of the feſtivals, and the prieſts themſelves were the moſt eager to uſe indecent expreſſions, and to ſhew their unbounded licentiouſneſs by the impurity of their actions. *Vid. CYCLĂDES, a name given to certain iſlands of the Ægean ſea, thoſe particularly that ſurround Delos as with a circle; whence the name (κυκλος circulus). They were about 53 in number, the principal of which were Ceos, Naxos, Andros, Paros, Melos, Seriphos, Gyarus, Tenedos, &c. The Cyclades were reduced under the power of Athens by Miltiades; but during the invaſion of Greece by the Perſians, they revolted from their ancient and natural allies. *C. CYCLŌPES, a certain race of men of gigantic ſtature, ſuppoſed to be the ſons of Cœlus and Terra. They had but one eye in the middle of the forehead; whence their name, (κυκλος circulus ωψ oculus). They were three in number, according to Heſiod, called Arges, Brontes, and Steropes. Their number was greater according to other mythologiſts, and in the age of Ulyſſes, Polyphemus was their king. [Vid. Polyphemus.] They inhabited the weſtern parts of the iſland ſland of Sicily; and becauſe they were uncivilized in their manners, the poets ſpeak of them as men-eaters. The tradition of their having only one eye, originates from their cuſtom of wearing ſmall bucklers of ſteel which covered their faces, and had a ſmall aperture in the middle, which correſponded exactly to the eye. From their vicinity to mount Ætna, they have been ſuppoſed to be the workmen of Vulcan, and to have fabricated the thunderbolts of Jupiter. The moſt ſolid walls and impregnable fortreſſes were ſaid, among the ancients, to be the work of the Cyclops, to render them more reſpectable, and we find that Jupiter was armed with what they had fabricated, and that the ſhield of Pluto, and the trident of Neptune, were the produce of their labor. The Cyclops were reckoned among the gods, and we find a temple dedicated to their ſervice at Corinth, where ſacrifices were ſolemnly offered. Apollo deſtroyed them all, becauſe they had made the thunderbolts of Jupiter, with which his ſon Æſculapius had been killed. From the different accounts given of the Cyclops by the ancients, it may be concluded that they were all the ſame people, to whom various functions have been attributed, which cannot be reconciled one to the other, without drawing the pencil of fiction or mythology. Apollod. 1, c. 1 & 2.—*Homer. To be more devoted to purity and ſtudy, he abandoned his wife; and as proof of his charity he diſtributed his goods to the poor. He wrote 81 letters, beſides ſeveral treatiſes, de Dei gratiâ, de virginum habitu, &c. and rendered his compoſitions valuable by the information he conveys of the diſcipline of the ancient church, and by the ſoundneſs and purity of his theology. He died a martyr A. D. 258. The beſt editions of Cyprian are, that of Fell, fol. Oxon. 1682, and that reprinted Amſt. 1700.

Cyprus, a daughter of Antony and Cleopatra, who married Agrippa.——A large iſland in the Mediterranean ſea, at the ſouth of Cilicia, and at the weſt of Syria, formerly joined to the continent near Syria, according to Pliny. It has been anciently called Acamantis, Amathuſia, Aſpelia, Ceraſtis, Colonia or Colinia, Macaria, and Spechia. It has been celebrated for giving birth to Venus, ſirnamed Cypris, who was the chief deity of the place, and to whoſe ſervice many places and temples were conſecrated. It was anciently divided into nine kingdoms, and was for ſome time under the power of Egypt, and afterwards of the Perſians. The Greeks made themſelves maſters of it, and it was taken from them by the Romans. Its length, according to Strabo, is 1400 ſtadia. There were three celebrated temples there, two ſacred to Venus, and the other to Jupiter. The inhabitants were given much to pleaſure and diſſipation. Strab. 15.—Flor. 3, c. 9.—Juſtin. 18, c. 5.—Plin. 12, c. 24. l. 33, c. 5. l. 36, c. 26.—Mela. 2, c. 7.

CYRRHUS & CYRUS, a river of Iberia, in Asia.

CYRSĪLUS, an Athenian, stoned to death for his ill advice to the state. Cic. 3, de offic. c. 11.

CYRUS, a king of Persia, son of Cambyses and Mandane, daughter of Astyages, king of Media. His father was of an ignoble family, whose marriage with Mandane had been consummated on account of the apprehensions of Astyages. (Vid. Astyages.) Cyrus was exposed as soon as born; but he was preserved by a shepherdess, who educated him as her own son. As he was playing with his equals in years, he was elected king in a certain diversion, and he exercised his power with such an independent spirit, that he ordered one of his play companions to be severely whipped for disobedience. The father of the youth, who was a nobleman, complained to the king of the ill-treatment which his son had received from a shepherd's son. Astyages ordered Cyrus before him, and discovered that he was Mandane's son, from whom he had so much to apprehend. He treated him with great coldness; and Cyrus, unable to bear his tyranny, escaped from his confinement, and began to levy troops to dethrone his grandfather. He was assisted and encouraged by the ministers of Astyages, who were displeased with the king's oppression. He marched against him, and Astyages was defeated in a battle, and taken prisoner, B. C. 559. From this victory the empire of Media became tributary to the Persians. Cyrus subdued the eastern parts of Asia, and made war against Crœsus, king of Lydia, whom he conquered, B. C. 548. He invaded the kingdom of Assyria, and took the city of Babylon, by drying the channels of the Euphrates, and marching his troops through the bed of the river, while the people were celebrating a grand festival. He afterwards marched against Tomyris, the queen of the Massagetæ, a Scythian nation, and was defeated in a bloody battle, B. C. 530. The victorious queen, who had lost her son in a previous encounter, was so incensed against Cyrus, that she cut off his head, and threw it into a vessel filled with human blood, exclaiming, Satia te sanguine quem sitisti. Xenophon has written the life of Cyrus; but his history is not perfectly authentic. In the character of Cyrus, he delineates a brave and virtuous prince, and often puts in his mouth many of the sayings of Socrates. The chronology is false; and Xenophon, in his narration, has given existence to persons whom no other historian ever mentioned. The Cyropædia, therefore, is not to be looked upon as an authentic history of Cyrus the Great, but we must consider it as showing what every good and virtuous prince ought to be. Diod. 1.—Herodot. 1, c. 75, &c.—Justin. 1, c. 5, & 7.——The younger Cyrus, was the younger son of Darius Nothus, and the brother of Artaxerxes. He was sent by his father, at the age of sixteen, to assist the Lacedæmonians against Athens. Artaxerxes succeeded to the throne at the death of Nothus; and Cyrus, who was of an aspiring soul, attempted to assassinate him. He was discovered and would have been punished with death, had not his mother, Parysatis, saved him from the hands of the executioner by her tears and entreaties. This circumstance did not in the least check the ambition of Cyrus; he was appointed over Lydia and the sea-coasts, where he secretly fomented rebellion, and levied troops under various pretences. At last he took the field with an army of 100,000 barbarians, and 13,000 Greeks under the command of Clearchus. Artaxerxes met him with 900,000 men near Cunaxa. The battle was long and bloody, and Cyrus might have perhaps obtained the victory, had not his uncommon rashness proved his ruin. It is said that the two royal brothers met in person, and engaged with the most inveterate fury, and their engagement ended in the death of Cyrus, 401 years B. C. Artaxerxes was so anxious of its being universally reported that his brother had fallen by his hand, that he put to death two of his subjects, for boasting that they had killed Cyrus. The Greeks, who were engaged in the expedition, obtained much glory in the battle; and after the death of Cyrus, they remained victorious in the field without a commander. They were not, however, discouraged, though at a great distance from their country, and surrounded on every side by a powerful enemy. They unanimously united in the election of commanders, and traversed all Asia, in spite of the continual attacks of the Persians; and nothing is more truly celebrated in ancient history than the bold retreat of the ten thousand. The journey that they made from the place of their first embarkation, till their return, has been calculated at 1155 leagues performed in the space of 15 months, including all the time which was devoted to take rest and refreshment. This retreat has been celebrated by Xenophon, who was one of their leaders, and among the friends and supporters of Cyrus. It is said, that in the letter he wrote to Lacedæmon, to solicit auxiliaries, Cyrus boasted his philosophy, his royal blood, and his ability to drink more wine than his brother without being intoxi-

It became one of the moſt conſiderable cities of Aſia. It was beſieged by Mithridates, and relieved by Lucullus. Flor. 3, c. 5.—Plin. 5, c. 32.—Diod. 18.

CYZĬCUS, a ſon of Œneus and Stilba, who reigned in Cyzicus. He hoſpitably received the Argonauts, in their expedition againſt Colchis. After their departure from the court of Cyzicus, they were driven back in the night, by a ſtorm, upon the coaſt; and the inhabitants ſeeing ſuch an unexpected number of men, furiouſly attacked them, ſuppoſing them to be the Pelaſgi, their ancient enemies. In this nocturnal engagement, many were killed on both ſides, and Cyzicus periſhed by the hand of Jaſon himſelf, who honored him with a ſplendid funeral, and raiſed a ſtately monument over his grave. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Flacc.—Apollon.—Orpheus.——The chief town of the iſland of Cyzicum, built where the iſland is joined by the bridges to the continent. It has two excellent harbours called Panormus and Chytus. The former is naturally large and beautiful, and the other owes all its conveniencies to the hand of art. The town is ſituate partly on a mountain, and partly in a plain. The Argonauts built a temple to Cybele, in the neighbourhood. It derives its name from Cyzicus, who was killed there by Jaſon. The Athenians defeated, near this place, their enemies of Lacedæmon, aſſiſted by Pharnabazus, B. C. 410. Flor. 3, c. 5, &c.—Strab.—Apollon. 1.—Propert. 3, el. 22.—Flacc. 2, v. 636.

DAÆ, DAHÆ or DAI, now the Dahiſtan, a people of Scythia, who dwelt on the borders of the Caſpian ſea. Sil. 13. v. 764.—Lucan. 7, v. 429.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 728.

DĀCI & DACÆ, a warlike nation of Germany, beyond the Danube, whoſe country, called Dacia, was conquered by the Romans under Trajan, after a war of 15 years, A. D. 103. The emperor joined the country to Mœſia, by erecting a magnificent bridge acroſs the Danube, conſidered as the beſt of his works, which however the envy of his ſucceſſor Adrian demoliſhed. Dacia now forms the modern countries of Walachia, Tranſylvania, and Moldavia. Lucan. 2, v. 53.

DACĬCUS, a ſirname aſſumed by Domitian on his pretended victory over the Dacians. Juv. 6, v. 204.

DACTŸLI, a name given to the prieſts of Cybele, which ſome derive from δακτυλος finger, becauſe they were ten, the ſame number as the fingers of the hand. Pauſ. 1, c. 8.

DADICÆ, a people of Aſiatic Scythia. Herodot. 3, c. 91.

DÆDĂLA,

DÆDĂLA, a mountain and city of Lycia, where Dædalus was buried according to Pliny. 5, c. 27.——A name given to Circe, from her being cunning, (δαιδαλος,) and like Dædalus addicted to deceit and artifice. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 282.——Two feſtivals in Bœotia. One of theſe was obſerved at Alalcomenos by the Platæans, in a large grove, where they expoſed, in the open air, pieces of boiled fleſh, and carefully obſerved whither the crows that came to prey upon them directed their flight. All the trees, upon which any of theſe birds alighted, were immediately cut down, and with them ſtatues were made, called Dædala, in honor of Dædalus.——The other feſtival was of a more ſolemn kind. It was celebrated every ſixty years, by all the cities of Bœotia, as a compenſation for the intermiſſion of the ſmaller feſtivals, for that number of years, during the exile of the Platæans. Fourteen of the ſtatues, called Dædala, were diſtributed by lot among the Platæans, Lebadæans, Coroneans, Orchomenians, Theſpians, Thebans, Tanagræans, and Chæroneans, becauſe they had effected a reconciliation among the Platæans, and cauſed them to be recalled from exile, about the time that Thebes was reſtored by Caſſander, the ſon of Antipater. During this feſtival, a woman in the habit of a bride-maid accompanied a ſtatue, which was dreſſed in female garments, on the banks of the Eurotas. This proceſſion was attended to the top of mount Cithæron, by many of the Bœotians, who had places aſſigned them by lot. Here an altar of ſquare pieces of wood, cemented together like ſtones, was erected, and upon it were thrown large quantities of combuſtible materials. Afterwards a bull was ſacrificed to Jupiter, and an ox or heifer to Juno, by every one of the cities of Bœotia, and by the moſt opulent that attended. The pooreſt citizens offered ſmall cattle; and all theſe oblations, together with the Dædala, were thrown in the common heap and ſet on fire, and totally reduced to aſhes. They originated in this: When Juno, after a quarrel with Jupiter, had retired to Eubœa, and refuſed to return to his bed, the god, anxious for her return, went to conſult Cithæron king of Platæa, to find ſome effectual meaſure to break her obſtinacy. Cithæron adviſed him to dreſs a ſtatue in woman's apparel, and carry it in a chariot, and publicly to report it was Platæa, the daughter of Aſopus, whom he was going to marry. The advice was followed, and Juno, informed of her huſband's future marriage, repaired in haſte to meet the chariot, and was eaſily united to him, when ſhe diſcovered the artful meaſures he made uſe of to effect a reconciliation. Pauſan. & Plut.

DÆDĂLION, a ſon of Lucifer, brother to Ceyx, and father of Philonis. He was ſo afflicted at the death of Philonis, whom Diana had put to death, that he threw himſelf down from the top of mount Parnaſſus, and was changed into a falcon by Apollo. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 295.

DÆDĂLUS, an Athenian, ſon of Eupalamus, deſcended from Erechtheus, king of Athens. He was the moſt ingenious artiſt of his age, and to him we are indebted for the invention of the wedge, and many other mechanical inſtruments, and the ſails of ſhips. He made ſtatues, which moved of themſelves, and ſeemed to be endowed with life. Talus, his ſiſter's ſon, promiſed to be as great as himſelf, by the ingenuity of his inventions; and therefore, from envy, he threw him down from a window and killed him. After the murder of this youth, Dædalus, with his ſon Icarus, fled from Athens to Crete, where Minos, king of the country, gave him a cordial reception. Dædalus made a famous labyrinth for Minos, and aſſiſted Paſiphae, the queen, to gratify her unnatural paſſion for a bull. For this action, Dædalus incurred the diſpleaſure of Minos, who ordered him to be confined in the labyrinth which he had conſtructed. Here he made himſelf wings with feathers and wax, and carefully fitted them to his body, and to that of his ſon, who was the companion of his confinement. They took their flight in the air from Crete; but the heat of the ſun melted the wax on the wings of Icarus, whoſe flight was too high, and he fell into that part of the ocean, which from him has been called the Icarian ſea. The father, by a proper management of his wings, alighted at Cumæ, where he built a temple to Apollo, and thence directed his courſe to Sicily, where he was kindly received by Cocalus, who reigned over part of the country. He left many monuments of his ingenuity in Sicily, which ſtill exiſted in the age of Diodorus Siculus. He was diſpatched by Cocalus, who was afraid of the power of Minos, who had declared war againſt him, becauſe he had given an aſylum to Dædalus. The flight of Dædalus from Crete, with wings, is explained by obſerving that he was the inventor of ſails, which in his age might paſs at a diſtance for wings. Pauſ. 1, 7 & 9.—Diod. 4.—Ovid. Met. 8. fab. 3. Heroid. 4. De Art. Am. 2. Triſt. 3, el. 4.—Hygin. fab. 40.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 14.—Apollod. 3, c. 1, &c.—Herodot. 7, c. 170.——There were two ſtatuaries of the ſame name, one of Sicyon, ſon of Patroclus, the other a native of Bithynia. Pauſ. 7, c. 14.—Arrian.

DÆMON, a kind of ſpirit which, as the ancients ſuppoſed, preſided over the actions of mankind, gave them their private coun-fels, and carefully watched over their moſt ſecret intentions. Some of the ancient philoſophers maintained that every man had two of theſe Dæmons; the one bad, and the other good. Theſe Dæmons had the power of changing themſelves into whatever they pleaſed, and of aſſuming whatever ſhapes were moſt ſubſervient to their intentions. At the moment of death, the Dæmon delivered up to judgment the perſon with whoſe care he had been entruſted; and according to the evidence he delivered, ſentence was paſſed over the body. The Dæmon of Socrates is famous in hiſtory. That great philoſopher aſſerted that the genius informed him when any of his friends was going to engage in ſome unfortunate enterprize, and ſtopped him from the commiſſion of all crimes and impiety. Theſe Genii or Dæmons, though at firſt reckoned only as the ſubordinate miniſters of the ſuperior deities, received divine honor in length of time, and we find altars and ſtatues erected to a Genio loci, Genio Auguſti. Junonibus, &c. Cic. Tuſc. 1.—Plut. de Gen. Socr.

DAHÆ. Vid. Daæ.

DAI, a nation of Perſia, all ſhepherds. Herodot. 1, c. 125.

DAICLES, a victor at Olympia, B. C. 753.

DAĬDIS, a ſolemnity obſerved by the Greeks. It laſted three days. The firſt was in commemoration of Latona's labor. The ſecond in memory of Apollo's birth; and the third in honor of the marriage of Podalirius, and the mother of Alexander. Torches were always carried at the celebration; whence the name.

DAIMĂCHUS, a maſter of horſe at Syracuſe, &c. Polyæn. 1.

DAIMĔNES, a general of the Achæans. Pauſ. 7, c. 6.——An officer expoſed on a croſs, by Dionyſius of Syracuſe. Diod. 14.

DAĬPHRON, a ſon of Ægyptus, killed by his wife, &c. Apollod. 2, c. 1.

DAĪRA, one of the Oceanides, mother of Eleuſis by Mercury. Pauſ. 1, c. 38.

DALDIA, a town of Lydia.

DALMATIUS, one of the Cæſars, in the age of Conſtantine, who died A. D. 337.

DALMĂTIA, a part of Illyricum, at the eaſt of the Adriatic, near Liburnia on the weſt, whoſe inhabitants, called Dalmatæ, were conquered by Metellus, B. C. 118. They chiefly lived upon plunder, and from their rebellious ſpirit were troubleſome to the Roman empire. They wore a peculiar garment called Dalmatica, afterwards introduced at Rome. Horat. 2, od. 1, v. 16.—Lamprid. in Commod. 8.—Strab. 7.—Ptol. 2.

DALMIUM, the chief town of Dalmatia. Strab. 7.

DAMAGETUS, a man of Rhodes, who enquired of the oracle what wife he ought to marry? and received for anſwer the daughter of the braveſt of the Greeks. He applied to Ariſtomenes and obtained his daughter in marriage, B. C. 670. Pauſ. 4, c. 24.

DAMALIS, a courtezan at Rome, in the age of Horace, 1 od. 36, v. 13.

DAMAS, a Syracuſan in the intereſt of Agathocles. Diod. 19.

DAMASCĒNA, a part of Syria near mount Libanus.

DAMASCIUS, a ſtoic of Damaſcus, who wrote a philoſophical hiſtory, the life of Iſidorus, and four books on extraordinary events, in the age of Juſtinian. His works, which are now loſt, were greatly eſteemed according to Photius.

DAMASCUS, a rich and ancient city of Damaſcene in Syria, where Demetrius Nicanor was defeated by Alexander Zebina. It is the modern Damas or Sham. Lucan. 3, v 215.—Juſtin. 36, c. 2.—Mela. 1, c. 11.

DAMASIA, a town called alſo Auguſta, now Auſburg, in Swabia on the Leck.

DAMASICHTHON, a king of Thebes. Pauſ. 9, c. 5.

DAMASIPPUS, a captain in Philip's army.——A ſenator who accompanied Juba when he entered Utica in triumph. Cæſ. bell. C. 2.——A great enemy of Sylla. Paterc. 2, c. 22.——An orator. Juv. 3, v. 185.——A merchant of old ſeals and veſſels, who, after loſing his all in unfortunate ſchemes in commerce, aſſumed the name and habit of a ſtoic philoſopher. Horat. 2, Sat. 3.——One of Niobe's ſons.

DAMASISTRĂTUS, a king of Platæa, who buried Laius. Apollod. 3, c. 5.

DAMASITHYNUS, a ſon of Candaules, general in the army of Xerxes. Herodot. 7, c. 98.——A king of Calyndæ, ſunk in his ſhip by Artemiſia. Id. 8, c. 87.

DAMASTES, a man of Sigæum, diſciple of Hellanicus, about the age of Herodotus, &c. Dionyſ.——A famous robber. Vid. Procraſtes.

DAMIA, a ſirname of Cybele.——A woman to whom the Epidaurians raiſed a ſtatue. Herodot. 5, c. 82.

DAMIPPUS, a Spartan taken by Marcellus as he ſailed out of the port of Syracuſe. He diſcovered to the enemy that a certain part of the city was negligently guarded, and in conſequence of this diſcovery Syracuſe was taken. Polyæn.

DAMIS, a man who diſputed with Ariſtodemus the right of reigning over the Meſſenians. Pauſ. 4, c. 10.

DAMNII, a people at the north of Britain.

DAMNONII, a people of Britain, now ſuppoſed Devonſhire.

DAMNŌRIX, a celebrated Gaul, in the intereſt of Julius Cæſar, &c.

DAMO, a daughter of Pythagoras, who, by order of her father, devoted her life to perpetual celibacy, and induced others to follow her example. Pythagoras at his death entrusted her with all the secrets of his philosophy, and gave her the unlimited care of his compositions, under the promise that she never would part with them. She faithfully obeyed his injunctions; and though in the extremest poverty, she refused to obtain money by the violation of her father's commands. Laert. in Pythag.

DAMŎCLES, one of the flatterers of Dionysius the elder, of Sicily. He admired the tyrant's wealth, and pronounced him the happiest man on earth. Dionysius prevailed upon him to undertake for a while the charge of royalty, and be convinced of the happiness which a sovereign enjoyed. Damocles ascended the throne, and while he gazed upon the wealth and splendor that surrounded him, he perceived a sword hanging over his head by a horse-hair. This so terrified him that all his imaginary felicity vanished at once, and he begged Dionysius to remove him from a situation which exposed his life to such fears and dangers. Cic. in Tuscul. 5, c. 21.

DAMOCRĂTES, a hero, &c. Plut. in Arist.

DAMOCRĬTA, a Spartan matron, wife of Alcippus, who severely punished her enemies who had banished her husband, &c. Plut. in Parall.

DAMOCRĬTUS, a timid general of the Achæans, &c. Paus. 7, c. 13.——A Greek writer, who composed two treatises, one upon the art of drawing an army in battle array, and the other concerning the Jews. ——A man who wrote a poetical treatise upon medicine.

DAMON, a victor at Olympia, Olymp. 102.—Paus. 4, c. 27.——A poet and musician of Athens, intimate with Pericles, and distinguished for his knowledge of government and fondness of discipline. He was banished for his intrigues about 430 years before Christ. C. Nep. 15, c. 2.—Plut. in Pericl.——A Pythagorean philosopher, very intimate with Pythias. When he had been condemned to death by Dionysius, he obtained from the tyrant leave to go and settle his domestic affairs, on promise of returning at a stated hour to the place of execution. Pythias pledged himself to undergo the punishment which was to be inflicted on Damon, should he not return in time, and he consequently delivered himself into the hands of the tyrant. Damon returned at the appointed moment, and Dionysius was so struck with the fidelity of those two friends, that he remitted the punishment, and entreated them to permit him to share their friendship, and enjoy their confidence. Val. Max. 4, c. 7.—— A man of Cheronea, who killed a Roman officer, and was murdered by his fellow-citizens. Plut. in Cim.——A Cyrenean, who wrote an history of philosophy. Laert.

DAMŎPHON, a sculptor of Messenia. Paus. 7, c. 23.

DAMOSTRĂTUS, a philosopher who wrote a treatise concerning fishes. Ælian. V. H. 13, c. 21.

DAMOXĔNUS, a comic writer of Athens. Athen. 3.——A boxer of Syracuse, banished for killing his adversary. Paus. 8, c. 40.

DAMYRIAS, a river of Sicily. Plut. in Timol.

DANA, a large town of Cappadocia.

DĂNAE, the daughter of Acrisius king of Argos, by Eurydice. She was confined in a brazen tower by her father, who had been told by an oracle, that his daughter's son would put him to death. His endeavours to prevent Danae from becoming a mother proved fruitless; and Jupiter, who was enamoured of her, introduced himself to her bed, by changing himself into a golden shower. From his embraces Danae had a son, with whom she was exposed on the sea by her father. The wind drove the bark which carried her, to the coasts of the island of Seriphus, where she was saved by some fishermen, and carried to Polydectes king of the place, whose brother, called Dictys, educated the child called Perseus, and tenderly treated the mother. Polydectes fell in love with her; but as he was afraid of her son, he sent him to conquer the Gorgons, pretending that he wished Medusa's head to adorn the nuptials which he was going to celebrate with Hippodamia, the daughter of Œnomaus. When Perseus had victoriously finished his expedition, he retired to Argos with Danae, to the house of Acrisius, whom he inadvertently killed. Some suppose that it was Prœtus the brother of Acrisius, who introduced himself to Danae in the brazen tower; and instead of a golden shower, it was maintained, that the keepers of Danae were bribed by the gold of her seducer. Virgil mentions that Danae came to Italy with some fugitives of Argos, and that she founded a city called Ardea. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 611. Art. Am. 3, v. 415. Amor. 2, el. 19, v. 27.—Horat.

3, od. 16.—Apollod. 2, c. 2 & 4—Stat. Theb. 1, v. 255.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 410.—— A daughter of Leontium, miſtreſs to Sophron, governor of Epheſus.——A daughter of Danaus, to whom Neptune offered violence.

DĂNAI, a name given to the people of Argos, and promiſcuouſly to all the Greeks, from Danaus their king. Virg. & Ovid. paſſim.

DĂNAĬDES, the fifty daughters of Danaus king of Argos When their uncle Ægyptus came from Egypt with his fifty ſons, they were promiſed in marriage to their couſins; but before the celebration of their nuptials, Danaus, who had been informed by an oracle that he was to be killed by the hands of one of his ſons-in-law, made his daughters ſolemnly promiſe that they would deſtroy their huſbands. They were provided with daggers by their father, and all, except Hypermneſtra, ſtained their hands with the blood of their couſins, the firſt night of their nuptials; and, as a pledge of their obedience to their father's injunctions, they preſented him each with the head of the murdered ſons of Ægyptus. Hypermneſtra was ſummoned to appear before her father, and anſwer for her diſobedience in ſuffering her huſband, Lynceus, to eſcape; but the unanimous voice of the people declared her innocent, and in conſequence of her honorable acquittal, ſhe dedicated a temple to the goddeſs of Perſuaſion. The ſiſters were purified of this murder by Mercury and Minerva, by order of Jupiter; but according to the more received opinion, they were condemned to ſevere puniſhment in hell, and were compelled to fill with water a veſſel full of holes, ſo that the water ran out as ſoon as poured into it, and therefore their labor was infinite, and their puniſhment eternal. The names of the Danaides and their huſbands, were as follows, according to Apollodorus: Amymone married Enceladus; Automate, Buſiris; Agave, Lycus; Scea, Dayphron; Hippodamia, Iſter; Rhodia, Chalcedon; Calyce, another Lynceus; Gorgophone, Proteus; Cleopatra, Agenor; Aſteria, Chætus; Glauce, Aleis; Hippodamia, Diacorytes; Hippomeduſa, Alcmenon; Gorge, Hippothous; Iphimeduſa, Euchenor; Rhode, Hippolitus; Pirea, Agoptolemus; Cerceſtis, Dorion; Pharte, Eurydamas; Mneſtra, Ægius; Evippe, Arigius; Anaxibia, Archelaus; Nelo, Melachus; Clite, Clitus; Stencle, Stenelus; Chryſippe, Chryſippus; Antonoe, Eurylochus; Theano, Phantes; Electra, Periſtenes; Eurydice, Dryas; Glaucippe, Potamon; Autholea, Cliſſeus; Cleodora, Lixus; Evippe, Imbrus; Erata, Bromius; Stygne, Polyctor; Bryce, Chtonius; Actea, Periphas; Podarce, Œneus; Dioxippe, Ægyptus; Adyte, Menalces; Ocipete, Lampus; Pilarge, Idmon; Hippodice, Idas; Adiante, Daiphron; Callidia, Pandion; Œme, Arbelus; Celena, Hixbius; Hyperia, Hippocoriſtes. The heads of the ſons of Ægyptus were buried at Argos; but their bodies were left at Lerna, where the murder had been committed. Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Horat. 3, od. 11.—Strab. 8.—Pauſ. 2, c. 16.—Hygin. fab. 168, &c.

DANĂLA, a caſtle of Galatia.

DANAPRIS, now the Nieper, a name given in the middle ages to the Boryſthenes, as Danaſter the Nieſter, was applied to the Tyras.

DĂNAUS, a ſon of Belus and Anchinoe, who, after his father's death, reigned conjointly with his brother Ægyptus on the throne of Egypt. Some time after, a difference aroſe between the brothers, and Danaus ſet ſail with his fifty daughters in queſt of a ſettlement. He viſited Rhodes, where he conſecrated a ſtatue to Minerva, and arrived ſafe on the coaſt of Peloponneſus, where he was hoſpitably received by Gelanor, king of Argos. Gelanor had lately aſcended the throne, and the firſt years of his reign were marked with diſſenſions with his ſubjects. Danaus took advantage of Gelanor's unpopularity, and obliged him to abdicate the crown. In Gelanor, the race of the Inachidæ was extinguiſhed, and the Belides began to reign at Argos in Danaus. Some authors ſay, that Gelanor voluntarily reſigned the crown to Danaus, on account of the wrath of Neptune, who had dried up all the waters of Argolis, to puniſh the impiety of Inachus. The ſucceſs of Danaus, invited the fifty ſons of Ægyptus to embark for Greece. They were kindly received by their uncle, who, either apprehenſive of their number, or terrified by an oracle which threatened his ruin by one of his ſons-in-law, cauſed his daughters, to whom they were promiſed in marriage, to murder them the firſt night of their nuptials. His fatal orders were executed, but Hypermneſtra alone ſpared the life of Lynceus. (Vid. Danaides.) Danaus, at firſt, perſecuted Lynceus with unremitted fury, but he was afterwards reconciled to him, and he acknowledged him for his ſon-in-law, and ſucceſſor, after a reign of 50 years. He died about 1425 years before the Chriſtian era, and after death, he was honored with a ſplendid monument in the town of Argos, which ſtill exiſted in the age of Pauſanias. According to Æſchylus, Danaus left Egypt, not to be preſent at the marriage of his daughters, with the ſons of his brother, a connection which he deemed unlawful and impious. The ſhip in which Danaus came to Greece, was called Armais, and was the firſt that had ever appeared appeared there. It is said that the use of pumps was first introduced into Greece by Danaus. Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Paus. 2, c. 19.—Hygin. fab. 168, &c.—Herodot. 2, c. 91, &c. 7, c. 94.

DANDĂRI & DANDARĬDÆ, certain inhabitants near mount Caucasus. Tacit. 12, Ann. c. 18.

DANDON, a man of Illyricum, who, as Pliny 7, c. 48, reports, lived 500 years.

DĀNŬBIUS, a celebrated river, the greatest in Europe, which rises, according to Herodotus, near the town of Pyrene, in the country of the Celtæ, and after flowing through the greatest part of Europe, falls into the Euxine sea. The Greeks called it Ister; but the Romans distinguished it by the appellation of the Danube, from its source till the middle of its course, and from thence to its mouths, they called it Ister, like the Greeks. It falls into the Euxine through seven mouths, or six according to others. Herodotus mentions five, and modern travellers discover only two. The Danube was generally supposed to be the northern boundary of the Roman empire in Europe; and therefore, several castles were erected on its banks, to check the incursions of the barbarians. It was worshipped as a deity by the Scythians. Dionys. Perieg.—Herodot. 2, c. 33. l. 4, c. 48, &c.—Strab. 4—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Ammian. 23.

DAŎCHUS, an officer of Philip, &c. Plut. in Demosth..

DAPHNÆ, a town of Egypt, on one of the mouths of the Nile, 16 miles from Pelusium. Herodot. 2, c. 30.

DAPHNÆUS, a general of Syracuse, against Carthage. Polyæn. 5.

DAPHNE, a daughter of the river Peneus, or of the Ladon, by the goddess Terra, of whom Apollo became enamoured. This passion had been raised by Cupid, with whom Apollo, proud of his late conquest over the serpent Python, had disputed the power of his darts. Daphne heard with horror the addresses of the god, and endeavoured to remove herself from his importunities by flight. Apollo pursued her; and Daphne, fearful of being caught, intreated the assistance of the gods, who changed her into a laurel. Apollo crowned his head with the leaves of the laurel, and for ever ordered that that tree should be sacred to his divinity. Some say that Daphne was admired by Leucippus, son of Œnomaus king of Pisa, who, to be in her company, disguised his sex, and attended her in the woods, in the habit of a huntress. Leucippus gained Daphne's esteem and love; but Apollo, who was his powerful rival, discovered his sex, and Leucippus was killed by the companions of Diana. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 452, &c.—Parthen. Erotic. c. 15.——A daughter of Tiresias, priestess in the temple of Delphi. She was consecrated to the service of Apollo by the Epigoni, or according to others, by the goddess Tellus. She was called Sibyl, on account of the wildness of her looks and expressions, when she delivered oracles. Her oracles were generally in verse, and Homer, according to some accounts, has introduced much of her poetry in his compositions. Diod. 4.—Paus. 10, c. 5.——A famous grove near Antioch, consecrated to voluptuousness and luxury.

DAPHNĒPHŎRIA, a festival in honor of Apollo, celebrated every ninth year by the Bœotians. It was then usual to adorn an olive bough with garlands of laurel and other flowers, and place on the top a brazen globe, on which were suspended smaller ones. In the middle was placed a number of crowns, and a globe of inferior size, and the bottom was adorned with a saffron colored garment. The globe on the top represented the Sun, or Apollo; that in the middle was an emblem of the moon, and the others of the stars. The crowns, which were 65 in number, represented the sun's annual revolutions. This bough was carried in solemn procession by a beautiful youth of an illustrious family, and whose parents were both living. The youth was dressed in rich garments which reached to the ground, his hair hung loose and dishevelled, his head was covered with a golden crown, and he wore on his feet shoes called Iphicratidæ, from Iphicrates an Athenian, who first invented them. He was called Δαφνηφόρος, laurel-bearer, and at that time he executed the office of priest of Apollo. He was preceded by one of his nearest relations, bearing a rod adorned with garlands, and behind him followed a train of virgins with branches in their hands. In this order the procession advanced as far as the temple of Apollo, surnamed Ismenius, where supplicatory hymns were sung to the god.—This festival owed its origin to the following circumstance; when an oracle advised the Ætolians, who inhabited Arne and the adjacent country, to abandon their ancient possessions, and go in quest of a settlement, they invaded the Theban territories, which at that time were pillaged by an army of Pelasgians. As the celebration of Apollo's festivals was near, both nations, who religiously observed it, laid aside all hostilities, and, according to custom, cut down laurel boughs from mount Helicon, and in the neighbourhood of the river Melas, and walked in procession in honor of the divinity. The day that this solemnity was observed, Polemates, the general of the Bœotian army, saw a youth in a dream that presented him with a complete suit of armour, and commanded the Bœotians to offer solemn prayers to Apollo, and walk in procession with with laurel boughs in their hands every ninth year. Three days after this dream, the Bœotian general made a ſally, and cut off the greateſt part of the beſiegers, who were compelled by this blow to relinquiſh their enterpriſe. Polemates immediately inſtituted a novennial feſtival to the god, who ſeemed to be the patron of the Bœotians. Pauſ. Bœotic. &c.

Daphnis, a ſhepherd of Sicily, ſon of Mercury by a Sicilian nymph. He was educated by the nymphs, Pan taught him to ſing and play upon the pipe, and the muſes inſpired him with the love of poetry. It is ſuppoſed he was the firſt who wrote paſtoral poetry, in which his ſucceſſor Theocritus ſo happily excelled. He was extremely fond of hunting; and at his death, five of his dogs, from their attachment to him, refuſed all aliments, and pined away. From the celebrity of this ſhepherd, the name of Daphnis has been appropriated by the poets, ancient and modern, to expreſs a perſon fond of rural employments, and of the peaceful innocence which accompanies the tending of flocks. Ælian. V. H. 10, c. 18.—Diod. 4. ——There was another ſhepherd on mount Ida of the ſame name changed into a rock, according to *Ovid. Daphnus, a river of Locris, into which the body of Heſiod was thrown after his murder. Plut. de Symp.——A phyſician who preferred a ſupper to a dinner, becauſe he ſuppoſed that the moon aſſiſted digeſtion. Athen. 7.

Daræba, a town of Arabia.

Darantasia, a town of Belgic Gaul, called alſo Forum Claudii, and now Motier.

Daraps, a king of the Gangaridæ, &c. Flacc. 6, v. 67.

Dardăni, the inhabitants of Dardania. ——Alſo a people of Mœſia very inimical to the neighbouring power of Macedonia. Liv. 26, c. 25. l. 27, c. 33. l. 31, c. 28. l. 40, c. 57.—Plin. 4, c. 1.

Dardănia, a town or country of Troas, from which the Trojans were called Dardani and Dardanidæ. There is alſo a country of the ſame name near Illyricum. This appellation is alſo applied to Samothrace. Virg. & Ovid. paſſim.—Strab. 7.

Dardănides, a name given to Æneas, as deſcended from Dardanus. The word, in the plural number, is applied to the Trojan women. Virg. Æn.

Dardanium, a promontory of Troas, called from the ſmall town of Dardanus, about ſeven miles from Abydos. The two caſtles built on each ſide of the ſtrait by the emperor Mahomet IV. A. D. 1659, gave the name of Dardanelles to the place. Strab. 13.

Dardănus, a ſon of Jupiter and Electra, who killed his brother Jaſius to obtain the kingdom of Etruria after the death of his reputed father Corytus, and fled to Samothrace, and thence to Aſia Minor, where he married Batia, the daughter of Teucer, king of Teucria. After the death of his father-in-law he aſcended the throne, and reigned 62 years. He built the city of Dardania, and was reckoned the founder of the kingdom of Troy. He was ſucceeded by Erichthonius. According to ſome, Corybas, his nephew, accompanied him to Teucria, where he introduced the worſhip of Cybele. Dardanus taught his ſubjects to worſhip Minerva; and he gave them two ſtatues of the goddeſs, one of which is well known by the name of Palladium. *Virg. Darētis, a country of Macedonia.

Daria, a town of Meſopotamia.

Dariaves, the name of Darius in Perſian. Strab. 16.

Dariobrigum, a town of Gaul, now Vennes in Britanny.

Darītæ, a people of Perſia. Herodot. 3, c. 92.

Darius, a noble ſatrap of Perſia, ſon of Hyſtaſpes, who conſpired with ſix other noblemen to deſtroy Smerdis, who uſurped the crown of Perſia after the death of Cambyſes. On the murder of the uſurper, the ſeven conſpirators univerſally agreed, that he whoſe horſe neighed firſt ſhould be appointed king. In conſequence of this reſolution, the groom of Darius previouſly led his maſter's horſe to a mare, at a place near which the ſeven noblemen were to paſs. On the morrow before ſun-riſe, when they proceeded all together, the horſe recollecting the mare, ſuddenly neighed; and at the ſame time a clap of thunder was heard, as if in approbation of the choice. The noblemen diſmounted from their horſes, and ſaluted Darius king; and a reſolution was made among them, that the king's wives and concubines ſhould be taken from no other family but that of the conſpirators, and that they ſhould for ever enjoy the unlimited privilege of being admitted into the king's preſence without previous introduction. Darius was 29 years old when he aſcended the throne, and he ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his activity and military accompliſhments. He beſieged Babylon; which he took, after a ſiege of 20 months, by the artifice of Zopyrus. From thence he marched againſt the Scythians, and in his way conquered Thrace. This expedition was unſucceſsful; and, after ſeveral loſſes and diſaſters in the wilds of Scythia, the king retired with ſhame, and ſoon after turned his arms againſt the Indians, whom he ſubdued. The burning of Sardis, which was a Grecian colony, incenſed the Athenians, and a war was kindled between Greece and Perſia. Darius was ſo exaſperated againſt the Greeks, that a ſervant every evening, by his order, repeated theſe words: "Remember, O king, to puniſh the Athenians." Mardonius, the king's ſon-in-law, was entruſted with the care of the war, but his army was deſtroyed by the Thracians; and Darius, more animated by his loſs, ſent a more conſiderable force, under the command of Datis and Artaphernes. They were conquered at the celebrated battle of Marathon, by 10,000 Athenians; and the Perſians loſt in that expedition no leſs than 206,000 men. Darius was not diſheartened by this ſevere blow, but he reſolved to carry on the war in perſon, and immediately ordered a ſtill larger army to be levied. He died in the midſt of his preparations, B. C. 485, after a reign of 36 years, in the 65th year of his age. Herodot. 1, 2, &c.—Diod. 1.—Juſtin. 1, c. 9.—Plut. in Ariſt.—C. Nep. in Miltiad.——The ſecond king of Perſia of that name, was alſo called Ochus, or Nothus, becauſe he was the illegitimate ſon of Artaxerxes by a concubine. Soon after the murder of Xerxes he aſcended the throne of Perſia, and married Paryſatis his ſiſter, a cruel and ambitious woman, by whom he had Artaxerxes Memnon, Ameſtris, and Cyrus the younger. He carried on many wars with ſucceſs, under the conduct of his generals and of his ſon Cyrus. He died B. C. 404, after a reign of 19 years, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Artaxerxes, who aſked him on his death bed, what had been the guide of his conduct in the management of the empire that he might imitate him? The dictates of juſtice and of religion, replied the expiring monarch. Juſtin. 5, c. 11.—Diod. 12.——The third of that name was the laſt king of Perſia, ſirnamed Codomanus. He was ſon of Arſanes and Syſigambis, and deſcended from Darius Nothus. The eunuch Bagoas raiſed him to the throne, though not nearly allied to the royal family, in hopes that he would be ſubſervient to his will; but he prepared to poiſon him, when he ſaw him deſpiſe his advice, and aim at independence. Darius diſcovered his perfidy, and made him drink the poiſon which he had prepared againſt his life. The peace of Darius was early diſturbed, and Alexander invaded Perſia to avenge the injuries which the Greeks had ſuffered from the predeceſſors of Darius. The king of Perſia met his adverſary in perſon, at the head of 600,000 men. This army was remarkable, more for its opulence and luxury, than for the military courage of its ſoldiers; and Athenæus mentions, that the camp of Darius was crowded with 277 cooks, 29 waiters, 87 cup-bearers, 40 ſervants to perfume the king, and 66 to prepare garlands and flowers to deck the diſhes and meats which appeared on the royal table. With theſe forces Darius met Alexander. A battle was fought near the Granicus, in which the Perſians were eaſily defeated. Another was ſoon after fought near Iſſus; and Alexander left 110,000 of the enemy dead on the field of battle, and took among the priſoners of war, the mother, wife, and children of Darius. The darkneſs of the night favored the retreat of Darius, and he ſaved himſelf by flying in diſguiſe, on the horſe of his arm-bearer. Theſe loſſes weakened, but diſcouraged not Darius: he aſſembled another more powerful army, and the laſt deciſive battle was fought at Arbela. The victory was long doubtful; but the intrepidity of Alexander, and the ſuperior valor of the Macedonians, prevailed over the effeminate Perſians; and Darius, ſenſible of his diſgrace and ruin, fled towards Media. His misfortunes were now completed. Beſſus, the governor of Bactriana, took away his life, in hopes of ſucceeding him on the throne; and Darius was found by the Macedonians in his chariot, covered with wounds, and almoſt expiring, B. C. 331. He aſked for water, and exclaimed, when he received it from the hand of a Macedonian, "It is the greateſt of my misfortunes that I cannot reward thy humanity. Beg Alexander to accept my warmeſt thanks, for the tenderneſs with which he has treated my wretched family, whilſt I am doomed to periſh by the hand of a man, whom I have loaded with kindneſs." Theſe words of the dying monarch, were reported to Alexander, who covered the dead body with his own mantle, and honored it with a moſt magnificent funeral. The traitor Beſſus met with a due puniſhment from the conqueror, who continued his his kindneſs to the unfortunate family of Darius. Darius has been accuſed of imprudence, for the imperious and arrogant manner in which he wrote his letters to Alexander, in the midſt of his misfortunes. In him the empire of Perſia was extinguiſhed 228 years after it had been firſt founded by Cyrus the Great. Diod. 17. —Plut. in Alex.—Juſtin. 10, 11, &c.—Curtius.——A ſon of Xerxes, who married Artaynta, and was killed by Artabanus. Herodot. 9, c. 108.—Diod. 11.——A ſon of Artaxerxes declared ſucceſſor to the throne, as being the eldeſt prince. DASIUS, a chief of Salapia, who favored Annibal. Liv. 26, c. 38

DASSARĔTÆ, DASSARĪTÆ, DASSARĒNI, or DASSARITII, a people of Illyricum, or Macedonia. Plut. in Flam.

DATĂMES, a ſon of Camiſſares, governor of Caria, and general of the armies of Artaxerxes. The influence of his enemies at court obliged him to fly for ſafety, after he had greatly ſignalized himſelf by his military exploits. He took up arms in his own defence, and the king made war againſt him. He was treacherouſly killed by Mithridates, who had invited him under pretence of entering into the moſt inviolable connection and friendſhip, 362 B. C. C. Nep. in Datam.

DATAPHERNES, one of the friends of Beſſus. After the murder of Darius, he betrayed Beſſus into Alexander's hands. He alſo revolted from the conqueror, and was delivered up by the Dahæ. Curt. 7, c. 5 & 8.

DATIS, a general of Darius 1ſt, ſent with an army of 200,000 foot, and 10,000 horſe, againſt the Greeks, in conjunction with Artaphernes. He was defeated at the celebrated battle of Marathon, by Miltiades and ſome time after put to death by the Spartans. C. Nep. in Milt.

DATOS, or DATON, a town of Thrace, on a ſmall eminence, near the Strymon. There is in the neighbourhood a fruitful plain, from which Proſerpine, according to ſome, was carried away by Pluto. That city was ſo rich, that the ancients generally made uſe of the word Datos, to expreſs abundance. When the king of Macedonia conquered it he called it Philippi, after his own name. Appian. de Civ.

DAVARA, a hill near mount Taurus, in Aſia Minor.

DAULIS, a nymph, from whom the city of Daulis in Phocis, antiently called Anacris, received its name. It was there that Philomela and Procne made Tereus eat the fleſh of his ſon, and hence the nightingale, into which Philomela was changed, is often called Daulias avis. Ovid. ep. 15, v. 154.—Strab. 9.—Pauſ. 10, c. 4.—Ptol. 3, c. 15. —Liv. 32, c. 18.—Plin. 4, c. 3.

DAUNI, a people on the eaſtern part of Italy, conquered by Daunus, from whom they received their name.

DAUNIA, a name given to the northern parts of Apulia, on the coaſt of the Adriatic. It receives its name from Daunus, who ſettled there, and is now called Capitanata. *Virg. DAUNUS, a ſon of Pilumnus and Danae. He came from Illyricum into Apulia, where he reigned over part of the country, which from him was called Daunia. Mela. 2, c. 4.—Strab. 5.——A river of Apulia, now Carapelle. Horat. 3, od. 30.

DAURĬFER & DAURISES, a brave general of Darius, treacherouſly killed by the Carians. Herodot. 5, c. 116, &c.

DAVUS, a comic character, in the Andria of Terence. Horat. 1, Sat. 10, v. 40.

DEBÆ, a nation of Arabia. Diod. 3.

DECAPOLIS, a diſtrict of Judea from its 10 cities. Plin. 5, c. 18.

DECEBĂLUS, a warlike king of the Daci, who made a ſucceſsful war againſt Domitian. He was conquered by Trajan, Domitian's ſucceſſor, and he obtained peace. His active ſpirit again kindled rebellion, and the Roman emperor marched againſt him, and defeated him. He deſtroyed himſelf, and his head was brought to Rome, and Dacia became a Roman province, A. D. 103. Dio. 68.

DECELEUM, now Biala Caſtro, a ſmall village of Attica, north of Athens; which, when in the hands of the Spartans, proved a very galling garriſon to the Athenians. The Peloponneſian war has occaſionally been called Decelean, becauſe for ſome time hoſtilities were carried on in its neighbourhood. C. Nep. 7, c. 4.

DECĔLUS, a man who informed Caſtor and Pollux, that their ſiſter, whom Theſeus had carried away, was concealed at Aphidnæ. Herodot. 9, c. 73.

DECEMVĬRI, ten magiſtrates of abſolute authority authority among the Romans. The privileges of the patricians raised dissatisfaction among the plebeians; who, though freed from the power of the Tarquins, still saw that the administration of justice depended upon the will and caprice of their superiors, without any written statute to direct them, and convince them that they were governed with equity and impartiality. The tribunes complained to the senate, and demanded that a code of laws might be framed for the use and benefit of the Roman people. This petition was complied with, and three ambassadors were sent to Athens, and to all the other Grecian states, to collect the laws of Solon; and of the other celebrated legislators of Greece. Upon the return of the commissioners, it was universally agreed, that ten new magistrates called Decemviri, should be elected from the senate, to put the project into execution. Their power was absolute; all other offices ceased after their election, and they presided over the city with regal authority. They were invested with the badges of the consul, in the enjoyment of which they succeeded by turns, and only one was preceded by the fasces, and had the power of assembling the senate, and confirming decrees. The first decemvirs were Appius Claudius, T. Genutius, P. Sextus, Sp. Veturius, C. Julius, A. Manlius, Ser. Sulpitius Pluriatius, T. Romulus, Sp. Posthumius, A. U. C. 303. Under them, the laws, which had been exposed to public view, that every citizen might speak his sentiments, were publicly approved of as constitutional, and ratified by the priests and augurs in the most solemn and religious manner. These laws were ten in number, and were engraved on tables of brass; two were afterwards added, and they were called the laws of the twelve tables, leges duodecim tabularum, and leges decemvirales. The decemviral power, which was beheld by all ranks of people with the greatest satisfaction, was continued; but in the third year after their creation, the decemvirs became odious, on account of their tyranny; and the attempt of Ap. Claudius to ravish Virginia, was followed by the total abolition of the office. The people were so exasperated against them, that they demanded them from the senate, to burn them alive. Consuls were again appointed, and tranquillity re-established in the state.——There were other officers in Rome, called decemvirs, who were originally appointed, in the absence of the prætor, to administer justice. Their appointment became afterwards necessary, and they generally assisted at sales called subhastationes, because a spear, hasta, was fixed at the door of the place where the goods were exposed to sale. They were called decemviri litibus judicandis. The officers whom Tarquin appointed to guard the Sibylline books, were also called decemviri. They were originally two in number, called duumviri, till the year of Rome 388, when their number was increased to ten, five of which were chosen from the plebeians, and five from the patricians. Sylla increased their number to fifteen, called quindecemvirs.

Decetia, a town of Gaul. Cæs.

Decia lex, was enacted by M. Decius the tribune, A. U. C. 442, to impower the people to appoint two proper persons to fit and repair the fleets.

L. Decidius Saxa, a Celtiberian in Cæsar's camp. Cæs. bell. Civ. 1.

Decineus, a celebrated soothsayer. Strab. 16.

Decius Mus, a celebrated Roman consul, who, after many glorious exploits, devoted himself to the gods manes for the safety of his country, in a battle against the Latins, 338 years B. C. His son Decius imitated his example, and devoted himself in like manner in his fourth consulship, when fighting against the Gauls and Samnites, B. C. 296. His grandson also did the same in the war against Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, B. C. 280. This action of devoting oneself, was of infinite service to the state. The soldiers were animated by the example, and induced to follow with intrepidity, a commander who, arrayed in an unusual dress, and addressing himself to the gods with solemn invocation, rushed into the thickest part of the enemy to meet his fate. Liv. 8, 9, &c.—Val. Max. 5, c. 6.—Polyb. 2.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 824.——Brutus, conducted Cæsar to the senate-house the day that he was murdered.——(Cn. Metius, Q. Trajanus) a native of Pannonia, sent by the emperor Philip, to appease a sedition in Mœsia. Instead of obeying his master's command, he assumed the imperial purple, and soon after marched against him, and at his death became the only emperor. He signalized himself against the Persians; and when he marched against the Goths, he pushed his horse in a deep marsh, from which he could not extricate himself, and he perished with all his army by the darts of the barbarians, A. D. 251, after a reign of two years. This monarch enjoyed the character of a brave man, and of a great disciplinarian; and by his justice and exemplary life, merited the title of Optimus, which a servile senate lavished upon him.

Decurio, a subaltern officer in the Roman armies. He commanded a decuria; which consisted of ten men, and was the third part of a turma, or the 30th part of a legio of horse, which was composed of 300 men. The badge of the Centurions was a vine rod or sapling, and each had a deputy called optio. There were certain magistrates in

In the provinces, called decuriones municipales, who formed a body to repreſent the Roman ſenate in free and corporate towns. They conſiſted of ten, whence the name; and their duty extended to watch over the intereſt of their fellow-citizens, and to increaſe the revenues of the commonwealth. Their court was called curia decurionum, and minor ſenatus; and their decrees, called decreta decurionum, where marked with two D. D. at the top. They generally ſtyled themſelves civitatum patres curiales, and honorati municipiorum ſenatores. They were elected with the ſame ceremonies as the Roman ſenators; they were to be at leaſt 25 years of age, and to be poſſeſſed of a certain ſum of money. The election happened on the calends of March.

DECUMATES AGRI, lands in Germany, which paid the 10th part of their value to the Romans. Tacit. G. 29.

DEDITAMĔNES, a friend of Alexander, made governor of Babylonia. Curt. 8, c. 3.

DEGIS, a brother of Decebalus king of the Daci. He came as ambaſſador to the court of Domitian. Martial. 5. ep. 3.

DĒJĂNĪRA, a daughter of Œneus, king of Ætolia. Her beauty procured her many admirers, and her father promiſed to give her in marriage to him only who proved to be the ſtrongeſt of all his competitors. Hercules obtained the prize, and married Dejanira, by whom he had three children, the moſt known of whom is Hyllus. As Dejanira was once travelling with her huſband, they were ſtopped by the ſwollen ſtreams of the Evenus, and the centaur Neſſus offered Hercules to convey her ſafe to the oppoſite ſhore. The hero conſented; but no ſooner had Neſſus gained the bank, than he attempted to offer violence to Dejanira, and to carry her away in the ſight of her huſband. Hercules, upon this, aimed, from the other ſhore, a poiſoned arrow at the ſeducer, and mortally wounded him. Neſſus, as he expired, wiſhed to avenge his death upon his murderer; and he gave Dejanira his tunic, which was covered with blood, poiſoned and infected by the arrow, obſerving, that it had the power of reclaiming a huſband from unlawful loves. Dejanira accepted the preſent; and when Hercules proved faithleſs to her bed, ſhe ſent him the centaur's tunic, which inſtantly cauſed his death. (Vid. Hercules.) Dejanira was ſo diſconſolate at the death of her huſband, which ſhe had ignorantly occaſioned, that ſhe deſtroyed herſelf. Ovid. Met. 8 & 9.—Diod. 4.—Senec. in Hercul.—Hygin. fab. 34.

DEICOON, a Trojan prince, intimate with Æneas. He was killed by Agamemnon. Homer. Il. 5, v. 534.——A ſon of Hercules and Megara. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

DĒĬDĂMĪA, a daughter of Lycomedes, king of Scyros. She bore a ſon called Pyrrhus, or Neoptolemus, to Achilles, who was diſguiſed at her father's court in women's cloaths, under the name of Pyrrha. Propert. 2, el. 9.—Apollod. 3, c. 13.——A daughter of Pyrrhus, killed by the Epirots. Polyæn.——A daughter of Adraſtus, king of Argos, called alſo Hippodamia.

DEILĒON, a companion of Hercules in his expedition againſt the Amazons. Flacc. 5, v. 115.

DEILŎCHUS, a ſon of Hercules.

DEIMĂCHUS, a ſon of Neleus and Chloris, killed by Hercules, Apollod. 1, c. 9.——The father of Enarette. Id. 1, c. 7.

DEIŎCES, a ſon of Phraortes, by whoſe means the Medes delivered themſelves from the yoke of the Aſſyrians. He preſided as judge among his countrymen, and his great popularity and love of equity raiſed him to the throne, and he made himſelf abſolute, B. C. 700. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Phraortes, after a reign of 53 years. He built Ecbatana according to Herodotus, and ſurrounded it with ſeven different walls, in the middle of which was the royal palace, Herodot. 1, c. 96, &c.—Polyæn.

DEIŎCHUS, a Greek captain, killed by Paris in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 15, v. 341.

DĒĬŎNE, the mother of Miletus by Apollo. Miletus is often called Deionides, on account of his mother. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 442.

DĒĬŎNEUS, a king of Phocis, who married Diomede, daughter of Xuthus, by whom he had Dia. He gave his daughter Dia in marriage to Ixion, who promiſed to make a preſent to his father-in-law. Deioneus accordingly viſited the houſe of Ixion, and was thrown into a large hole filled with burning coals, by his ſon-in-law. Hygin. fab. 48 & 241.—Apollod. 1, c. 7 & 9. l. 2, c. 4.

DĒĬŎPĒIA, a nymph, the faireſt of all the fourteen nymphs that attended upon Juno. The goddeſs promiſed her in marriage to Æolus the god of the winds, if he would deſtroy the fleet of Æneas, which was ſailing for Italy. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 76.——One of the attendant nymphs of Cyrene. Virg. G. 4, v. 343.

DEIOTĂRUS, a governor of Galatia, made king of that province by the Roman people. In the civil wars of Pompey and Cæſar, Deiotarus followed the intereſt of the former. After the battle of Pharſalia, Cæſar ſeverely reprimanded Deiotarus for his attachment to Pompey, deprived him of part of his kingdom, and left him only the bare title of royalty. When he was accuſed by his grandſon, of attempts upon Cæſar's life, Cicero ably defended him in the the Roman ſenate. He joined Brutus with a large army, and faithfully ſupported the republican cauſe. His wife was barren; but fearing that her huſband might die without iſſue, ſhe preſented him with a beautiful ſlave, and tenderly educated, as her own, the children of this union. Deiotarus died in an advanced old age. Strab. 12. ——Lucan. 5, v. 55.

DEĬPHĬLA. Vid. Deipyle.

DĒĬPHŎBE, a ſibyl of Cumæ, daughter of Glaucus. It is ſuppoſed that ſhe led Æneas to the infernal regions. (Vid. Sibyllæ)—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 36.

DĒĬPHŎBUS, a ſon of Priam and Hecuba, who, after the death of his brother Paris, married Helen. His wife unworthily betrayed him, and introduced into his chamber her old huſband Menelaus, to whom ſhe wiſhed to reconcile herſelf. He was ſhamefully mutilated and killed by Menelaus. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 495.—Homer. Il. 13.—— A ſon of Hippolytus, who purified Hercules after the murder of Iphitus. Apollod. 2, c. 6.

DEĬPHON, a brother of Triptolemus, ſon of Celeus and Metanira. When Ceres travelled over the world, ſhe ſtopped at his father's court, and undertook to nurſe him and bring him up. To reward the hoſpitality of Celeus, the goddeſs began to make his ſon immortal; and every evening ſhe placed him on burning coals, to purify him from whatever mortal particles he ſtill poſſeſſed. The uncommon growth of Deiphon aſtoniſhed Metanira, who wiſhed to ſee what Ceres did to make him ſo vigorous. She was frightened to ſee her ſon on burning coals, and the ſhrieks that ſhe uttered, diſturbed the myſterious operations of the goddeſs, and Deiphon periſhed in the flames. Apollod. 1, c. 5.——The huſband of Hyrnetho, daughter of Temenus, king of Argos. Id. 2, c. 7.

DELDON, a king of Myſia, defeated by Craſſus.

DĒLIA, a feſtival celebrated every fifth year in the iſland of Delos, in honor of Apollo. It was firſt inſtituted by Theſeus, who, at his return from Crete, placed a ſtatue there, which he had received from Ariadne. At the celebration, they crowned the ſtatue of the goddeſs with garlands, appointed a choir of muſic, and exhibited horſe races. They afterwards led a dance, in which they imitated, by their motions, the various windings of the Cretan labyrinth, from which Theſeus had extricated himſelf by Ariadne's aſſiſtance.——There was alſo another feſtival of the ſame name, yearly celebrated by the Athenians in Delos. It was alſo inſtituted by Theſeus, who, when he was going to Crete, made a vow, that if he returned victorious, he would yearly viſit, in a ſolemn manner, the temple of Delos. The perſons employed in this annual proceſſion were called Deliaſtæ and Theori. The ſhip, the ſame which carried Theſeus, and had been carefully preſerved by the Athenians, was called Theoria and Delias. When the ſhip was ready for the voyage, the prieſt of Apollo ſolemnly adorned the ſtern with garlands, and an univerſal luſtration was made all over the city. The Theori were crowned with laurels, and before them preceded men armed with axes, in commemoration of Theſeus, who had cleared the way from Trœzene to Athens, and delivered the country from robbers. When the ſhip arrived at Delos, they offered ſolemn ſacrifices to the god of the iſland, and celebrated a feſtival in his honor. After this, they retired to their ſhip, and ſailed back to Athens, where all the people of the city ran in crowds to meet them. Every appearance of feſtivity prevailed at their approach, and the citizens opened their doors, and proſtrated themſelves before the Deliaſtæ, as they walked in proceſſion. During this feſtival, it was unlawful to put to death any malefactor, and on that account the life of Socrates was prolonged for thirty days. *Xenophon. DELMĬNIUM, a town of Dalmatia. Flor. 4, c. 12.

DĒLOS, one of the Cyclades at the north of Naxos, was severally called Lagia, Ortygia, Asteria, Chlamidia, Pelasgia, Pyrpyle, Cynthus, and Cynæthus, and now bears the name of Sailles. It was called Delos from δηλος, because it suddenly made its appearance on the surface of the sea, by the power of Neptune, who, according to the mythologists, permitted Latona to bring forth there, when she was persecuted all over the earth, and could find no safe asylum. (Vid. Apollo.) The island is celebrated for the nativity of Apollo and Diana; and the solemnity with which the festivals of these deities were celebrated there, by the inhabitants of the neighbouring islands, and of the continent, is well known. One of the altars of Apollo, in the island, was reckoned among the seven wonders of the world. It had been erected by Apollo when only four years old, and made with the horns of goats, killed by Diana on mount Cynthus. It was unlawful to sacrifice any living creature upon that altar, which was religiously kept pure from blood and every pollution. The whole island of Delos was held in such veneration, that the Persians, who had pillaged and profaned all the temples of Greece, never offered violence to the temple of Apollo, but respected it with the most awful reverence. Apollo, whose image was in the shape of a dragon, delivered there oracles during the summer, in a plain manner, without any ambiguity or obscure meaning. No dogs, as Thucydides mentions, were permitted to enter the island. It was unlawful for a man to die, or for a child to be born there; and when the Athenians were ordered to purify the place, they dug up all the dead bodies that had been interred there, and transported them to the neighbouring islands. An edict was also issued, which commanded all persons laboring under any mortal or dangerous disease, to be instantly removed to the adjacent island called Rhane. Some mythologists suppose that Asteria, who changed herself into a quail, to avoid the importuning addresses of Jupiter, was metamorphosed into this island, originally called Ortygia ab ορτυξ, a quail. The people of Delos are described by Cicero Acad. 2, c. 16 & 18. l. 4, c. 18, as famous for rearing hens. Strab. 8 & 10. —*Ovid. DELPHI, now Castri, a town of Phocis, situate in a valley at the south-west side of mount Parnassus. It was also called Pytho, because the serpent Python was killed there; and it received the name of Delphi, from Delphus, the son of Apollo. Some have also called it Parnassia Nape, the valley of Parnassus. It was famous for a temple of Apollo, and for an oracle celebrated in every age and country. The origin of the oracle, though fabulous, is described as something wonderful. A number of goats that were feeding on mount Parnassus, came near a place which had a deep and long perforation. The steam which issued from the hole, seemed to inspire the goats, and they played and frisked about in such an uncommon manner, that the goatherd was tempted to lean on the hole, and see what mysteries the place contained. He was immediately seized with a fit of enthusiasm, his expressions were wild and extravagant, and passed for prophecies. This circumstance was soon known about the country, and many experienced the same enthusiastic inspiration. The place was revered, and a temple was soon after erected in honor of Apollo, and a city built. According to some accounts, Apollo was not the first who gave oracles there; but Terra, Neptune, Themis, and Phœbe, were in possession of the place before the son of Latona. The oracles were generally given in verse; but when it had been sarcastically observed, that the god and patron of poetry was the most imperfect poet in the world, the priestess delivered her answers in prose. The oracles were always delivered by a priestess called Pythia. (Vid. Pythia.) The temple was built and destroyed several times. It was customary for those who consulted the oracle to make rich presents to the god of Delphi; and no monarch distinguished himself more by his donations than Crœsus. This sacred repository of opulence, was often the object of plunder; and the people of Phocis seized 10,000 talents from it, and Nero carried away no less than 500 statues of brass, partly of the gods, and partly of the most illustrious heroes. In another age, Constantine the Great removed its most splendid ornaments to his new capital. It was universally believed, and supported, by the antients, that Delphi was in the middle of the earth; and on that account it was called terræ umbilicus. This, according to mythology, was first found out by two doves, which Jupiter had let loose from the two extremities of the earth, and which met at the place where the temple of Delphi was built. Apollon. 2, v. 706.—Diod. 16.—Plut. de defect. orac. &c.—Paus. 10, c. 6, &c.—*Ovid. DELTA, a part of Egypt, which received that name from its reſemblance to the form of the fourth letter of the Greek alphabet. It lies between the Canopian and Peluſian mouths of the Nile, and begins to be formed where the river divides itſelf into ſeveral ſtreams. It has been formed totally by the mud and ſand, which are waſhed down from the upper parts of Egypt by the Nile, according to antient tradition. *Cæſ. DEMĂDES, an Athenian, who, from a ſailor, became an eloquent orator, and obtained much influence in the ſtate. He was taken priſoner at the battle of Cheronæa, by Philip, and ingratiated himſelf into the favor of that prince, by whom he was greatly eſteemed. DEMARĀTUS, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Ariſton on the throne of Sparta, B. C. 526. He was baniſhed by the intrigues of Cleomenes, his royal colleague, as being illegitimate. He retired into Aſia, and was kindly received by Darius ſon of Hyſtaſpes king of Perſia. When the Perſian monarch made preparations to invade Greece, Demaratus, though perſecuted by the Lacedæmonians, informed them of the hoſtilities which hung over their head. Herodot. 5, c. 75, &c. l. 6, c. 50, &c.——A rich citizen of Corinth, of the family of the Bacchiadæ. DEMETRIA, a feſtival in honor of Ceres, called by the Greeks Demeter. It was then cuſtomary for the votaries of the goddeſs to laſh themſelves with whips made with the bark of trees. The Athenians had a ſolemnity of the ſame name, in honor of Demetrius Poliorcetes.

DĒMĒTRIAS, a town of Theſſaly.—The name was common to other places.

DĒMĒTRIUS, a ſon of Antigonus and Stratonice, ſirnamed Poliorcetes, deſtroyer of towns. At the age of 22, he was ſent by his father againſt Ptolemy, who invaded Syria. He was defeated near Gaza; but he ſoon repaired his loſs, by a victory over one of the generals of the enemy. He afterwards ſailed with a fleet of 250 ſhips to Athens, and reſtored the Athenians to liberty, by freeing them from the power of Caſſander and Ptolemy, and expelling the garriſon, which was ſtationed there under Demetrius Phalereus. After this ſucceſsful expedition, he beſieged and took Munychia, and defeated Caſſander at Thermopylæ. His reception at Athens, after theſe victories, was attended with the greateſt ſervility; and the Athenians were not aſhamed to raiſe altars to him as to a god, and to conſult his oracles. This uncommon ſucceſs raiſed the jealouſy of the ſucceſſors of Alexander; and Seleucus, Caſſander, and Lyſimachus, united to deſtroy Antigonus and his ſon. Their hoſtile armies met at Ipſus, B. C. 301. Antigonus was killed in the battle; and Demetrius, after a ſevere loſs, retired to Epheſus. His ill ſucceſs raiſed him many enemies; and the Athenians, who had lately adored him as a god, refuſed to admit him into their city. He ſoon after ravaged the territories of Lyſimachus, and reconciled himſelf to Seleucus, to whom he gave his daughter Stratonice in marriage. Athens now labored under tyranny; and Demetrius relieved it, and pardoned the inhabitants. The loſs of his poſſeſſions in Aſia recalled him from Greece, and he eſtabliſhed himſelf on the throne of Macedonia, by the murder of Alexander the ſon of Caſſander. Here he was continually at war with the neighbouring ſtates; and the ſuperior power of his adverſaries obliged him to leave Macedonia, after he had ſat on the throne for ſeven years. He paſſed into Aſia, and attacked ſome of the provinces of Lyſimachus with various ſucceſs; but famine and peſtilence deſtroyed the greateſt part of his army, and he retired to the court of Seleucus for ſupport and aſſiſtance. He met with a kind reception, but hoſtilities were ſoon begun; and after he had gained ſome advantages over his ſon-in-law, Demetrius was totally forſaken by his troops in the field of battle, and became an eaſy prey to the enemy. Though he was kept in confinement by his ſon-in-law, yet he maintained himſelf like a prince, and paſſed his time in hunting and in every laborious exerciſe. His ſon Antigonus offered Seleucus all his poſſeſſions, and even his perſon, to procure his father's liberty; but all proved unavailing, and Demetrius died in the 54th year of his age, after a confinement of three years, 286 B. C. His remains were given to Antigonus, and honored with a ſplendid funeral pomp at Corinth, and thence conveyed to Demetrias. His poſterity remained in poſſeſſion of the Macedonian throne till the age of Perſeus, who was conquered by the Romans. Demetrius has rendered himſelf famous for his fondneſs of diſſipation when among the diſſolute, and his love of virtue and military glory in the field of battle. He has been commended as a great warrior; and his ingenious inventions, his warlike engines, and ſtupendous machines in his war with the Rhodians, juſtify his claims to that perfect character. He has been blamed for his voluptuous indulgences; and his biographer obſerves, that no Grecian prince had more wives and concubines than Poliorcetes. His obedience and reverence to his father have been juſtly admired; and it has been obſerved, that Antigonus ordered the ambaſſadors of a foreign prince particularly to remark the cordiality and friendſhip which ſubſiſted between him and his ſon. Plut. in vitâ.—Diod. 17.—Juſtin. 1, c. 17, &c.——A prince who ſucceeded his father Antigonus on the throne of Macedonia. His modeſty delivered his father from a heavy accuſation laid before the Roman ſenate. When he returned to Macedonia, he was falſely accuſed by his brother Perſeus, who was jealous of his popularity, and his father too credulouſly conſented to his death, B. C. 180. Liv. 40, c. 20.—Juſtin. 32, c. 2.——A Magneſian.——A ſervant of Caſſius.——A ſon of Demetrius of Cyrene.——A freed man of Pompey.——A ſon of Demetrius, ſirnamed Slender.——A prince, ſirnamed Soter, was ſon of Seleucus Philopater, the ſon of Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. His father gave him as a hoſtage to the Romans. After the death of Seleucus, Antiochus Epiphanes, the deceaſed monarch's brother, uſurped the kingdom of Syria, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Antiochus Eupator. This uſurpation diſpleaſed Demetrius, who was detained at Rome; he procured his liberty on pretence of going to hunt, and fled to Syria, where the troops received him as their lawful ſovereign, B. C. 162. He put to death Eupator and Lyſias, and eſtabliſhed himſelf on his throne by cruelty and oppreſſion. Alexander Bala, the ſon of Antiochus Epiphanes, laid claims upon the crown of Syria, and defeated Demetrius in a battle, in the 12th year of his reign. Strab. 16.—Appian.—Juſtin. 34, c. 3.——The 2d, ſirnamed Nicanor, or Conqueror, was ſon of Soter, to whom he ſucceeded by the aſſiſtance of Ptolemy Philometor, after he had driven the uſurper Alexander Bala, B. C. 146. He married Cleopatra, the daughter of Ptolemy; who was, before, the wife of the expelled monarch. Demetrius gave himſelf up to luxury and voluptuouſneſs, and ſuffered his kingdom to be governed by his favorites. At that time a pretended ſon of Bala, called Diodorus Tryphon, ſeized a part of Syria; and Demetrius, to oppoſe his antagoniſt, made an alliance with the Jews, and marched into the eaſt, where he was taken by the Parthians. Phraates, king of Parthia, gave him his daughter Rhodogyne in marriage; and Cleopatra was ſo incenſed at this new connection, that ſhe gave herſelf up to Antiochus Sidetes, her brother-in-law, and married him. Sidetes was killed in a battle againſt the Parthians, and Demetrius regained the poſſeſſion of his kingdom. His pride and oppreſſion rendered him odious, and his ſubjects aſked a king of the houſe of Seleucus, from Ptolemy Phyſcon, king of Egypt; and Demetrius, unable to reſiſt the power of his enemies, fled to Ptolemais, which was then in the hands of his wife Cleopatra. The gates were ſhut up againſt his approach, by Cleopatra; and he was killed by order of the governor of Tyre, whither he had fled for protection. He was ſucceeded by Alexander Zebina, whom Ptolemy had raiſed to the throne, B. C. 127. Juſtin. 36, &c.—Appian. de bell. Sy.—Joſeph.——The 3d, ſirnamed Eucerus, was ſon of Antiochus Gryphus. After the example of his brother Philip, who had ſeized Syria, he made himſelf maſter of Damaſcus, B. C. 93, and ſoon after obtained a victory over his brother. He was taken in a battle againſt the Parthians, and died in captivity. Joſeph. 1.——Phalereus, a diſciple of Theophraſtus, who gained ſuch an influence over the Athenians, by his eloquence, and the purity of his manners, that he was elected decennial archon, B. C. 317. He ſo embelliſhed the city, and rendered himſelf ſo popular by his munificence, that the Athenians raiſed 360 brazen ſtatues to his honor. Yet in the midſt of all this popularity, his enemies raiſed a ſedition againſt him, and he was condemned to death, and all his ſtatues thrown down, down, after obtaining the sovereign power for 10 years. He fled without concern or mortification to the court of Ptolemy Lagus, where he met with kindness and cordiality. The Egyptian monarch consulted him concerning the succession of his children; and Demetrius advised him to raise to the throne the children of Eurydice, in preference to the offspring of Berenice. This counsel so irritated Philadelphus, the son of Berenice, that after his father's death he sent the philosopher into Upper Egypt, and there detained him in strict confinement. Demetrius, tired with his situation, put an end to his life by the bite of an asp, 284 B. C. According to some, Demetrius enjoyed the confidence of Philadelphus, and enriched his library at Alexandria with 200,000 volumes. All the works of Demetrius, on rhetoric, history, and eloquence, are lost; and the treatise on rhetoric, falsely attributed to him, is by some supposed to be the composition of Halicarnassus. The last edition of this treatise is that of Glasgow, 8vo. 1743. Diog. in vitâ.—Cic. in Brut. & de offic. 1.—Plut. in exil.——A Cynic philosopher, disciple of Apollonius Thyaneus, in the age of Caligula. Vespasian was displeased with his insolence, and banished him to an island. The Cynic derided the punishment, and bitterly inveighed against the emperor. DEMO, a Sibyl of Cumæ.

DEMOANASSA, the mother of Ægialeus.

DEMOCĒDES, a celebrated physician of Crotona, son of Calliphon, and intimate with Polycrates. He was carried as a prisoner from Samos to Darius king of Persia, where he acquired great riches and much reputation by curing the king's foot, and the breast of Atossa. He was sent to Greece as a spy by the king, and fled away to Crotona, where he married the daughter of the wrestler Milo. Ælian. V. H. 8, c. 18.—Herodot. 3, c. 124, &c.

DĒMŎCHĂRES, an Athenian sent with some of his countrymen with an embassy to Philip king of Macedonia. The monarch gave them audience; and when he asked them what he could do to please the people of Athens? Democharcs replied, "Hang yourself." This impudence raised the indignation of all the hearers; but Philip mildly dismissed them, and bade them ask their countrymen, which deserved most the appellation of wise and moderate, either they who gave such ill language, or he who received it without any signs of resentment? Senec. de Ira. 3.—*Ælian. DĒMŎCRĂTES, an architect of Alexandria.——A wrestler. Ælian. V. H. 4, c. 15.——An Athenian who fought on the side of Darius, against the Macedonians. Curt. 6, c. 5.

DĒMŎCRĬTUS, a celebrated philosopher of Abdera, disciple to Leucippus. He travelled over the greatest part of Europe, Asia, and Africa, in quest of knowledge, and returned home in the greatest poverty. There was a law at Abdera, which deprived of the honor of a funeral the man who had reduced himself to indigence; and Democritus, to avoid ignominy, repeated before his countrymen one of his compositions called Diacosmus. It was received with such uncommon applause, that he was presented with 500 talents; statues were erected in his honor; and a decree passed, that the expences of his funeral should be paid from the public treasury. He retired to a garden near the city, where he dedicated his time to study and solitude; and he put out his eyes, to apply himself more closely to philosophical enquiries. He was accused of insanity, and Hippocrates was ordered to enquire into the nature of his disorder. The physician had a conference with the philosopher, and declared that not Democritus, but his enemies were insane. He continually laughed at the follies and vanity of mankind, who distract themselves with care, and are at once a prey to hope and to anxiety. He told Darius, who was inconsolable for the loss of his wife, that he would raise her from the dead, if he could find three persons who had gone through life without adversity, whose names he might engrave on the queen's monument. The king's enquiries to find such persons proved unavailing, and the philosopher in some manner soothed the sorrow of his sovereign. He taught his disciples, that the soul died with the body; and therefore, as he gave no credit to the existence of ghosts, some youths, to try his fortitude, dressed themselves in a hideous and deformed habit, and approached his cave in the dead of night, with whatever could create terror and astonishment. The philosopher received them unmoved; and without even looking at them, he desired them to cease making themselves such objects of ridicule and folly. He died in the 109th year of his age, B. C. 361. His father was so rich, that he entertained Xerxes, with all his army, as he was marching against Greece. All the works of Democritus are lost. He was the author of the doctrine of atoms, and first taught that the milky way was occasioned by a confused light from a multitude of stars. He may be considered as the parent of experimental philosophy, in the prosecution of which he showed himself so ardent that he declared he would prefer the discovery of one of the causes of the works of nature, to the diadem of Persia. He made artificial emeralds, and tinged them with various colors, he likewise dissolved stones, and softened ivory. Euseb. 14, c. 27.—Diog. in vitâ.—*Ælian. V. DĒMŎPHĬLUS, an Athenian archon.—An officer of Agathocles. Diod. 19.

DĒMŎPHON, an Athenian who assisted the Thebans in recovering Cadmea, &c. Diod. 15.

DĒMŎPHOON, son of Theseus and Phædra, was king of Athens, B. C. 1182, and reigned 33 years. At his return from the Trojan war, he visited Thrace, where he was tenderly received and treated by Phyllis. He retired to Athens, and forgot the kindness and love of Phyllis, who hanged herself in despair. Ovid. Heroid. 2.—Paus. 10, c. 25.——A friend of Æneas, killed by Camilla. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 675.

DĒMŎPŎLIS, a son of Themistocles. Plut. in Them.

DĒMOS, a place of Ithaca.

DĒMOSTHĔNES, a celebrated Athenian, son of a rich black-smith, called Demosthenes, and of Cleobule. He was but seven years of age when his father died. His guardians negligently managed his affairs, and embezzled the greatest part of his possessions. His education was totally neglected; and for whatever advances he made in learning, he was indebted to his industry and application. He became the pupil of Isæus and Plato, and applied himself to study the orations of Isocrates. At the age of 17 he gave an early proof of his eloquence and abilities against his guardians, from whom he obtained the retribution of the greatest part of his estate. His rising talents were however impeded by weak lungs, and a difficulty of pronunciation, especially of the letter ρ, but these obstacles were soon conquered by unwearied application. To correct the stammering of his voice, he spoke with pebbles in his mouth; and removed the distortion of his features, which accompanied his utterance, by watching the motions of his countenance in a looking-glass. That his pronunciation might be loud and full of emphasis, he frequently ran up the steepest and most unevenwalks, wherehis voice acquired force and energy; and on the ſea-ſhore, when the waves were violently agitated, he declaimed aloud, to accuſtom himſelf to the noiſe and tumults of a public aſſembly. He alſo confined himſelf in a ſubterraneous cave, to devote himſelf more cloſely to ſtudious purſuits; and to eradicate all curioſity of appearing in public, he ſhaved one half of his head. In this ſolitary retirement, by the help of a glimmering lamp, he compoſed the greateſt part of his orations, which have ever been the admiration of every age, though his cotemporaries and rivals ſeverely inveighed againſt them, and obſerved that they ſmelt of oil. His abilities, as an orator, raiſed him to conſequence at Athens, and he was ſoon placed at the head of the government. In this public capacity he rouſed his countrymen from their indolence, and animated them againſt the encroachments of Philip of Macedonia. In the battle of Cheronæa, however, Demoſthenes betrayed his puſillanimity, and ſaved his life by flight. After the death of Philip, he declared himſelf warmly againſt his ſon and ſucceſſor, Alexander, whom he branded with the appellation of boy; and when the Macedonians demanded of the Athenians their orators, Demoſthenes reminded his countrymen of the fable of the ſheep which delivered their dogs to the wolves. Though he had boaſted that all the gold of Macedonia could not tempt him; yet he ſuffered himſelf to be bribed by a ſmall golden cup from Harpalus. The tumults which this occaſioned, forced him to retire from Athens; and in his baniſhment, which he paſſed at Trœzene and Ægina, he lived with more effeminacy than true heroiſm. When Antipater made war againſt Greece, after the death of Alexander, Demoſthenes was publicly recalled from his exile, and a galley was ſent to fetch him from Ægina. His return was attended with much ſplendor, and all the citizens crowded at the Piræus to ſee him land. His triumph and popularity however were ſhort. Antipater and Craterus were near Athens, and demanded all the orators to be delivered up into their hands. Demoſthenes with all his adherents fled to the temple of Neptune in Calauria; and when he ſaw that all hopes of ſafety were baniſhed, he took a doſe of poiſon, which he always carried in a quill, and expired on the day that the Theſmophoria were celebrated, in the 60th year of his age, A. C. 322. The Athenians raiſed a brazen ſtatue to his honor, with an inſcription tranſcribed into this diſtich:

Si tibi par menti robur, Vir magne, fuiſſet, Græcia non Macedæ ſuccubuiſſet hero.

Demoſthenes has been deſervedly called the prince of orators; and Cicero, his ſucceſsful rival among the Romans, calls him a perfect model, and ſuch as he wiſhed to be. Theſe two great princes of eloquence have often been compared together; but the judgment heſitates to which to give the preference. They both arrived at perfection; but the meaſures by which they obtained it, were diametrically oppoſite. Demoſthenes has been compared, and with propriety, by his rival Æſchines, to a Siren, from the melody of his expreſſions. No orator can be ſaid to have expreſſed the various paſſions of hatred, reſentment, or indignation, with more energy than he; and as a proof of his uncommon application, it need only be mentioned, that he tranſcribed eight or even 10 times the hiſtory of Thucydides, that he might not only imitate, but poſſeſs the force and energy of the great hiſtorian. The beſt editions of his works are that of Wolfius, fol. Frankof. 1604; that left unfiniſhed by Taylor, Cantab. 4to. and that publiſhed in 12 vols. 8vo. 1720, &c. Lipſ. by Reiſke and his widow. Many of the orations of Demoſthenes have been publiſhed ſeparately. Plut. in Vitâ.—Diod. 16.—Cic. in Orat. &c.—Pauſ. 1, c 8. l. 2, c. 33.——An Athenian general, ſent to ſucceed Alcibiades in Sicily. He attacked Syracuſe with Nicias, but his efforts were ineffectual. After many calamities he fell into the enemy's hands, and his army was confined to hard labor. The accounts about the death of Demoſthenes are various; ſome believe that he ſtabbed himſelf, whilſt others ſuppoſe that he was put to death by the Syracuſans, B. C. 413. Plut. in Nic.——Thucyd. 4, &c.—Diod. 12.——The father of the orator Demoſthenes. DERCE, a fountain in Spain, whoſe waters were ſaid to be uncommonly cold.

DERCENNUS, an ancient king in Latium. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 850.

DERCĔTO & DERCĔTIS, a goddeſs of Syria, called alſo Atergatis, whom ſome ſuppoſed to be the ſame as Aſtarte. She was repreſented as a beautiful woman above the waiſt, and the lower part terminated in a fiſh's tail. According to Diodorus, Venus, whom ſhe had offended, made her paſſionately fond of a young prieſt, remarkable for the beauty of his features. She had a daughter by him, and became ſo aſhamed of her incontinence, that ſhe removed her lover, expoſed the fruit of her amour, and threw herſelf into a lake. Her body was transformed into a fiſh, and her child was preſerved, and called Semiramis. As ſhe was chiefly worſhipped in Syria, and repreſented like a fiſh, the Syrians antiently abſtained from fiſhes. Lucian. de Dea Syr.—Plin. 5, c. 13.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 44.—Diod. 2.

DERCYLLĬDAS, a general of Sparta, celebrated for his military exploits. He took nine different cities in eight days, and freed Cherſoneſus from the inroads of the Thracians by building a wall acroſs the country. He lived B. C. 399. Diod. 14.—Xenoph. Hiſt. Græc. 1, &c.

DEVA, a town of Britain, now Cheſter, on the Dee.

DEUCĂLION, a ſon of Prometheus, who married Pyrrha the daughter of Epimetheus. He reigned over part of Theſſaly, and in his age the whole earth was overwhelmed with a deluge. The impiety of mankind had irritated Jupiter, who reſolved to deſtroy mankind, and immediately the earth exhibited a boundleſs ſcene of waters. The higheſt mountains were climbed up by the frightened inhabitants of the country; but this ſeeming place of ſecurity was ſoon overtopped by the riſing waters, and no hope was left of eſcaping the univerſal calamity. Prometheus adviſed his ſon to make himſelf a ſhip, and by this means he ſaved himſelf and his wife Pyrrha. The veſſel was toſſed about during nine ſucceſſive days, and at laſt ſtopped on the top of mount Parnaſſus, where Deucalion remained till the waters had ſubſided. Pindar and Ovid make no mention of a veſſel built by the advice of Prometheus; but, according to their relation, Deucalion ſaved his life by taking refuge on the top of Parnaſſus, or according to Hyginus, of Ætna in Sicily. As ſoon as the waters had retired from the ſurface of the earth, Deucalion and his wife went to conſult the oracle of Themis, and were directed to repair the loſs of mankind, by throwing behind them the bones of their grandmother. This was nothing but the ſtones of the earth; and after ſome heſitation about the meaning of the oracle, they obeyed. The ſtones thrown by Deucalion became men, and thoſe of Pyrrha women. According to Juſtin, Deucalion was not the only one who eſcaped from the univerſal calamity. Many ſaved their lives by aſcending the higheſt mountains, or truſting themſelves in ſmall veſſels to the mercy of the waters. This deluge, which chiefly happened in Theſſaly, according to the relation of ſome writers, was produced by the inundation of the waters of the river Peneus, whoſe regular courſe was ſtopped by an earthquake near mount Oſſa and Olympus. According to Xenophon, there were no leſs than five deluges. The firſt happened under Ogyges, and laſted three months. The ſecond, which was in the age of Hercules and Prometheus, continued but one month. During the third, which happened in the reign of another Ogyges, all Attica was laid waſte by the waters. Theſſaly was totally covered by the waters during the fourth, which happened in the age of Deucalion. The laſt was during the Trojan war, and its effects were ſeverely felt by the inhabitants of Egypt. There prevailed a report in Attica, that the waters of Deucalion's deluge had diſappeared through a ſmall aperture about a cubit wide, near Jupiter Olympius's temple; and Pauſanias, who ſaw it, further adds, that a yearly offering of flour and honey was thrown into it with religious ceremony. The deluge of Deucalion, ſo much celebrated in antient hiſtory, is ſuppoſed to have happened 1503 years B. C. *Ovid. DIAGONDAS, a Theban who aboliſhed all nocturnal ſacrifices. Cic. de Leg 2, c. 15.

DIĂGŎRAS, an Athenian philoſopher. His father's name was Teleclytus. From the greateſt ſuperſtition, he became a moſt unconquerable atheiſt; becauſe he ſaw a man who laid a falſe claim to one of his poems, and who perjured himſelf, go unpuniſhed. His great impiety and blaſphemies provoked his countrymen, and the Areopagites promiſed one talent to him who brought his head before their tribunal, and two if he were produced alive. He lived about 416 years before Chriſt. Cic. de Nat. D. 1, c 23. l. 3, c. 37, &c.—Val. Max. 1, c. 1.——An Athlete of Rhodes, 460 years before the Chriſtian æra. DIĀLIS, a prieſt of Jupiter at Rome, firſt inſtituted by Numa. Dionyſ. 2.—Liv. 1, c. 20.

DIALLUS, an Athenian, who wrote an hiſtory of all the memorable occurrences of his age.

DIAMASTIGŌSIS, a feſtival at Sparta in honor of Diana Orthia, which received that name, απο του μαστιγουν from whipping, becauſe boys were whipped before the altar of the goddeſs. Theſe boys, called Bomonicæ, were originally free-born Spartans; but, in the more delicate ages, they were of mean birth, and generally of a ſlaviſh origin. This operation was performed by an officer in a ſevere and unfeeling manner; and that no compaſſion ſhould be raiſed, the prieſt ſtood near the altar with a ſmall light ſtatue of the goddeſs, which ſuddenly became heavy and inſupportable if the laſh of the whip was more lenient or leſs rigorous. The parents of the children attended the ſolemnity, and exhorted them not to commit any thing either by fear or groans, that might be unworthy of Laconian education. Theſe flagellations were ſo ſevere, that the blood guſhed in profuſe torrents, and many expired under the laſh of the whip without uttering a groan, or betraying any marks of fear. Such a death was reckoned very honorable, and the corpſe was buried with much ſolemnity, with a garland of flowers on its head. The origin of this feſtival is unknown. Some ſuppoſe, that Lycurgus firſt inſtituted it to inure the youths of Lacedæmon to bear labor and fatigue, and render them inſenſible to pain and wounds Others maintain, that it was a mitigation of an oracle, which ordered that human blood ſhould be ſhed on Diana's altar; and, according to their opinion, Oreſtes firſt introduced that barbarous cuſtom, after he had brought the ſtatue of Diana Taurica into Greece. There is another tradition which mentions, that Pauſanias, as he was offering prayers and ſacrifices to the gods, before he engaged with Mardonius, was ſuddenly attacked by a number of Lydians who diſturbed the ſacrifice, and were at laſt repelled with ſtaves and ſtones, the only weapons with which the Lacedæmonians were provided at that moment. In commemoration of this, therefore, that whipping of boys was inſtituted at Sparta, and after that the Lydian proceſſion.

DIĀNA was the goddeſs of hunting. According to Cicero, there were three of this name; a daughter of Jupiter and Proſerpine, who became mother of Cupid; a daughter of Jupiter and Latona, and a daughter of Upis and Glauce. The ſecond is the moſt celebrated, and to her all the antients allude. She was born at the ſame birth as Apollo; and the pains which ſhe ſaw her mother ſuffer during her labor, gave her ſuch an averſion to marriage, that ſhe obtained from her father the permiſſion to live in perpetual celibacy, and to preſide over the travails of women To ſhun the ſociety of men, ſhe devoted herſelf to hunting, and was always accompanied by a number of choſen virgins, who, like herſelf, abjured the uſe of marriage. She is repreſented with a quiver, and attended with dogs, and ſometimes drawn in a chariot by two white ſtags. Sometimes ſhe appears with wings, holding a lion in one hand, and a panther in the other, with a chariot drawn by two heifers, or two horſes of different colors. She is repreſented taller by the head than her attendant nymphs, her face has ſomething manly, her legs are bare, well ſhaped and ſtrong, and her feet are covered with a buſkin, worn by huntreſſes among the antients. Diana received many ſirnames, particularly from the places where her worſhip was eſtabliſhed, and from the functions over which ſhe preſided. She was called Lucina, Ilythia, or Juno Pronuba, when invoked by women in child-bed, and Trivia when worſhipped in the croſs-ways where her ſtatues were generally erected. She was ſuppoſed to be the ſame as the moon, and Proſerpine or Hecate, and from that circumſtance ſhe was called Triformis; and ſome of her ſtatues repreſented her with three heads, that of a horſe, a dog, and a boar. Her power and functions, under theſe three characters, have been beautifully expreſſed in theſe two verſes:

Terret, luſtrat, agit, Proſerpina, Luna, Diana,
Ima, ſuprema, feras, ſceptro, fulgore, ſagittâ.

She was alſo called Agrotera, Orthia, Taurica, Delia, Cynthia, Aricia, &c. She was ſuppoſed to be the ſame as the Iſis of the Egyptians, whoſe worſhip was introduced into Greece with that of Oſiris under the name of Apollo. When Typhon waged war againſt the gods, Diana is ſaid to have metamorphoſed herſelf into a cat, to avoid his fury. The goddeſs is generally known in the figures that repreſent her, by the creſcent on her head, by the dogs which attend her, and by her hunting habit. The moſt famous of her temples was that of Epheſus, which was one of the ſeven wonders of the world. (Vid. Epheſus.) She was there repreſented with a great number of breaſts, and other ſymbols which ſignified the earth or Cybele. Though ſhe was the patroneſs of chaſtity, yet ſhe forgot her dignity to enjoy the company of Endymion, and the very familiar favors which ſhe granted to Pan and Orion are well known. (Vid. Endymion, Pan, Orion.) The inhabitants of Tauriea were particularly attached to the worſhip of this goddeſs, and they cruelly offered on her altar all the ſtrangers that were ſhipwrecked on their coaſts. Her temple in Aricia was ſerved by a prieſt who had always murdered his predeceſſor, and the Lacedæmonians yearly offered her human victims till the age of Lycurgus, who changed this barbarous cuſtom for the ſacrifice of flagellation. The Athenians generally offered her goats, and others a white kid, and ſometimes a boar pig, or an ox. Among plants the poppy and the ditamy were ſacred to her. She, as well as her brother Apollo, had ſome oracles, among which thoſe of Egypt, Cilicia, and Epheſus, are the moſt known. *Ovid. DICE, one of the Horæ, daughters of Jupiter. Apollod. 1, c. 3.

DICEARCHUS, a Meſſenian famous for his knowledge of philoſophy, hiſtory, and mathematics. He was one of Ariſtotle's diſciples. Nothing remains of his numerous compoſitions. He had compoſed an hiſtory of the Spartan republic, which was publicly read over every year by order of the magiſtrates, for the improvement and inſtruction of youth.

DICENEUS, an Egyptian philoſopher in the age of Auguſtus, who travelled into Scythia, where he ingratiated himſelf with the king of the country, and by his inſtructions ſoftened the wildneſs and ruſticity of his manners. He alſo gained ſuch an influence over the multitude, that they all deſtroyed the vines which grew in their country, to prevent the riot of diſſipation, which the wine occaſioned among them. He wrote all his maxims and his laws in a book, that they might not loſe the benefit of them after his death.

DICTĀTOR, a magistrate at Rome invested with regal authority. This officer, whose magistracy seems to have been borrowed from the customs of the Albans or Latins, was first chosen during the Roman wars against the Latins. The consuls being unable to raise forces for the defence of the state, because the plebeians refused to inlist, if they were not discharged from all the debts they had contracted with the patricians, the senate found it necessary to elect a new magistrate with absolute and incontrolable power to take care of the state. The dictator remained in office for six months, after which he was again elected, if the affairs of the state seemed to be desperate; but if tranquillity was re-established, he generally laid down his power before the time was expired. He knew no superior in the republic, and even the laws were subjected to him. He was called dictator, because dictus, named by the consul, or quoniam dictis ejus parebat populus, because the people implicitly obeyed his command. He was named by the consul in the night, vivâ voce, and his election was confirmed by the auguries, though sometimes he was nominated or recommended by the people. As his power was absolute, he could proclaim war, levy forces, conduct them against an enemy, and disband them at pleasure. He punished as he pleased; and from his decision there was no appeal, at least till later times. He was preceded by 24 lictors, with the fasces; during his administration, all other officers, except the tribunes of the people, were suspended, and he was the master of the republic. But amidst all this independence, he was not permitted to go beyond the borders of Italy, and he was always obliged to march on foot in his expeditions; and he never could ride in difficult and laborious marches, without previously obtaining a formal leave from the people. He was chosen only when the state was in imminent dangers from foreign enemies or inward seditions. In the time of a pestilence, a dictator was sometimes elected, as also to hold the comitia, or to celebrate the public festivals, to hold trials, to chuse senators, or drive a nail in the capitol, by which superstitious ceremony the Romans believed that a plague could be averted, or the progress of an enemy stopped. This office, so respectable and illustrious in the first ages of the republic, became odious by the perpetual usurpations of Sylla and J. Cæsar; and after the death of the latter, the Roman senate, on the motion of the consul Antony, passed a decree, which for ever after forbade a dictator to exist in Rome. The dictator, as soon as elected, chose a subordinate officer, called his master of horse, magister equitum. This officer was respectable, but he was totally subservient to the will of the dictator, and could do nothing without his express order, though he enjoyed the privilege of using a horse, and had the same insignia as the prætors. This subordination, however, was some time after removed; and during the second Punic war, the master of the horse was invested with a power equal to that of the dictator. A second dictator was also chosen for the election of magistrates at Rome, after the battle of Cannæ. The dictatorship was originally confined to the patricians, but the plebeians were afterwards admitted to share it. Titus Lartius Flavus was the first dictator, A. U. C. 253. *Dionys. DICTIDIENSES, certain inhabitants of mount Athos. Thucyd. 5, c. 82.

DICTYNNA, a nymph of Crete, who first invented hunting nets. She was one of Diana's attendants, and for that reason the goddess is often called Dictinna. Some have supposed that Minos pursued her, and that to avoid his importunities, she threw herself into the sea, and was caught in fishermen's nets, δίκτυα, whence her name. There was a festival at Sparta in honor of Diana, called Dictynnia. Paus. 2, c. 30. l. 3, c. 12.——A city of Crete.

DICTYS, a Cretan, who went with Idomeneus to the Trojan war. It is supposed that he wrote an history of this celebrated war, and that at his death he ordered it to be laid in his tomb, where it remained till a violent earthquake in the reign of Nero opened the monument where he had been buried. This convulsion of the earth threw out his history of the Trojan war, which was found by some shepherds, and afterwards carried to Rome. This mysterious tradition is deservedly deemed fabulous; and the history of the Trojan war, which is now extant, as the composition of Dictys of Crete, was composed in the 15th century, or according to others, in the age of Constantine, and falsely attributed to one of the followers of Idomeneus. The edition of Dictys is by Masellus Venia, 4to, Mediol. 1477.

Didia lex, de Sumptibus, by Didius, A. U. C. 606, to reſtrain the expences that attended public feſtivals and entertainments, and limit the number of gueſts which generally attended them, not only at Rome, but in all the provinces of Italy. By it, not only thoſe who received gueſts in theſe feſtival meetings, but the gueſts themſelves, were liable to be fined. It was an extenſion of the Oppian and Fannian laws.

Didius, a governor of Spain, conquered by Sertorius. Plut. in Sert ——A man who brought Cæſar the head of Pompey's eldeſt ſon. Plut.——A governor of Britain, under Claudius.——Julianus, a rich Roman, who, after the murder of Pertinax, bought the empire which the Pretorians had expoſed to ſale, A. D. 192. His great luxury and extravagance rendered him odious; and when he refuſed to pay the money which he had promiſed for the imperial purple, the ſoldiers revolted againſt him, and put him to death, after a ſhort reign. Severus was made emperor after him.

Dido, called alſo Eliſſa, a daughter of Belus king of Tyre, who married Sichæus, or Sichæbas, her uncle, who was prieſt of Hercules. Pygmalion, who ſucceeded to the throne of Tyre after Belus, murdered Sichæus, to get poſſeſſion of the immenſe riches which he poſſeſſed; and Dido, diſconſolate for the loſs of a huſband whom ſhe tenderley loved, and by whom ſhe was equally eſteemed, ſet ſail in queſt of a ſettlement, with a number of Tyrians, to whom the cruelty of the tyrant became odious. According to ſome accounts, ſhe threw into the ſea the riches of her huſband, which Pygmalion ſo greatly deſired; and by that artifice compelled the ſhips to fly with her, that had come by order of the tyrant to obtain the riches of Sichæus. During her voyage, Dido viſited the coaſt of Cyprus, where ſhe carried away 50 women, who proſtituted themſelves on the ſea ſhore, and gave them as wives to her Tyrian followers. A ſtorm drove her fleet on the African coaſt, and ſhe bought of the inhabitants as much land as could be covered by a bull's hide, cut into thongs. Upon this piece of land ſhe built a citadel, called Byrſa, [Vid. Byrſa.] and the increaſe of population, and the riſing commerce among her ſubjects, ſoon obliged her to enlarge her city, and the boundaries of her dominions. Her beauty, as well as the fame of her enterprize, gained her many admirers; and her ſubjects wiſhed to compel her to marry Iarbas, king of Mauritania, who threatened them with a dreadful war. Dido begged three months to give her deciſive anſwer; and during that time, ſhe erected a funeral pile, as if wiſhing, by a ſolemn ſacrifice, to appeaſe the manes of Sichæus, to which ſhe had promiſed eternal fidelity. When all was prepared, ſhe ſtabbed herſelf on the pile in preſence of her people, and by this uncommon action obtained the name of Dido, valiant woman, inſtead of Eliſſa. According to Virgil and Ovid, the death of Dido was cauſed by the ſudden departure of Æneas, of whom ſhe was deeply enamoured, and whom ſhe could not obtain as a huſband. This poetical fiction repreſents Æneas as living in the age of Dido, and introduces an anachroniſm of near 300 years. Dido left Phœnicia 247 years after the Trojan war, or the age of Æneas, that is, about 953 years B. C. This chronological error proceeds not from the ignorance of the poets, but it is ſupported by the authority of Horace,

"Aut famam ſequere, aut ſibi convenientia finge."

While Virgil deſcribes, in a beautiful epiſode, the deſperate love of Dido, and the ſubmiſſion of Æneas to the will of the gods; he at the ſame time gives an explanation of the hatred which exiſted between the republics of Rome and Carthage, and informs his readers that their mutual enmity originated in their very firſt foundation, and was apparently kindled by a more remote cauſe than the jealouſy and rivalſhip of two floriſhing empires. Dido, after her death, was honored as a deity by her ſubjects. Juſtin. 18, c 4, &c.—Paterc. 1, c. 6.—Virg. Æn.—Ovid. Met. 14, fab. 2.—Appian. Alex.—Oros. 4.—Herodian.—Dionyſ. Hal.

Dii, the divinities of the ancient inhabitants of the earth were very numerous. Every object which cauſed terror, inſpired gratitude, or beſtowed affluence, received the tribute of veneration. Man ſaw a ſuperior agent in the ſtars, the elements, or the trees, and ſuppoſed that the waters which communicated fertility to his fields and poſſeſſions, were under the influence and direction of ſome inviſible power, inclined to favor and to benefit mankind. Thus aroſe a train of divinities, which imagination arrayed in different forms, and armed with different powers. They were endowed with underſtanding, and were actuated by the ſame paſſions which daily afflict the human race, and thoſe children of ſuperſtition were appeaſed or provoked as the imperfect being which gave them birth. Their wrath was mitigated by ſacrifices and incenſe, and ſometimes human victims bled to expiate a crime which ſuperſtition alone ſuppoſed to exiſt. The ſun, from his powerful influence and animating nature, firſt attracted the notice, and claimed the adoration of the uncivilized inhabitants of the earth. The moon alſo was honored with ſacrifices, and addreſſed in prayers; and after immortality had been liberally beſtowed on all the heavenly bodies, mankind claſſed among their deities the brute creation, and the cat and the ſow ſhared equally with Jupiter himſelf, the father of gods and men, the devout veneration of their votaries. This immenſe number of deities have been divided into different claſſes, according to the will and pleaſure of the mythologiſts. The Romans, generally ſpeaking, reckoned two claſſes of the gods, the dii majorum gentium, or dii conſulentes, and the dii minorum gentium. The former were twelve in number, ſix males and ſix females. [Vid. Conſentes.] In the claſs of the latter, were ranked all the gods which were worſhipped in different parts of the earth. Beſides theſe, there were ſome called dii ſelecti, ſometimes claſſed with the twelve greater gods; theſe were Janus, Saturn, the Genius, the Moon, Pluto, and Bacchus. There were alſo ſome called demi-gods, that is, who deſerved immortality by the greatneſs of their exploits, and for their uncommon ſervices to mankind. Among theſe were Priapus, Vertumnus, Hercules, and thoſe whoſe parents were ſome of the immortal gods. Beſides theſe, all the paſſions, and the moral virtues, were reckoned as powerful deities, and temples were raiſed to a goddeſs of concord, peace, &c. According to the authority of Heſiod, there were no leſs than 30,000 gods that inhabited the earth, and were guardians of men, all ſubſervient to the power of Jupiter. To theſe ſucceeding ages have added an almoſt equal number; and indeed they were ſo numerous, and their functions ſo various, that we find temples erected, and ſacrifices offered to unknown gods. It is obſervable, that all the gods of the ancients have lived upon earth as mere mortals; and even Jupiter, who was the ruler of heaven, is repreſented by the mythologiſts as a helpleſs child; and we are acquainted with all the particulars that attended the birth and education of Juno. In proceſs of time, not only good and virtuous men, who had been the patrons of learning and the ſupporters of liberty, but alſo thieves and pirates, were admitted among the gods; and the Roman ſenate courteouſly granted immortality to the moſt cruel and abandoned of their emperors.

Dinŏcrătes, an architect of Macedonia, who propoſed to Alexander to cut mount Athos in the form of a ſtatue, holding a city in one hand, and in the other a baſon, into which all the waters of the mountain ſhould empty themſelves. This project Alexander rejected as too chimerical, but he employed the talents of the artiſt in building and beautifying Alexandria. He began to build a temple in honor of Arſinoe, by order of Ptolemy Philadelphus, in which he intended to ſuſpend a ſtatue of the queen, by means of loadſtones. His death, and that of his royal patron, prevented the execution of a work which would have been the admiration of every age. Plin. 7, c. 37.—Marcell. 22, c. 40.—Plut. in Alex.——A general of Agathocles.——A Meſſenian, who behaved with great effeminacy and wantonneſs. Diocletianopŏlis, a town of Theſſaly, called ſo in honor of Diocletian.

Diocletiānus, (Caius Valerius Jovius) a celebrated Roman emperor, born of an obſcure family in Dalmatia. He was firſt a common ſoldier, and by merit and ſucceſs he gradually roſe to the office of a general, and at the death of Numerian, he was inveſted with the imperial purple. In his high ſtation, he rewarded the virtues and fidelity of Maximian, who had ſhared with him all the ſubordinate offices in the army, by making him his colleague on the throne. He created two ſubordinate emperors, Conſtantius and Galerius, whom he called Cæſars, whilſt he claimed for himſelf and his colleague the ſuperior title of Auguſtus. Diocletian has been celebrated for his military virtues; and though he was naturally unpoliſhed by education and ſtudy, yet he was the friend and patron of learning and true genius. He was bold and reſolute, active and diligent, and well acquainted with the arts which endear a ſovereign to his people, and make him reſpectable even in the eyes of his enemies. His cruelty, however, againſt the followers of chriſtianity has been deſervedly branded with the appellation of unbounded tyranny, and inſolent wantonneſs. After he had reigned 21 years in the greateſt proſperity, he publicly abdicated the crown at Nicomedia, on the firſt of May A. D. 304, and retired to a private ſtation at Salona. Maximian, his colleague, followed his example, but not from voluntary choice; and when he ſome time after endeavoured to rouſe the ambition of Diocletian, and perſuade him to reaſſume the imperial purple, he received for anſwer, that Diocletian took now more delight in cultivating his little garden, than he formerly enjoyed in a palace, when his power was extended over all the earth. He lived nine years after his abdication, in the greateſt ſecurity and enjoyment at Salona, and died in the 68th year of his age. Diocletian is the firſt ſovereign who voluntarily reſigned his power: a philoſophical reſolution, which, in a later age, was imitated by the emperor Charles the fifth of Germany.

Diŏdōrus, an hiſtorian, ſirnamed Siculus, becauſe he was born at Argyra in Sicily. He wrote an hiſtory of Egypt, Perſia, Syria, Media, Greece, Rome, and Carthage, which was divided into 40 books, of which only 15 are extant, with ſome few fragments. This valuable compoſition was the work of an accurate enquirer, and it is ſaid that he viſited all the places of which which he has made mention in his history. It was the labor of 30 years, though the greater part may be considered as nothing more than a judicious compilation from Berosus, Timæus, Theopompus, Callisthenes, and others. The author, however, is too credulous in some of his narrations, and often wanders far from the truth. His style is neither elegant, nor too labored; but it contains great simplicity, and unaffected correctness. He often dwells too long upon fabulous reports and trifling incidents, while events of the greatest importance to history are treated with brevity, and sometimes passed over in silence. His manner of reckoning, by the Olympiads and the Roman consuls, will be found very erroneous. The historian flourished about 44 years B. C. He spent much time at Rome to procure information, and authenticate his historical narrations. The best edition of his works, is that of Wesseling, 2 vols. fol. Amst. 1746. ——A disciple of Euclid, in the age of Plato. Diog. in vitâ.——A comic poet. ——A son of Echeanax, who, with his brothers Codrus and Anaxagoras, murdered Hegesias the tyrant of Ephesus, &c. Polyæn. 6.——An Ephesian, who wrote an account of the life of Anaximander. Diog.—— An orator of Sardes, in the time of the Mithridatic war.——A stoic philosopher, preceptor to Cicero. He lived a d died in the house of his pupil, whom he instructed in the various branches of Greek literature. Cic. in Brut.——A general of Demetrius. ——A writer, surnamed Periegetes, who wrote a description of the earth. Plut. in Them.——An African, &c. Plut.

Diobetas, a general of Achaia, &c. Polyæn. 2.

Diogenes, a celebrated Cynic philosopher of Sinope, banished from his country for coining false money. From Sinope, he retired to Athens, where he became the disciple of Antisthenes, who was at the head of the Cynics. Antisthenes, at first refused to admit him into his house, and even struck him with a stick. Diogenes calmly bore the rebuke, and said, strike me, Antisthenes, but never shall you find a stick sufficiently hard, to remove me from your presence, whilst there is any thing to be learnt, any information to be gained from your conversation and acquaintance. Such firmness recommended him to Antisthenes, and he became his most devoted pupil. He dressed himself in the garment which distinguished the Cynics, and walked about the streets with a tub on his head, which served him as a house and a place of repose. Such singularity joined to the greatest contempt for riches, soon gained him reputation, and Alexander the Great condescended to visit the philosopher in his tub. He asked Diogenes if there was any thing in which he could gratify or oblige him. Get out of my sun-shine, was the only answer which the philosopher gave. Such an independence of mind so pleased the monarch, that he turned to his courtiers, and said, were I not Alexander, I would wish to be Diogenes. He was once sold as a slave, but his magnanimity so pleased his master, that he made him the preceptor of his children, and the guardian of his estates. After a life spent in the greatest misery and indigence, he died B C. 324, in the 96th year of his age. He ordered his body to be carelessly thrown into a ditch, and some dust to be sprinkled over it. His orders were, however, disobeyed in this particular, and his friends honored his remains with a magnificent funeral at Corinth. The inhabitants of Sinope raised statues to his memory, and the marble figure of a dog was placed on a high column erected on his tomb. His biographer has transmitted to posterity a number of sayings, remarkable for their simplicity and moral tendency. The life of Diogenes, however, shrinks from the eye of a strict examination, he boasted of his poverty, and was so arrogant that many have observed that the virtues of Diogenes arose from pride and vanity, not from wisdom or sound philosophy. His morals were corrupted, and he gave way to the most vicious indulgences, and his unbounded wantonness has given occasion to some to observe, that the bottom of his tub would not bear too close an examination. Diog. in vitâ.—Plut. in Apoph.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3. c. 36. &c.——A stoic of Babylon, disciple of Chrysippus. He went to Athens, and was sent as ambassador to Rome, with Carneades and Critolaus, 155 years before Christ. He died in the 88th year of his age, after a life of the most exemplary virtue. Cic. de offic. ——A native of Apollonia, celebrated for his knowledge of philosophy and physic. He lived in the age of Anaxagoras. Diog. in vitâ. ——Laertius, an Epicurean philosopher, born in Cilicia. He wrote the lives of the philosophers in ten books still extant. This work contains an accurate account of the antient philosophers, and is replete with all their anecdotes, and particular opinions. It is compiled, however, without any plan, method, or precision, though much neatness and conciseness is observable through the whole. In this multifarious biography the author does not seem particularly partial to any sect, except perhaps it be that of Potamon of Alexandria. Diogenes died A. D. 222. The best editions of his works are that of Meibomius, 2 vols. 4to. Amst. 1692, Diŏmēda, a daughter of Phorbas, whom Achilles brought from Lemnos, to be his miſtreſs after the loſs of Briſeis. Homer. Il. 1.——The wife of Deion of Amyclas.

Diŏmēdes, ſon of Tydeus and Deiphyle, was king of Ætolia, and one of the braveſt of the Grecian chiefs in the Trojan war. He engaged Hector and Æneas, and by repeated deeds of valor obtained much military glory. He went with Ulyſſes to ſteal the Palladium from the temple of Minerva at Troy; and aſſiſted in murdering Rheſus, king of Thrace, and carrying away his horſes. At his return from the ſiege of Troy, he loſt his way in the darkneſs of the night, and landed in Attica, where his companions plundered the country, and loſt the Trojan Palladium. During his long abſence, his wife Ægiale forgot her marriage vows, and proſtituted herſelf to Cometes, one of her ſervants. This laſciviouſneſs of the queen was attributed by ſome to the reſentment of Venus, whom Diomedes had ſeverely wounded in the arm in a battle before Troy. The infidelity of Ægiale was highly diſpleaſing to Diomedes. He reſolved to abandon his native country which was the ſeat of his diſgrace, and the attempts of his wife to take away his life, according to ſome accounts, did not a little contribute to haſten his departure. He came to that part of Italy which has been called Magna Græcia, where he built a city, called Argyrippa, and married the daughter of Daunus, the king of the country. He died there in extreme old age, or, according to a certain tradition, he periſhed by the hand of his father-in-law. His death was greatly lamented by his companions, who in the exceſs of their grief were changed into birds reſembling ſwans. Theſe birds took flight into a neighbouring iſland in the Adriatic, and became remarkable for the tameneſs with which they approached the Greeks, and for the horror with which they ſhunned all other nations. They are called the birds of Diomedes. Altars were raiſed to Diomedes, as to a god, one of which Strabo mentions at Timavus. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 243, &c.—*Ovid. Dion, a Syracuſan, ſon of Hipparinus, famous for his power and abilities. He was related to Dionyſius, and often adviſed him, together with the philoſopher Plato, who at his requeſt had come to reſide at the tyrant's court, to lay aſide the ſupreme power. His great popularity rendered him odious in the eyes of the tyrant, who baniſhed him to Greece. There he collected a numerous force, and encouraged by the influence of his name, and the hatred of his enemy, he reſolved to free his country from tyranny. He entered the port of Syracuſe only with two ſhips, and in three days reduced under his power an empire which had already ſubſiſted for 50 years, and which was guarded by 500 ſhips of war, and 100,000 foot, and 10,000 horſe. The tyrant fled to Corinth, and Dion kept the power in his own hands, fearful of the aſpiring ambition of ſome of the friends of Dionyſius. He was however ſhamefully betrayed and murdered by one of his familiar friends, called Callicrates, or Callipus, 354 years before the Chriſtian era, in the 55th year of his age, and four years after his return from Peloponneſus. His death was univerſally lamented by the Syracuſans, and a monument raiſed to his memory. Diod. 16.—C. Nep. in vitâ.——A town of Macedonia. Pauſ. 9, c. 36.——Caſſius, a native of Nicæa in Bithynia. His father's name was Apronianus. He was raiſed to the greateſt offices of ſtate in the Roman empire by Pertinax and his three ſucceſſors. Naturally fond of ſtudy, he improved himſelf by unwearied application, and was ten years in collecting materials for an hiſtory of Rome, which he made public in 80 books, after a laborious employment of 12 years in compoſing it. This valuable hiſtory began with the arrival of Æneas in Italy, and was continued down to

to the reign of the emperor Alexander Severus. The 34 firſt books are totally loſt, the 20 following are mutilated, and fragments are all that we poſſeſs of the laſt 20 In the compilation of his extenſive hiſtory, Dion propoſed to himſelf Thucydides for a model; but he is not perfectly happy in his imitation. His ſtile is pure and elegant, and his narrations are judiciouſly managed, and his reflections learned; but upon the whole he is credulous, and the bigotted ſlave of partiality, ſatire, and flattery. He inveighs againſt the republican principles of Brutus and Cicero, and extols the cauſe of Cæſar. Seneca is the object of his ſatyr, and he repreſents him as debauched and licentious in his morals. Dion floriſhed about the 230th year of the Chriſtian era. The beſt edition of his works is that of Reimarus, 2 vol. fol. Hamb. 1750. ——A famous Chriſtian writer, ſirnamed Chryſoſtom, &c.

DIŌNÆA, a ſirname of Venus, ſuppoſed to be the daughter of Jupiter and Dione.

DIONŸSIA, feſtivals in honor of Bacchus among the Greeks. Their form and ſolemnity was firſt introduced into Greece from Egypt by a certain Melampus, and if we admit that Bacchus is the ſame as Iſis, the Dionyſia of the Greeks are the ſame as the feſtivals celebrated by the Egyptians in honor of Iſis. They were obſerved at Athens with more ſplendor and ceremonious ſuperſtition than in any other part of Greece. The years were numbered by their celebration, the Archon aſſiſted at the ſolemnity, and the prieſts that officiated were honored with the moſt dignified ſeats at the public games. At firſt they were celebrated with great ſimplicity, and the time was conſecrated to mirth. It was then uſual to bring a veſſel of wine adorned with a vine branch, after which followed a goat, a baſket of figs, and the φαλλοι. The worſhippers imitated in their dreſs and actions the poetical fictions concerning Bacchus. They cloathed themſelves in fawns' ſkins, fine linen, and mitres, they carried thyrſi, drums, pipes, and flutes, and crowned themſelves with garlands of ivy, vine, fir, &c. Some imitated Silenus, Pan, and the Satyrs by the uncouth manner of their dreſs and their fantaſtical motions. Some rode upon aſſes, and others drove the goats to ſlaughter for the ſacrifice. In this manner both ſexes joined in the ſolemnity, and ran about the hills and country, nodding their heads, dancing in ridiculous poſtures, and filling the air with hideous ſhrieks and ſhouts, and crying aloud, Evoe Bacche! Io! Io! Evoe! Iacche! Iobacche! Evohe! With ſuch ſolemnities were the feſtivals of Bacchus celebrated by the Greeks, particularly the Athenians. In one of theſe there followed a number of perſons carrying ſacred veſſels, one of which contained water. After theſe came a ſelect number of noble virgins carrying little baſkets of gold filled with all ſorts of fruits. This was the moſt myſterious part of the ſolemnity. Serpents were ſometimes put in the baſkets, and by their wreathing and crawling out they amuſed and aſtoniſhed the beholders. After the virgins, followed a company of men carrying poles at the end of which were faſtened φαλλοι. The heads of theſe men, who were called φαλλοφοροι, were crowned with ivy and violets, and their faces covered with other herbs. They marched ſinging ſongs upon the occaſion of the feſtivals, called φαλλικα ασματα. Next to the φαλλοφοροι followed the ιθυφαλλοι in womens apparel, with white ſtriped garments reaching to the ground; their heads were decked with garlands, and on their hands they wore gloves compoſed of flowers. Their geſtures and actions were like thoſe of a drunken man. Beſides theſe, there were a number of perſons called λικνοφοροι who carried the λικνον or muſical van of Bacchus; without their attendance none of the feſtivals of Bacchus were celebrated with due ſolemnity, and on that account the god is often called λικνιτης. The feſtivals of Bacchus were almoſt innumerable. The name of the moſt celebrated were the Dionyſia αρχαιοτερα at Limnæ in Attica. The chief perſons that officiated were fourteen women called γεραιραι venerable. They were appointed by one of the archons, and before their appointment they ſolemnly took an oath before the archon or his wife, that their body was free from all pollution. ——The greater Dionyſia, ſometimes called αστικα or τα κατ' ασυ, as being celebrated within the city, were the moſt famous. They were ſuppoſed to be the ſame as the preceding.——The leſs Dionyſia, ſometimes called τα κατ' αγρους, becauſe celebrated in the country, or ληναια from ληνος a wine preſs, were to all appearance a preparation for the greater feſtivals. They were celebrated in autumn.——The Dionyſia βραυρωνια obſerved at Brauron in Attica were a ſcene of lewdneſs, extravagance, and debauchery.——The Dionyſia νυκτηλια were obſerved by the Athenians in honor of Bacchus Nyctelius. It was unlawful to reveal veal whatever was ſeen or done during the celebration.—The Dionyſia, called ωμοφαγια becauſe human victims were offered to the god, or becauſe the prieſts imitated the eating of raw fleſh, were celebrated with much ſolemnity. The prieſts put ſerpents in their hair, and by the wildneſs of their looks and the oddity of their actions they feigned inſanity.——The Dionyſia αρκαδικα were yearly obſerved in Arcadia, and the children who had been inſtructed in the muſic of Philoxenus and Timotheus were introduced in a theatre, where they celebrated the feſtivals of Bacchus by entertaining the ſpectators with ſongs, dances, and different exhibitions. There were beſides theſe, others of inferior note. There was alſo one obſerved every three years called Dionyſia τριετηρικα, and it is ſaid that Bacchus inſtituted it himſelf in commemoration of his Indian expedition, in which he ſpent three years. There is alſo another, celebrated every fifth year, as mentioned by the ſcholiaſt of Ariſtophanes.——All theſe feſtivals in honor of the god of wine were celebrated by the Greeks with great licentiouſneſs, and they contributed much to the corruption of morals among all ranks of people. They were alſo introduced into Tuſcany, and from thence to Rome. Among the Romans both ſexes promiſcuouſly joined in the celebration during the darkneſs of night. The drunkenneſs, the debauchery, and impure actions and indulgences, which ſoon prevailed at the ſolemnity, called aloud for the interference of the ſenate, and the conſuls Sp. Poſthumius Albinus and Q. Martius Philippus made a ſtrict examination concerning the propriety and ſuperſtitious forms of the Bacchanalia. The diſorder and pollution which was practiſed with impunity by no leſs than 7,000 votaries of either ſex, was beheld with horror and aſtoniſhment by the conſuls, and the Bacchanalia were for ever baniſhed from Rome by a decree of the ſenate. They were again reinſtituted there in length of time, but not with ſuch licentiouſneſs as before.

Dionȳsius 1ſt, or the elder, was ſon of Hermocrates. He ſignalized himſelf in the wars which the Syracuſans carried on againſt the Carthagians, and taking advantage of the power lodged in his hands, he made himſelf abſolute at Syracuſe. To ſtrengthen himſelf in his uſurpation and acquire popularity, he encreaſed the pay of the ſoldiers, and recalled thoſe that had been baniſhed. He vowed eternal enmity againſt Carthage, and experienced various ſucceſs in his wars againſt that republic. He was ambitious of being thought a poet, and his brother Theodorus was commiſſioned to go to Olympia, and repeat there ſome verſes in his name, with other competitors, for the poetical prizes. His expectations were fruſtrated, and his poetry was received with groans and hiſſes. He was not however, ſo unſucceſsful at Athens, where a poetical prize was publicly adjudged to one of his compoſitions. This victory gave him more pleaſure than all the victories he had ever obtained in the field of battle. His tyranny and cruelty at home rendered him odious in the eyes of his ſubjects, and he became ſo ſuſpicious that he never admitted his wife or children to his private appartments without a previous examination of their garments. He never truſted his head to a barber, but always burnt his beard. He made a ſubterraneous cave in a rock, ſaid to be ſtill extant, in the form of a human ear, which meaſured 80 feet in height and 250 in length. It was called the ear of Dionyſius. The ſounds of this ſubterraneous cave were all neceſſarily directed to one common tympanum which had a communication with an adjoining room where Dionyſius ſpent the greateſt part of his time to hear whatever was ſaid by thoſe whom his ſuſpicion and cruelty had confined in the appartments above. The artiſts that had been employed in making this cave were all put to death by order of the tyrant, for fear of their revealing to what purpoſes a work of ſuch uncommon conſtruction was to be appropriated. His impiety and ſacrilege were as conſpicuous as his ſuſpicious credulity. He took a golden mantle from the ſtatue of Jupiter, obſerving that the ſon of Saturn had too warm a covering for the ſummer, and too cold for the winter, and he placed one of wool inſtead. He alſo robbed Æſculapius of his golden beard, and plundered the temple of Proſerpine. He died of an indigeſtion in the 63d year of his age, B. C. 368, after a reign of 38 years. Authors however are divided about the manner of his death, and ſome are of opinion that he died a violent death. Some ſuppoſe that this tyrant invented the catapulta, an engine which proved of infinite ſervice for the diſcharging of ſhowers of of darts and ſtones in the time of a ſiege. Diod. 13, 14, &c.—Juſtin. 20, c. 1, &c.—Xenophon. Hiſt. Græc.—C. Nep. Timol.—Plut. in Dion.——The ſecond of that name, ſirnamed the younger, was ſon of Dionyſius the 1ſt, by Doris. He ſucceeded his father as tyrant of Sicily, and by the advice of Dion his brother-in-law, he invited the philoſopher Plato to his court, under whom he ſtudied for a while. The philoſopher adviſed him to lay aſide the ſupreme power, and in his admonitions he was warmly ſeconded by Dion. Dionyſius refuſed to conſent, and ſoon after Plato was ſeized and publicly ſold as a ſlave. Dion likewiſe, on account of his great popularity, was ſeverely abuſed and inſulted in his family, and his wife given in marriage to another. Such a violent behaviour was highly reſented; Dion, who was baniſhed, collected ſome forces in Greece, and in three days rendered himſelf maſter of Syracuſe, and expelled the tyrant B. C. 357. [Vid. Dion.] Dionyſius retired to Locri, where he behaved with the greateſt oppreſſion, and was ejected by the citizens. He recovered Syracuſe ten years after his expulſion, but his triumph was ſhort, and the Corinthians under the conduct of Timoleon obliged him to abandon the city. He fled to Corinth, where to ſupport himſelf he kept a ſchool, as Cicero obſerves, that he might ſtill continue to be tyrant; and as he could not command over men, that he might ſtill exerciſe his power over boys. It is ſaid that he died from an exceſs of joy when he heard that a tragedy of his own compoſition had been rewarded with a poetical prize. Dionyſius was as cruel as his father, but he did not like him poſſeſs the art of retaining his power. This was ſeen and remarked by the old man, who, when he ſaw his ſon attempting to debauch the wives of ſome of his ſubjects, aſked him with the greateſt indignation, whether he had ever heard of his having acted ſo brutal a part in his younger days? No, anſwered the ſon, becauſe you were not the ſon of a king. Well, my ſon, replied the old man, never ſhalt thou be the father of a king. Juſtin. 21, c. 1, 2, &c.—Diod. 15, &c.—Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 8.—Quintil. 8, c. 6.—C. Nep. in Dion.—Cic. Tuſc. 5, c. 2.——An hiſtorian of Halicarnaſſus, who left his country and came to reſide at Rome, that he might carefully ſtudy all the Greek and Latin writers, whoſe compoſitions treated of the Roman hiſtory. He formed an acquaintance with all the learned of the age, and derived much information from their company and converſation. After an unremitted application, during 24 years, he gave to the world his Roman antiquities in 20 books, of which only the 11 firſt are now extant, nearly containing the account of 312 years. His compoſition has been greatly valued by the antients as well as the moderns for the eaſineſs of his ſtile, the fidelity of his chronology, and the judiciouſneſs of his remarks and criticiſm. Like a faithful hiſtorian, he never mentioned any thing, but what was authenticated, and totally diſregarded the fabulous traditions which fill and diſgrace the pages of both his predeceſſors and followers. To the merits of the elegant hiſtorian, Dionyſius, as may be ſeen in his treatiſes, has alſo added the equally reſpectable character of the eloquent orator, the critic, and the politician. He lived during the Auguſtan age, and came to Rome about 30 years before the Chriſtian era. The beſt editions of his works are that of Oxford, 2 vols. fol. 1704, and that of Reiſke, 6 vols. 8vo. Lipſ. 1774.——A tyrant of Heraclea in Pontus in the age of Alexander the Great. After the death of the conqueror and of Perdiccas, he married Ameſtris, the niece of king Darius, and aſſumed the title of king. He was of ſuch an uncommon corpulence that he never expoſed his perſon in public, and when he gave audience to foreign ambaſſadors he always placed himſelf in a chair which was conveniently made to hide his face and perſon from the eyes of the ſpectators. When he was aſleep it was impoſſible to awake him without boring his fleſh with pins. He died in the 55th year of his age. DIRCE, a woman whom Lycus, king of Thebes, married after he had divorced Antiope. When Antiope became pregnant by Jupiter, Dirce ſuſpected her huſband of infidelity to her bed, and impriſoned Antiope, whom ſhe tormented with the greateſt cruelty. Antiope eſcaped from her confinement, and brought forth Amphion and Zethus on mount Cithæron. When theſe children were informed of the cruelties to which their mother had been expoſed, they beſieged Thebes, put Lycus to death, and tied the cruel Dirce to the tail of a wild bull, who dragged her over rocks and

and precipices, and expoſed her to the moſt poignant pains till the gods pitying her fate, changed her into a fountain, in the neighbourhood of Thebes. According to ſome accounts Antiope was mother to Amphion and Zethus, before ſhe was confined and expoſed to the tyranny of Dirce. *(Vid. Amphion, Antiope.) DISCORDIA, a malevolent deity, daughter of Nox, and ſiſter to Nemeſis, the Parcæ and Death. She was driven from heaven by Jupiter, becauſe ſhe ſowed diſſenſions among the gods, and was the cauſe of continual quarrels. When the nuptials of Peleus and Thetis were celebrated, the goddeſs of diſcord was not invited, and this ſeeming neglect ſo irritated her that ſhe threw an apple into the midſt of the aſſembly of the gods with the inſcription of detur pulchriori. This apple was the cauſe of the ruin of Troy, and of infinite misfortunes to the Greeks. (Vid. Paris.) She is repreſented with a pale ghaſtly look, her garment is torn, her eyes ſparkle with fire, and in her boſom ſhe holds a dagger concealed. Her head is generally entwined with ſerpents, and ſhe is attended by Bellona. She is ſuppoſed to be the cauſe of all the diſſenſions which ariſe upon earth, public as well as private. *Virg. DŌDŌNA, a town of Theſprotia in Epirus, or according to others in Theſſaly. There was in its neighbourhood a celebrated oracle of Jupiter. The town and temple of the god were firſt built by Deucalion, after the univerſal deluge. It was ſuppoſed to be the moſt ancient oracle of all Greece, and according to the traditions of the Egyptians mentioned by Herodotus, it was founded by a dove. Two black doves, as he relates, took their flight from the city of Thebes, in Egypt, one of which flew to the temple of Jupiter Ammon and the other to Dodona, where with a human voice they acquainted the inhabitants of the country that Jupiter had conſecrated the ground, which in future would give oracles. The extenſive grove which ſurrounded Jupiter's temple was endowed with the gift of prophecy, and oracles were frequently delivered by the ſacred oaks, and the doves which inhabited the place. This fabulous tradition of the oracular power of the doves, is explained by Herodotus, who obſerves that ſome Phœnicians carried away two prieſteſſes from Egypt, one of which went to fix her reſidence at Dodona, where the oracle was eſtabliſhed. It may further be obſerved that the fable might have been founded upon the double meaning of the word πελειαι, which ſignifies doves, in moſt parts of Greece, while in the dialect of the Epirots, it implies old women. In ancient times the oracles were delivered by the murmuring of a neighbouring fountain, but the cuſtom was afterwards changed. Large kettles were ſuſpended in the air near a brazen ſtatue, which held a laſh in its hand. When the wind blew ſtrong, the ſtatue was agitated and ſtruck againſt one of the kettles, which communicated the motion to all the reſt, and raiſed that clattering and diſcordant din which continued for a while, and from which the artifice of the prieſts drew their predictions. Some ſuppoſe that the noiſe was occaſioned by the ſhaking of the leaves and boughs of an old oak, which the ſuperſtition of the people frequently conſulted, and from which they pretended to receive oracles. It may be obſerved with more probability that the oracles were delivered by the prieſts, who, by artfully concealing themſelves behind the oaks, gave occaſion to the ſuperſtitious multitude to believe that the trees were endowed with the power of prophecy. As the ſhip Argo was built with ſome of the oaks of the foreſt of Dodona, there were ſome beams which gave oracles to the Argonauts, and warned them againſt the approach of calamity. Within the foreſt of Dodona there was a ſtream and a fountain of cool water which had the power of lighting a torch as ſoon as it touched it. This fountain was totally dry at noon day, and was reſtored to its full courſe at midnight, from which time till the following noon it began to decreaſe, and at the uſual hour was again deprived of its waters. The oracles of Dodona were generally delivered by women. (Vid. Dodonides.) Plin. 2, c. 103.—Herodot. 2, c. 57.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—*Homer. Dōdōnĭdes, the prieſteſſes who gave oracles in the temple of Jupiter in Dodona. According to ſome traditions the temple was originally inhabited by ſeven daughters of Atlas, who nurſed Bacchus. Their names were Ambroſia, Eudora, Paſithoe, Pytho, Plexaure, Coronis, Tythe or Tyche. In the latter ages the oracles were always delivered by three old women, which cuſtom was firſt eſtabliſhed when Jupiter enjoyed the company of Dione, whom he permitted to receive divine honor in his temple at Dodona. The Bœotians were the only people of Greece who received their oracles at Dodona from men, for reaſons which Strabo l. 9, fully explains.

Doii, a people of Arabia Felix.

Dolabella P. Corn. a Roman who married the daughter of Cicero. During the civil wars he warmly eſpouſed the intereſt of J. Cæſar, whom he accompanied at the famous battles at Pharſalia, Africa, and Munda. He was made conſul by his patron, though M. Antony his colleague oppoſed it. After the death of J. Cæſar, he received the government of Syria, as his province. Caſſius oppoſed his views, and Dolabella, for violence, and for the aſſaſſination of Trebonius, one of Cæſar's murderers, was declared an enemy to the republic of Rome. He was beſieged by Caſſius in Laodicea, and when he ſaw that all was loſt, he killed himſelf, in the 27th year of his age. He was of a ſmall ſtature, which gave occaſion to his father-in-law to aſk him once when he entered his houſe who had tied him ſo cleverly to his ſword. ——A proconſul of Africa.——Another who conquered the Gauls, Etrurians, and Boii at the lake Vadimonis, B. Domitia Longina, a Roman lady who boaſted in her debaucheries. She was the wife of the emperor Domitian.

Domĭtiānus, Titus Flavius, ſon of Veſpaſian and Flavia Domitilla, made himſelf emperor of Rome, at the death of his brother Titus, whom according to ſome accounts he deſtroyed by poiſon. The beginning of his reign promiſed tranquillity to the people, but their expectations were ſoon fruſtrated. Domitian became cruel, and gave way to inceſtuous and unnatural indulgences. He commanded himſelf to be called God and Lord in all the papers which were preſented to him. He paſſed the greateſt part of the day in catching flies and killing them with a bodkin, ſo that it was wittily anſwered by Vibius to a perſon who aſked him who was with the emperor, no body, not even a fly. In the latter part of his reign Domitian became ſuſpicious, and his anxieties were increaſed by the predictions of aſtrologers, but ſtill more poignantly by the ſtings of remorſe. He was ſo diſtruſtful even when alone, that round the terrace, where he uſually walked, he built a wall with ſhining ſtones, that from them he might perceive as in a looking glaſs, whether any body followed him. All theſe precautions were unavailing, he periſhed by the hand of an aſſaſſin the 18th of September A. D. 96, in the 45th year of his age, and the 15th of his reign. He was the laſt of the 12 Cæſars. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf for his love of learning, and in a little treatiſe, which he wrote upon the great care which ought to be taken of the hair to prevent baldneſs, he diſplayed much taſte and elegance, according to the obſervations of his biographers. After his death he was publicly deprived by the ſenate of all the honors which had been profuſely heaped upon him, and even his body was left in the open air without the honors of a funeral. This diſgrace might proceed from the reſentment of the ſenators, whom he had expoſed to terror as well as to ridicule. He once aſſembled that auguſt body to know in what veſſel a turbot might be more conveniently dreſſed. At another time they received a formal invitation to a feaſt, and when they arrived at the palace, they were introduced into a large gloomy hall hung with black, and lighted with a few glimmering tapers. In the middle was placed a number of coffins, on each of which was inſcribed the name of ſome one of the invited ſenators. On a ſudden a number of men burſt into the room, cloathed in black, with drawn ſwords and flaming torches, and after they had for ſome time terrified the gueſts, they permitted them to retire. Such were the amuſements and cruelties of a man, who in the firſt part of his reign was looked upon as the father of his people, and the reſtorer of learning and liberty. Suet. in vitâ.—Eutrop. 7.

Dōris, a country of Greece, between Phocis, Theſſaly, and Acarnania. It received its name from Dorus the ſon of Deucalion, who made a ſettlement there. It was called Tetrapolis, from the four cities of Pindus or Dryopis, Erineum, Cytinium, Borium, which it contained. To theſe four ſome add Lilæum and Carphia, and therefore call it Hexapolis. The name of Doris has been common to many parts of Greece. The Dorians, in the age of Deucalion, inhabited Phthiotis, which they exchanged for Hiſtiæotis, in the age of Dorus. From thence they were driven by the Cadmeans, and came to ſettle near the town of Pindus. From thence they paſſed into Dryopis, and afterwards into Peloponneſus. Hercules having re-eſtabliſhed Ægimius king of Phthiotis or Doris, who had been driven from his country by the Lapithæ, the grateful king appointed Hyllus, the ſon of his patron, to be his ſucceſſor, and the Heraclidæ marched from that part of the country to go to recover Peloponneſus. The Dorians ſent many colonies into different places, which bore the ſame name as their native country. The moſt famous of theſe is Doris in Aſia Minor, of which Halicarnaſſus was once the capital. This part of Aſia Minor was called Hexapolis, and afterwards Pentapolis, after the excluſion of Halicarnaſſus. Strab. 9, &c.—*Virg. Draco, a celebrated lawgiver of Athens. When he exerciſed the office of archon, he made a code of laws, B. C. 623, for the uſe of the citizens, which, on account of their ſeverity, were ſaid to be written in letters of blood. By them, idleneſs was puniſhed with as much ſeverity as murder, and death was denounced againſt the one as well as the other. Such a code of rigorous laws gave occaſion to a certain Athenian to aſk of the legiſlator, why he was ſo ſevere in his puniſhments, and Draco gave for anſwer, that that as the ſmalleſt tranſgreſſion had appeared to him deſerving death, he could not find any puniſhment more rigorous for more atrocious crimes. Theſe laws were at firſt enforced, but they were often neglected on account of their extreme ſeverity, and Solon totally aboliſhed them, except that one which puniſhed a murderer with death. The popularity of Draco was uncommon, but the gratitude of his admirers proved fatal to him. When once he appeared on the theatre, he was received with repeated applauſe, and the people, according to the cuſtom of the Athenians, ſhowed their reſpect to their lawgiver, by throwing garments upon him. This was done in ſuch profuſion, that Draco was ſoon hid under them, and ſmothered by the too great veneration of his citizens. Plut. in Sol.——A man who inſtructed Plato in muſic. Id. de Muſic.

Druĭdæ, the miniſters of religion among the ancient Gauls and Britons. They were divided into different claſſes, called the Bardi, Eubages, the Vates, the Semnothei, the Sarronides, and the Samothei. They were held in the greateſt veneration by the people. Their life was auſtere and recluſe from the world, their dreſs was peculiar to themſelves, and they generally appeared with a tunic which reached a little below the knee. As the chief power was lodged in their hands, they puniſhed as they pleaſed, and could declare war and make peace at their option. Their power was extended not only over private families, but they could depoſe magiſtrates and even kings, if their actions in any manner deviated from the laws of the ſtate. They had the privilege of naming the magiſtrates which annually preſided over the cities, and the kings were created only with their approbation. They were entruſted with the education of youth, and all religious ceremonies, feſtivals and ſacrifices were under their peculiar care. They taught the doctrine of the metempſychoſis, and believed the immortality of the ſoul. They were profeſſionally acquainted with the art of magic, and from their knowledge of aſtrology, they drew omens and ſaw futurity revealed before their eyes. In their ſacrifices they often immolated human victims to their gods, a barbarous cuſtom which continued long among them, and which the Roman emperors attempted to aboliſh to little purpoſe. The power and privileges which they enjoyed were beheld with admiration by their countrymen, and as their office was open to every rank and every ſtation, there were many who daily propoſed themſelves as candidates to enter upon this important function. The rigor, however, and ſeverity of a long noviciate deterred many, and few were willing to attempt a labor, which enjoined them during 15 or 20 years to load their memory with the long and tedious maxims of druidical religion. Their name is derived from the Greek word δρυς an oak, becauſe the woods and ſolitary retreats were the places of their reſidence. Cæſ. bell. G. 6, c. 13.—Plin. 16, c. 44.—Diod. 5.

Druna, the Drome, a river of Gaul, falling into the Rhone.

Druſilla Livia, a daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, famous for her debaucheries and licentiouſneſs. She committed inceſt with her brother Caligula, who was ſo tenderly attached to her that in a dangerous illneſs he made her heireſs of all his poſſeſſions, and commanded that ſhe ſhould ſucceed him in the Roman empire. She died A. D. 38, in the 23d year of her age, and was deified by her brother Caligula, who ſurvived her for ſome time.——A daughter of Agrippa king of Judea, &c.

Drūso, an unſkilful hiſtorian and mean uſurper, who obliged his debtors, when they could not pay him, to hear him read his compoſitions, to draw from them praiſes and flattery. Horat. 1, Sat. 3, v. 86.

Drūsus, a ſon of Tiberius and Vipſania, who made himſelf famous by his intrepidity and courage in the provinces of Illyricum and Pannonia. He was raiſed to the greateſt honors of the ſtate by his father, but a blow which he gave to Sejanus, an audacious libertine, proved his ruin. Sejanus corrupted Livia the wife of Druſus, and in conjunction with her he cauſed him to be poiſoned by an eunuch, A. D. 23.——A ſon of Germanicus and Agrippina, who enjoyed offices of the greateſt truſt under Tiberius. His enemy Sejanus, however, effected his ruin by his inſinuations; Druſus was confined by Tiberius and deprived of all aliment. He was found dead nine days after his confinement, A. D. 33.——A ſon of the emperor Claudius, who died by ſwallowing a pear thrown in the air.——An ambitious Roman, grandfather to Cato. He was killed for his ſeditious conduct. Paterc. 1, c. 13.——Livius, father of Julia Auguſta, was intimate with Brutus, and killed himſelf with him after the battle of Philippi. Paterc. 2, c. 71.——M. Livius, a celebrated Roman who renewed the propoſals of the Agrarian laws, which had proved fatal to the Gracchi. Duumvĭri, two noble patricians at Rome, firſt appointed by Tarquin to keep the Sibylline books, which were ſuppoſed to contain the fate of the Roman empire. Theſe ſacred books were placed in the capitol, and ſecured in a cheſt under the ground. They were conſulted but ſeldom, and only by an order of the Senate, when the armies had been defeated in war, or when Rome ſeemed to be threatened by an invaſion, or by ſecret ſeditions. Theſe prieſts continued in their original inſtitution till the year U. C. 388, when a law was propoſed by the tribunes to encreaſe the number to ten to be choſen promiſcuouſly from patrician and plebeian families. They were from their number called Decemviri, and ſome time after Sylla encreaſed them to fifteen, known by the name of Quindecimviri.——There were alſo certain magiſtrates at Rome, called Duumviri perduelliones ſive capitales. They were firſt created by Tullus Hoſtilius, for trying ſuch as were accuſed of treaſon. This office was aboliſhed as unneceſſary, but Cicero complains of their revival by Labienus the tribune. Orat. pro Rabir. Some of the commanders of the Roman veſſels were alſo called Duumviri, eſpecially when there were two together. They were firſt created, A. U. C. 542. There were alſo in the municipal towns in the provinces two magiſtrates called Duumviri municipales. ECHIONIDES, a patronymic given to Pentheus as deſcended from Echion. Ovid. Met. 3.

ECHIONIUS, an epithet applied to a perſon born in Thebes, founded with the aſſiſtance of Echion. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 515.

ECHO, a daughter of the Air and Tellus, who chiefly reſided in the vicinity of the Cephiſus. She was once one of Juno's attendants, and became the confidant of Jupiter's amours. Her loquacity however diſpleaſed Jupiter; and ſhe was deprived of the power of ſpeech by Juno, and only permitted to anſwer to the queſtions which were put to her. Pan had formerly been one of her admirers, but he never enjoyed her favors. Echo, after ſhe had been puniſhed by Juno, fell in love with Narciſſus, and on being deſpiſed by him, ſhe pined away, and was changed into a ſtone, which ſtill retained the power of voice. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 358.

ECNŎMOS, a mountain of Sicily, now Licata.

EDESSA & EDESA, a town of Syria.

EDESSÆ PORTUS, a harbour of Sicily, near Pachynus. Cic. Verr. 5, c. 34.

EGĔLĬDUS, a river of Etruria. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 610.

EGĔRIA, a nymph of Aricia in Italy, where Diana was particularly worſhipped. Egeria was courted by Numa, and according to Ovid ſhe became his wife. This prince frequently viſited her, and that he might more ſucceſsfully introduce his laws and new regulations into the ſtate, he ſolemnly declared before the Roman people, that they were previouſly ſanctified and approved by the nymph Egeria. Ovid ſays that Egeria was ſo diſconſolate at the death of Numa, that ſhe melted into tears, and was changed into a fountain by Diana. She is reckoned by many as a goddeſs who preſided over the pregnancy of women, and ELAIUS, a mountain of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 41.

ELAPHIÆA, a ſirname of Diana in Elis. Id 6, c. 22.

ELĂPHUS, a river of Arcadia. Id. 8, c. 36.

ELAPHEBŎLIA, a feſtival in honor of Diana the Huntreſs. In the celebration a cake was made in the form of a deer, ἔλαφος, and offered to the goddeſs. It owed its inſtitution to the following circumſtance; when the Phocians had been ſeverely beaten by the Theſſalians, they reſolved, by the perſuaſion of a certain Deiphantus, to raiſe a pile of combuſtible materials, and burn their wives, children, and effects, rather than ſubmit to the enemy. This reſolution was unanimouſly approved by the women, who decreed Deiphantus a crown for his magnanimity. When every thing was prepared, before they fired the pile, they engaged their enemies and fought with ſuch deſperate fury, that they totally routed them, and obtained a complete victory. In commemoration of this unexpected ſucceſs this feſtival was inſtituted to Diana, and obſerved with the greateſt ſolemnity.

ELAPTONIUS, a youth who conſpired againſt Alexander. Curt. 8, c. 6.

ELĀRA, the mother of Tiphyus by Jupiter. Apollod. 1, c. 4.——A daughter of Orchomenus king of Arcadia. Strab. 9.

ELEPHANTOPHĂGI, a people of Æthiopia.

ELEPHĒNOR, one of Helen's ſuitors. Homer. Il. 2, v. 47.

ELEPŌRUS, a river of Magna Græcia.

ELEUCHIA, a daughter of Theſpius. Apollod.

ELEUS, a city of Thrace.——A river of Media. ——A king of Elis. Pauſ. 5, c. 3.

ELEUSĪNIA, a great feſtival obſerved every fourth year by the Celeans, Phliaſians, as alſo by the Pheneatæ, Lacedæmonians, Parrhaſians and Cretans; but more particularly by the people of Athens, every fifth year, at Eleuſis in Attica, where it was introduced by Eumolpus, B. C. 1356. It was the moſt celebrated of all the religious ceremonies of Greece, whence it is often called by way of eminence, μυστηρια. the myſteries. It was ſo ſuperſtitiouſly obſerved, that if any one ever revealed it, it was ſuppoſed that he had called divine vengeance upon his head, and it was unſafe to live in the ſame houſe with him. Such a wretch was publicly put to an ignominious death. This feſtival was ſacred to Ceres and Proſerpine, every thing contained a myſtery, and Ceres herſelf was known only by the name of αχθεια, from the ſorrow and grief (αχθος) which ſhe ſuffered for the loſs of her daughter. This myſterious ſecrecy was ſolemnly obſerved, and enjoined to all the votaries of the goddeſs; and if any one ever appeared at the celebration, either intentionally, or through ignorance, without proper introduction, he was immediately puniſhed with death. Perſons of both ſexes and all ages were initiated at this ſolemnity, and it was looked upon as ſo heinous a crime to neglect this ſacred part of religion, that it was one of the heavieſt accuſations which contributed to the condemnation of Socrates. The initiated were under the more particular care of the deities, and therefore their life was ſuppoſed to be attended with more happineſs and real ſecurity than that of other men. This benefit was not only granted during life, but it extended beyond the grave, and they were honored with the firſt places in the Elyſian fields, while others were left to wallow in perpetual filth and ignominy. As the benefits of expiation were ſo extenſive, particular care was taken in examining the character of ſuch as were preſented for initiation. Such as were guilty of murder, though againſt their will, and ſuch as were convicted of witchcraft, or any heinous crime, were not admitted, and the Athenians ſuffered none to be initiated but ſuch as were members of their city. This regulation, which compelled Hercules, Caſtor, and Pollux, to become citizens of Athens, was ſtrictly obſerved in the firſt ages of the inſtitution, but afterwards all perſons, barbarians excepted, were freely initiated. The feſtivals were divided into great and leſs myſteries. The leſs were inſtituted from the following circumſtance. Hercules paſſed near Eleuſis while the Athenians were celebrating the myſteries, and deſired to be initiated. As this could not be done, becauſe he was a ſtranger; and as Eumolpus was unwilling to diſpleaſe him on account of his great power, and the ſervices which he had done to the Athenians, another feſtival was inſtituted without violating the laws. It was called μικρα, and Hercules was ſolemnly admitted to the celebration and initiated. Theſe leſs myſteries were obſerved at Agræ near the Iliſſus. The greater were celebrated at Eleuſis, from which place Ceres has been called Eleuſinia. In later times the ſmaller feſtivals were preparatory to the greater, and no perſon could be initiated at Eleuſis without a previous purification at Agræ. This purification they performed by keeping themſelves pure, chaſte, and unpolluted during during nine days, after which they came and offered ſacrifices and prayers, wearing garlands of flowers, called ισμερα, or ιμερα, and having under their feet Διος κωδιον, Jupiter's ſkin, which was the ſkin of a victim offered to that god. The perſon who aſſiſted was called υδρανος, from υδωρ, water, which was uſed at the purification, and they themſelves were called μυσται, the initiated. A year after the initiation at the leſs myſteries they ſacrificed a ſow to Ceres, and were admitted in the greater, and the ſecrets of the feſtivals were ſolemnly revealed to them, from which they were called εφοροι and επoπται inſpectors. The inſtitution was performed in the following manner. The candidates, crowned with myrtle, were admitted by night into a place called μυςικος σηκος, the myſtical temple, a vaſt and ſtupendous building. As they entered the temple, they purified themſelves by waſhing their hands in holy water, and received for admonition that they were to come with a mind pure and undefiled, without which the cleanneſs of the body would be unacceptable. After this the holy myſteries were read to them, from a large book called πετρωμα, becauſe made of two ſtones, πετραι, fitly cemented together. After this the prieſt, called Ιεροφαντης, propoſed to them certain queſtions, to which they readily anſwered. After this, ſtrange and amazing objects preſented themſelves to their ſight, the place often ſeemed to quake, and to appear ſuddenly reſplendent with fire, and immediately covered with gloomy darkneſs and horror. Sometimes thunders were heard, or flaſhes of lightning appeared on every ſide. At other times hideous noiſes and howlings were heard, and the trembling ſpectators were alarmed by ſudden and dreadful apparitions. This was called αυτοψια, intuition. After this the initiated were diſmiſſed with the barbarous words of κογξ, ομπαξ. The garments in which they were initiated, were held ſacred, and of no leſs efficacy to avert evils than charms and incantations. From this circumſtance therefore they were never left off before they were totally unfit for wear, after which they were appropriated for children, or dedicated to the goddeſs. The chief perſon that attended at the initiation was called Ιεροφαντης, the revealer of ſacred things. He was a citizen of Athens, and held his office during life, though among the Celeans and Phliaſians it was limited to the period of four years. He was obliged to devote himſelf totally to the ſervice of the deities; his life was chaſte and ſingle, and he uſually anointed his body with the juice of hemlock, which is ſaid, by its extreme coldneſs, to extinguiſh in a great degree the natural heat.

The Hierophantes had three attendants; the firſt was called δαδουχος, torch-bearer, and was permitted to marry. The ſecond was called κηρυξ, a cryer. The third adminiſtered at the altar, and was called ο επι βωμω. The Hierophantes is ſaid to have been a type of the powerful Creator of all things, Δαδουχος of the ſun, Κηρυξ of Mercury, and ο επι βωμω of the moon. There were beſides theſe other inferior officers who took particular care that every thing was performed according to cuſtom. The firſt of theſe, called βασιλευς, was one of the Archons; he offered prayers and ſacrifices, and took care that there was no indecency or irregularity during the celebration. Beſides him there were four others called επιμελητα, curators, elected by the people. One of them was choſen from the ſacred family of the Eumolpidæ, the other was one of the Ceryces, and the reſt were from among the citizens. There were alſo ten perſons who aſſiſted at this and every other feſtival, called Ιεροποιοι becauſe they offered ſacrifices.—This feſtival was obſerved in the month Boedromion or September, and continued nine days from the 15th till the 23d. During that time it was unlawful to arreſt any man, or preſent any petition on pain of forfeiting a thouſand drachmas, or, according to others, on pain of death. It was alſo unlawful for thoſe who were initiated to ſit upon the cover of a well, to eat beans, mullets, or weazels. If any woman rode to Eleuſis in a chariot, ſhe was obliged by an edict of Lycurgus to pay 6,000 drachmas. The deſign of this law was to deſtroy all diſtinction between the richer and poorer ſort of citizens.—The firſt day of the celebration was called αγυρμος, aſſembly, as it might be ſaid that the worſhippers firſt met together. The ſecond day was called αλαδε μυσται, to the ſea, you that are initiated, becauſe they were commanded to purify themſelves by bathing in the ſea. On the third day ſacrifices, and chiefly a mullet, were offered; as alſo barley from a field of Eleuſis. Theſe oblations were called Θυα, and held ſo ſacred that the prieſts themſelves were not, as in other ſacrifices, permitted to partake of them. On the fourth day they made a ſolemn proceſſion, in which the καλαθιον, holy baſket of Ceres, was carried about in a conſecrated cart, while on every ſide the people ſhouted, χαιρε Δημητερ, Hail Ceres!. After theſe followed women, called κιςοφοροι, who carried baſkets, in which were ſeſamum, carded wool, grains of ſalt, a ſerpent, pomegranates, reeds, ivy boughs, certain cakes, &c. The fifth was called Η των λαμπαδων ημερα, the torch day, becauſe on the following night the people ran about with torches in their hands. It was uſual to dedicate torches to Ceres, Ceres, and contend which ſhould offer the biggeſt in commemoration of the travels of the goddeſs, and of her lighting a torch in the flames of mount Ætna. The ſixth day was called Ιακχος, from Iacchus, the ſon of Jupiter and Ceres, who accompanied his mother in her ſearch after Proſerpine with a torch in his hand. From that circumſtance his ſtatue had a torch in its hand, and was carried in ſolemn proceſſion from the Ceramicus to Eleuſis. The ſtatue, with thoſe that accompanied it, called Ιακχαγωγει, were crowned with myrtle. In the way, nothing was heard but ſinging and the noiſe of brazen kettles, as the votaries danced along. The way through which they iſſued from the city was called Ιερα οδος, the ſacred way; the reſting place, Ιερα συκη, from a fig-tree which grew in the neighbourhood. They alſo ſtopped on a bridge over the Cephiſus, where they derided thoſe that paſſed by. After they had paſſed this bridge, they entered Eleuſis by a place called μυστικη εισοδος, the myſtical entrance. On the ſeventh day were ſports, in which the victors were rewarded with a meaſure of barley, as that grain had been firſt ſown in Eleuſis. The eighth day was called Επιδαυριων ημερα, becauſe once Æſculapius, at his return from Epidaurus to Athens, was initiated by the repetition of the leſs myſteries. It became cuſtomary, therefore, to celebrate them a ſecond time upon this, that ſuch as had not hitherto been initiated might be lawfully admitted. The 9th and laſt day of the feſtival was called πλημοχοαι, earthen veſſels, becauſe it was uſual to fill two ſuch veſſels with wine, one of which being placed towards the eaſt, and the other towards the weſt, which, after the repetition of ſome myſtical words, were both thrown down, and the wine being ſpilt on the ground was offered as a libation. Such was the manner of celebrating the Eleuſinian myſteries, which have been deemed the moſt ſacred and ſolemn of all the feſtivals obſerved by the Greeks. Some have ſuppoſed them to be obſcene and abominable, and that from thence proceeded all the myſterious ſecrecy. They were carried from Eleuſis to Rome in the reign of Adrian, where they were obſerved with the ſame ceremonies as before, though perhaps with more freedom and licentiouſneſs. They laſted about 1800 years, and were at laſt aboliſhed by Theodoſius the Great. Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 24.—Cic. de Leg. 2, c. 14.—Pauſ. 10, c. 31, &c.—Plut.

ELEUTHĔRIA, a feſtival celebrated at Platæa in honor of Jupiter Eleutherius, or the aſſertor of liberty, by delegates from almoſt all the cities of Greece. Its inſtitution originated in this; after the victory obtained by the Grecians under Pauſanias over Mardonius the Perſian general in the country of Platæa, an altar and ſtatue were erected to Jupiter Eleutherius, who had freed the Greeks from the tyranny of the barbarians. It was further agreed upon in a general aſſembly, by the advice of Ariſtides the Athenian, that deputies ſhould be ſent every fifth year from the different cities of Greece to celebrate Eleutheria feſtivals of liberty. The Platæans celebrated alſo an anniverſary feſtival in memory of thoſe who had loſt their lives in that famous battle. The celebration was thus: At break of day a proceſſion was made with a trumpeter at the head, ſounding a ſignal for battle. After him followed chariots loaded with myrrh, garlands, and a black bull, and certain free young men, as no ſigns of ſervility were to appear during the ſolemnity, becauſe they in whoſe honor the feſtival was inſtituted had died in the defence of their country. They carried libations of wine and milk in large eared veſſels, with jars of oil and precious ointments. Laſt of all appeared the chief magiſtrate, who though not permitted at other times to touch iron, or wear garments of any color but white, yet appeared clad in purple; and taking a water pot out of the city chamber, proceeded through the middle of the town with a ſword in his hand, towards the ſepulchres. There he drew water from a neighbouring ſpring, and waſhed and anointed the monuments; after which he ſacrificed a bull upon a pile of wood, invoking Jupiter and infernal Mercury, and inviting to the entertainment the ſouls of thoſe happy heroes who had periſhed in the defence of their country. After this he filled a bowl with wine, ſaying, I drink to thoſe who loſt their lives in the defence of the liberties of Greece. There was alſo a feſtival of the ſame name obſerved by the Samians in honor of the god of Love. Slaves alſo, when they obtained their liberty, kept a holiday, which they called Eleutheria.

ELEUTHO, a ſirname of Juno Lucina. Pindar.

ELEUTHEROCILĬCES, a people of Cilicia, never ſubject to kings. Cic. 15, ad Fam. ep. 4. l. 5, ad Att. 20.

ELEUTHĔROS, a river of Syria, falling into the Mediterranean. Plin. 9, c. 10.

ELĬCIUS,

ELĬCIUS, a ſirname of Jupiter, worſhipped on mount Aventine. Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 328.

ELIENSIS & ELIĂCA, a ſect of philoſophers founded by Phædon of Elis, who was originally a ſlave, but reſtored to liberty by Alcibiades. Diog.—Strab.

ELIMĒA, or ELIMIOTIS, a diſtrict of Macedonia, or of Illyricum according to others. Liv. 42, c. 53. l. 45, c. 30.

ELIS, a country of Peloponneſus at the weſt of Arcadia, and north of Meſſenia, extending along the coaſt, and watered by the river Alpheus. The capital of the country is called Elis, now Belvidere. It was originally governed by kings, and received its name from Eleus, one of its monarchs. Elis was famous for the horſes it produced, whoſe celerity was ſo often known and tried at the Olympic games. Strab. 8.—Plin. 4, c. 5.—Pauſ. 5.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 494.—*Cic. ELIPHASII, a people of Peloponneſus. Polyb. 11.

ELISSA, a queen of Tyre more commonly known by the name of Dido. Vid. Dido.

ELLOPIA, a town of Eubœa.——An ancient name of that iſland.

ELISSUS, a river of Elis.

ELŌRUS, a river of Sicily on the eaſtern coaſts called after a king of the ſame name. Herodot. 7, c. 145.

ELOS, a city of Achaia, called after a ſervant maid of Athamas of the ſame name.

ELOTÆ. Vid. Helotæ.

ELPĒNOR, one of the companions of Ulyſſes, changed into a hog by Circe's potions, and afterwards reſtored to his former ſhape. He fell from the top of a houſe where he was ſleeping, and was killed. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 252.—Homer. Od. 10.

ELPINĪCE, a daughter of Miltiades, who married a man that promiſed to releaſe from confinement her brother and huſband, whom the laws of Athens had made reſponſible for the fine impoſed on his father. C. Nep. in Cim.

ELUĪNA, a ſirname of Ceres.

ELYCES, a man killed by Perſeus. Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 3.

ELYMĀIS, a country of Perſia, between the Perſian gulf and Media. The capital of the country was called Elymais, and was famous for a rich temple of Diana, which Antiochus Epiphanes attempted to plunder. The Elymeans aſſiſted Antiochus the Great in his wars againſt the Romans. None of their kings are named in hiſtory. Strabo.

ELŸMI, a nation deſcended from the Trojans, in alliance with the people of Carthage. Pauſ. 10, c. 8.

ELYMUS, a man at the court of Aceſtes in Sicily. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 73.

ELYRUS, a town of Crete. Id. 10, c. 16.

ELŸSIUM, & ELYSII CAMPI, a place or iſland in the infernal regions, where, according to the mythology of the antients, the ſouls of the virtuous were placed after death. There happineſs was complete, the pleaſures were innocent and refined. Bowers for ever green, delightful meadows with pleaſant ſtreams, were the moſt ſtriking objects. The air was wholeſome, ſerene, and temperate; the birds continually warbled in the groves, and the inhabitants were bleſſed with another ſun and other ſtars. The employments of the heroes who dwelt in theſe regions of bliſs were various; the manes of Achilles are repreſented as waging war with the wild beaſts, while the Trojan chiefs are innocently exerciſing themſelves in managing horſes, or in handling arms. To theſe innocent amuſements ſome poets have added continual feaſting and revelry, and they ſuppoſe that the Elyſian fields were filled with all the incontinence and voluptuouſneſs which could gratify the low deſires of the debauchee. The Elyſian fields were, according to ſome, in the fortunate iſlands on the coaſt of Africa, in the Atlantic. Others place them in the iſland of Leuce; and, according to the authority of Virgil, they were ſituate in Italy. According to Lucian, they were near the moon; or in the centre of the earth if we believe Plutarch. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 638.—Homer. Od. 4.—Pindar.—Tibull. 1, el. 3, v. 57.—Lucian.—Plut. de Conſol.

EMĂTHIA, a name given anciently, and particularly by the poets, to the countries which formed the empires of Macedonia and Theſſaly. Virg. G. 1, v. 492. l. 4, v. 390.—Lucan. 1, v. 1. l. 10, v. 50. l. 6, v. 620. l. 7, v. 427.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 314.

EMĂTHION, a ſon of Titan and Aurora, who reigned in Macedonia. The country was called Emathia from his name. Some ſuppoſe that he was a famous robber deſtroyed by Hercules. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 313.—Juſtin. 7, c. 1.——A man killed at the nuptials of Perſeus and Andromeda. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 100.

EMĀTHON, a man killed in the wars of Turnus. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 571.

EMBĂTUM, a place of Aſia, oppoſite Chios.

EMBOLĪMA, a town of India. Curt. 8, c. 12.

EMERĬTA, a town of Spain, famous for dying wool. Plin. 9, c. 41.

EMESSA & EMISSA, a town of Phœnicia.

EMŌDA, a mountain of India.

EMPĔDŎCLES, a philoſopher, poet, and hiſtorian of Agrigentum in Sicily, who floriſhed 444 B. C. He was the diſciple of Telauges the Pythagorean, and warmly adopted dopted the doctrine of tranſmigration. He wrote a poem upon the opinions of Pythagoras, very much commended, in which he ſpoke of the various bodies which nature had given him. He was firſt a girl, afterwards a boy, a ſhrub, a bird, a fiſh, and laſtly Empedocles. His poetry was bold and animated, and his verſes were ſo univerſally eſteemed, that they were publicly recited at the Olympic games with thoſe of Homer and Heſiod. Empedocles was no leſs remarkable for his humanity and ſocial virtues than for his learning. He ſhewed himſelf an inveterate enemy to tyranny, and refuſed to become the ſovereign of his country. He taught rhetoric in Sicily, and often alleviated the anxieties of his mind as well as the pains of his body with muſic. It is reported that his curioſity to viſit the flames of the crater of Ætna, proved fatal to him. Some maintain that he wiſhed it to be believed that he was a god, and that his death might be unknown, he threw himſelf into the crater and periſhed in the flames. His expectations, however, were fruſtrated, and the volcano by throwing up one of his ſandals, diſcovered to the world that Empedocles had periſhed by fire. Others report that he lived to an extreme old age, and that he was drowned in the ſea. Horat. 1, ep. 12, v. 20.—Cic de Orat. 1, c. 50, &c.—Diog. in vitâ.

Emperāmus, a Lacedemonian general in the ſecond Meſſenian war.

Empōclus, an hiſtorian.

Empŏria Punĭca, certain places near the Syrtes.

Emporiæ, a town of Spain in Catalonia, now Ampurias. Liv. 34, c. 9 & 16. l. 26, c. 19.

Encĕlădus, a ſon of Titan and Terra, the moſt powerful of all the giants who conſpired againſt Jupiter. He was ſtruck with Jupiter's thunders, and overwhelmed under mount Ætna. Some ſuppoſe that he is the ſame as Typhon. According to the poets, the flames of Ætna proceeded from the breath of Enceladus; and as often as he turned his weary ſide, the whole iſland of Sicily felt the motion, and ſhook from its very foundations. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 578, &c.——A ſon of Ægyptus.

Enchĕleæ, a town of Illyricum, where Cadmus was changed into a ſerpent. Lucan. 3, v. 189.—Strab. 7.

Endeis, a nymph, daughter of Chiron. She married Æacus, king of Ægina, by whom ſhe had Peleus and Telamon. Pauſ. 2, c. 29.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.

Endēra, a place of Æthiopia.

Endўmion, a ſhepherd, ſon of Æthlius and Calyce. It is ſaid that he required of Jupiter to grant to him to be always young, and to ſleep as much as he would; whence came the proverb of Endymionis ſommum dormire, to expreſs a long ſleep. Diana ſaw him naked as he ſlept on mount Latmos, and was ſo ſtruck with his beauty that ſhe came down from heaven every night to enjoy his company. Endymion married Chromia, daughter of Itonus, by whom he had three ſons, Pæon, Epeus, and Æolus, and a daughter called Eurydice. The fable of Endymion's amours with Diana, or the moon, ariſes from his knowledge of aſtronomy, and as he paſſed the night on ſome high mountain, to obſerve the heavenly bodies, it has been reported that he was courted by the moon. Some ſuppoſe that there were two of that name, the ſon of a king of Elis, and the ſhepherd or aſtronomer of Caria. The people of Heraclea maintained that Endymion died on mount Latmos, and the Eleans pretended to ſhow his tomb at Olympia in Peloponneſus. Propert. 2, el. 15.—Cic. Tuſc. 1.—Juv. 10.—Theocrit. 3—Pauſ. 5, c. 1. l. 6, c. 20.

Enĕti, or Henĕti, a people near Paphlagonia.

Engўum, now Gangi, a town of Sicily freed from tyranny by Timoleon. Cic. Ver. 3, c. 43. l. 4, c. 44.—Ital. 14, v. 250.

Enienses, a people of Greece.

Eniopeus, a charioteer of Hector killed by Diomedes. Homer. Il. 8, v. 120.

Enīpeus, a river of Theſſaly flowing near Pharſalia. Lucan. 6, v. 373.——A river of Elis in Peloponneſus, of which Tyro the daughter of Salmoneus became enamoured. Neptune aſſumed the ſhape of the river god, to enjoy the company of Tyro. Ovid. Am. 3, el. 5.—Strab.

Enispe, a town of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 25.

Enna, now Caſtro Janni, a town in the middle of Sicily, with a beautiful plain, where Proſerpine was carried away by Pluto. Mela. 2, c. 7.—Cic. Ver. 3, c. 49. l. 4, c. 104.—Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 522.—Liv. 24, c. 37.

Ennia, was wife of Macro, and afterwards of the emperor Caligula. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 45.

Q. Ennius, an antient poet, born at Rudii in Calabria. He obtained the name and privileges of a Roman citizen by his genius and the brilliancy of his learning. His ſtile is rough and unpoliſhed, but his defects, which are more particularly attributed to the age in which he lived, have been fully compenſated by the energy of his expreſſions and the fire of his poetry. Quintilian warmly commends him, and Virgil has ſhown his merit by introducing many whole lines from his poetry into his own compoſitions, which he calls pearls gathered from the dunghill. Ennius wrote in heroic verſe the annals of the Roman republic, and diſplayed much knowledge of the world in ſome dramatical and ſatyrical compoſitions. He died of the gout, contracted by frequent intoxication, about 169 years before the Chriſtian era, in the 70th year of his age. Ennius was intimate with the great men of his age; he accompanied Cato in his quæſtorſhip in Sardinia, and was eſteemed by him of greater value than the honors of a triumph; and Scipio, on his death-bed, ordered his body to be buried by the ſide of his poetical friend. This epitaph was ſaid to be written upon him:

Aſpicite, o cives, ſenis Ennii imaginis formam!
Hic veſtrum pinxit maxima facta patrum.
Nemo me lacrymis decoret, neque funera fletu
Faxit: cur? volito vivus per ora virûm.

Conſcious of his merit as the firſt Epic poet of Rome, Ennius beſtowed on himſelf the appellation of the Homer of Latium. Of the tragedies, comedies, annals, and ſatires which he wrote, nothing remains but fragments happily collected from the quotations of ancient authors. The beſt edition of theſe is by Heſſelius, 4to. Amſt. 1707. Ovid. 2, Triſt. v. 424.—Cic. de Finib. 1, c. 4, de Offic. 2, c. 18.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Lucret. 1, v. 117, &c.—C. Nep. in Catone.

Ennŏmus, a Trojan prince killed by Achilles. Homer. Il. 2.

Ennosigæus, terræ concuſſor, a ſirname of Neptune.

Enŏpe, a town of Peloponneſus, near Pylos. Pauſ. 3, c. 26.

Enops, a ſhepherd loved by the nymph Neis, by whom he had Satnius. Homer. Il. 14.——The father of Theſtos.——A Trojan killed by Patroclus. Il. 16.

Enos, a maritime town of Thrace.

Enosichthon, a ſirname of Neptune.

Enotocœtæ, a nation whoſe ears are deſcribed as hanging down to their heels. Strab.

Entella, a town of Sicily inhabited by Campanians. Ital. 14, v. 205.—Cic. Ver. 3, c. 43.

Entellus, a famous athlete among the friends of Æneas. He was intimate with Eryx, and entered the liſts againſt Dares in the funeral games of Anchiſes, in Sicily. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 387, &c.

Enyalius, a ſirname of Mars.

Enÿo, a ſiſter of Mars, called by the Latins Bellona.——A daughter of Phorcis.

Eone, a daughter of Theſpius. Apollod.

Eordæa, a diſtrict at the weſt of Macedonia. Liv. 31, c. 39. l. 33, c. 8. l. 42, c. 53.

Eos, the name of Aurora among the Greeks, whence the epithet Eous is applied to all the eaſtern parts of the world. Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 406. A. A. 3, v. 537. l. 6, v. 478.—Virg. G. 1, v. 288. l. 2, v. 115.

Eous, one of the horſes of the ſun. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 153, &c.

Epagris, one of the Cyclades, called by Ariſtotle Hydruſſa. Plin. 4, c. 12.

Epaminondas, a famous Theban deſcended from the antient kings of Bœotia. His father's name was Polymnus. He has been celebrated for his private virtues and military accompliſhments. His love of truth was ſo great that he never diſgraced himſelf by falſehood. He formed a moſt ſacred and inviolable friendſhip with Pelopidas, whoſe life he ſaved in a battle. By his advice Pelopidas delivered Thebes from the power of Lacedæmon. This was the ſignal of war. Epaminondas was ſet at the head of the Theban armies, and defeated the Spartans at the celebrated battle of Leuctra, about 371 years B. C. Epaminondas made a proper uſe of this victorious campaign, and entered the territories of Lacedæmon with 50,000 men. Here he gained many friends and partizans; but at his return to Thebes he was ſeized as a traitor for violating the laws of his country. While he was making the Theban arms victorious on every ſide, he neglected the law which forbad any citizen to retain in his hands the ſupreme power more than one month, and all his eminent ſervices ſeemed unable to redeem him from death. He paid implicit obedience to the laws of his country, and only begged of his judges that it might be inſcribed on his tomb that he had ſuffered death for ſaving his country from ruin. This animated reproach was felt; he was pardoned, and inveſted again with the ſovereign power. He was ſucceſsful in a war in Theſſaly, and aſſiſted the Eleans againſt the Lacedæmonians. The hoſtile armies met near Mantinea, and while Epaminondas was bravely fighting in the thickeſt of the enemy, he received a fatal wound in the breaſt, and expired exclaiming, that he died unconquered, when he heard that the Bœotians obtained the victory, in the 48th year of his age, 363 years before Chriſt. The Thebans ſeverely lamented his death; in him their power was extinguiſhed, for only during his life they had enjoyed freedom and independence among the Grecian ſtates. Epaminondas was frugal as well as virtuous, and he refuſed with indignation the rich preſents which were offered to him by Artaxerxes the king of Perſia. He is repreſented by his biographer as an elegant dancer and a ſkilful muſician, accompliſhments highly eſteemed among his countrymen. Plut. in Parall.—C. Nep. in vitâ.—

EPANTELII, a people of Italy.

EPAPHRODĪTUS, a freed man puniſhed with death for aſſiſting Nero to deſtroy himſelf. Suet. in Ner.——A freed man of Auguſtus ſent to ſpy Cleopatra. Plut.——A name aſſumed by Sylla.

EPĂPHUS, a ſon of Jupiter and Io, who founded a city in Egypt, which he called Memphis, in honor of his wife, who was the daughter of the Nile. He had a daughter called Libya. He was worſhipped as a god at Memphis. Herodot. 2, c. 153.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 699, &c.

EPASNACTUS, a Gaul in alliance with Rome, &c. Cæſ. bell. G. 8, c. 44.

EPEBŎLUS, a ſoothſayer of Meſſenia, who prevented Ariſtodemus from obtaining the ſovereignty. Pauſ. 4, c. 9, &c.

EPĒI & ELĒI, a people of Peloponneſus. Plin. 4, c. 5.

EPETIUM, now Viſcio, a town of Illyricum.

EPĒUS, a ſon of Endymion, brother to Pæon, who reigned in a part of Peloponneſus. His ſubjects were called from him Epei. Pauſ. 5, c. 1.——A ſon of Panopeus, who was the fabricator of the famous wooden horſe which proved the ruin of Troy. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 264.—Juſtin. 20, c. 2.—Pauſ. 10, c. 26.

EPHĔSUS, a city of Ionia, built, as Juſtin mentions, by the Amazons; or by Androchus, ſon of Codrus, according to Strabo; or by Epheſus, a ſon of the river Cayſter. It is famous for a temple of Diana, which was reckoned one of the ſeven wonders of the world. This temple was 425 feet long and 200 feet broad. The roof was ſupported by 127 columns, ſixty feet high, which had been placed there by ſo many kings. Of theſe columns, 36 were carved in the moſt beautiful manner, one of which was the work of the famous Scopas. This celebrated building was not totally completed till 220 years after its foundation. Cteſiphon was the chief architect. There was above the entrance a huge ſtone, which, according to Pliny, had been placed there by Diana herſelf. The riches which were in the temple were immenſe, and the goddeſs who preſided over it was worſhipped with the moſt awful ſolemnity. This celebrated temple was burnt on the night that Alexander was born, [Vid. Eroſtratus] and ſoon after it roſe from its ruins with more ſplendor and magnificence. Alexander offered to rebuild it at his own expence, if the Epheſians would place upon it an inſcription which denoted the name of the benefactor. This generous offer was refuſed by the Epheſians, who obſerved, in the language of adulation, that it was improper that one deity ſhould raiſe temples to the other. Lyſimachus ordered the town of Epheſus to be called Arſinoe, in honor of his wife; but after his death the new appellation was loſt, and the town was again known by its antient name. Though modern authors are not agreed about the antient ruins of this once famed city, ſome have given the barbarous name of Ajaſaloue to what they conjecture to be the remains of Epheſus. The words literæ Epheſiæ are applied to letters containing magical powers. Plin. 36, c. 14.—Strab. 12 & 14.—Mela. 1, c. 17.—Pauſ. 7, c. 2.—Plut. in Alex.—Juſtin. 2, c. 4.—Callim. in Dian.—Ptol. 5.—*Cic. de Nat. EPHĔTÆ, a number of magiſtrates at Athens firſt inſtituted by Demophoon, the ſon of Theſeus. They were reduced to the number of 51 by Draco, who, according to ſome, firſt eſtabliſhed them. They were ſuperior to the Areopagites, and their privileges were great and numerous. Solon, however, leſſened their power, and entruſted them only with the trial of manſlaughter and conſpiracy againſt the life of a citizen. They were all more than fifty years old, and it was required that their manners ſhould be pure and innocent, and their behaviour auſtere and full of gravity.

EPHIALTES or EPHIALTUS, a giant, ſon of Neptune, who grew nine inches every month. [Vid. Aloeus.]——An Athenian famous for his courage and ſtrength. He fought with the Perſians againſt Alexander, and was killed at Halicarnaſſus. Diod. 17.——A Trachinian who led a detachment of the army of Xerxes by a ſecret path to attack the Spartans at Thermopylæ. Pauſ. 1, c. 4.—Herodot. 7, c. 213.

EPHŎRI, powerful magiſtrates at Sparta, who were firſt created by Lycurgus; or, according to ſome, by Theopompus, B. C. 760: They were five in number. Like cenſors in the ſtate, they could check and reſtrain the authority of the kings, and even impriſon them, if guilty of irregularities. They fined Archidamus for marrying a wife of ſmall ſtature, and impriſoned Agis for his unconſtitutional behaviour. They were much the ſame as the tribunes of the people at Rome, created to watch with a jealous eye over the liberties and rights of the populace. They had the management of the public money, and were the arbiters of peace and war. Their office was annual, and they had the privilege of convening, proroguing, and diſſolving the greater and leſs aſſemblies of the people. The former was compoſed of 9000 Spartans, all inhabitants of the city; the latter of 30,000 Lacedæmonians, inhabitants of the inferior towns and villages.

EPHŎRUS, an orator and hiſtorian of Cumæ in Æolia, about 352 years before Chriſt. He was diſciple to Iſocrates, by whoſe advice he wrote an hiſtory which gave an account of all the actions and battles that had happened between the Greeks and barbarians for 750 years. It was greatly eſteemed by the ancients. It is now loſt. Quintil. 10, c. 1.

EPHŸRA, the antient name of Corinth, which it received from a nymph of the ſame name, and thence Ephyreus is applied to Dyrrhachium, founded by a Grecian colony. Virg. G. 2, v. 264.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 239.—Lucan. 6, v. 17.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 59.—Ital. 14, v. 181.——A city of Theſprotia in Epirus.——Another in Elis.——Ætolia.——One of Cyrene's attendants. Virg. G. 4, v. 343.

EPICASTE, a name of Jocaſta the mother and wife of Œdipus. Pauſ. 9, c. 5.

EPICERIDES, a man of Cyrene, greatly eſteemed by the Athenians for his beneficence. Demoſt.

EPICHĂRIS, a woman accuſed of conſpiracy againſt Nero. She refuſed to confeſs the aſſociates of her guilt, though expoſed to the greateſt torments, &c. Tacit. 15, Ann. c. 51.

EPICHARMUS, a poet and Pythagorean philoſopher of Sicily, who introduced comedy at Syracuſe, in the reign of Hiero. His compoſitions were imitated by Plautus. He wrote ſome treatiſes upon philoſophy and medicine, and obſerved that the gods ſold all their kindneſſes for toil and labor. According to Ariſtotle and Pliny, he added the two letters χ and ϑ to the Greek alphabet. He floriſhed about 440 years before Chriſt, and died in the 90th year of his age. Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 58.—Diog. 3 & 8.—Cic. ad Attic. 1. ep. 19.

EPICLES, a Trojan prince killed by Ajax. Homer. Il. 12.

EPICLĪDES, a Lacedæmonian of the family of the Euryſthenidæ. He was raiſed to the throne by his brother Cleomenes 3d. in the place of Agis, againſt the laws and conſtitution of Sparta. Pauſ. 2, c. 9.

EPICRĂTES, a Mileſian, ſervant to J. Cæſar.——A poet of Ambracia. Ælian.

EPICTĒTUS, a Stoic philoſopher of Hierapolis in Phrygia, originally the ſlave of Epaphroditus, the freedman of Nero. Tho' driven from Rome by Domitian, he returned after the emperor's death, and gained the eſteem of Adrian and Marcus Aurelius. Like the Stoics he ſupported the doctrine of the immortality of the ſoul, but he declared himſelf ſtrongly againſt ſuicide, which was ſo warmly adopted by his ſect. He died in a very advanced age. The earthen lamp of which he made uſe, was ſold ſome time after his death at 3000 drachmas. His Enchiridion is a faithful picture of the ſtoic philoſophy; and his diſſertations which were delivered to his pupils, were collected by Arrian. His ſtile is conciſe and devoid of all ornament, full of energy and uſeful maxims. The value of his compoſitions is well known from the ſaying of the emperor Antoninus, who thanked the gods he could collect from the writings of Epictetus wherewith to conduct life with honor to himſelf and advantage to his country. There are ſeveral good editions of the works of Epictetus, with thoſe of Cebes and others; the moſt valuable of which, perhaps, will be found to be that of Reland, Traject. 4to. 1711; and Arrian's by Upton, 2 vols. 4to. Lond. 1739.

EPĬCŪRUS, a celebrated philoſopher born at Gargettus in Attica of obſcure parents. He was early ſent to ſchool, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the brilliancy of his genius, and at the age of 12, when his preceptor repeated him this verſe from Heſiod, Ητοι μεν πρωτιστα χαος γενετ', &c.

In the beginning of things the Chaos was created.

Epicurus earneſtly aſked him who created it? To this the teacher anſwered, that he knew not, but only philoſophers. "Then," ſays the youth, "philoſophers henceforth ſhall inſtruct me." After having improved himſelf, and enriched his mind by travelling, he viſited Athens, which was then crowded by the followers of Plato, the Cynics, the Peripatetics, and the Stoics. Here he eſtabliſhed himſelf and ſoon attracted a number of followers by the ſweetneſs and gravity of his manners, and by his ſocial virtues. He taught them that the happineſs of mankind conſiſted in pleaſure, not ſuch as ariſes from ſenſual gratification, or from vice, but from the enjoyments of the mind, and the ſweets of virtue. This doctrine was warmly attacked by the philoſophers of the different ſects, and particularly by the Stoics. They obſerved that he diſgraced the gods by repreſenting them as inactive, given up to pleaſure, and unconcerned with the affairs of mankind. He refuted all the accuſations of his adverſaries by the purity of his morals, and by his frequent attendance on places of public worſhip. When Leontium, one of his female pupils, was accuſed of proſtituting herſelf to her maſter and to all his diſciples, the philoſopher proved the falſity of the accuſation by ſilence and an exemplary life. His health was at laſt impaired by continual labor, and he died of a retention of urine, which which long ſubjected him to the moſt excruciating torments, and which he bore with unparalleled fortitude. His death happened 270 years before Chriſt, in the 72d year of his age. His diſciples ſhewed their reſpect for the memory of their learned preceptor, by the unanimity which prevailed among them. While philoſophers in every ſect were at war with mankind and among themſelves, the followers of Epicurus enjoyed perfect peace, and lived in the moſt ſolid friendſhip. The day of his birth was obſerved with univerſal feſtivity, and during a month all his admirers gave themſelves up to mirth and innocent amuſement. Of all the philoſophers of antiquity, Epicurus is the only one whoſe writings deſerve attention for their number. He wrote no leſs than 300 volumes, according to Diogenes Laertius; and Chryſippus was ſo jealous of the fecundity of his genius, that no ſooner had Epicurus publiſhed one of his volumes, but he immediately compoſed one, that he might not be overcome in the number of his productions. Epicurus, however, advanced truths and arguments unknown before; but Chryſippus ſaid, what others long ago had ſaid, without ſhewing any thing which might be called originality. The followers of Epicurus were numerous in every age and country, his doctrines were rapidly diſſeminated over the world, and when the gratification of the ſenſe was ſubſtituted to the practice of virtue, the morals of mankind were undermined and deſtroyed. Even Rome, whoſe auſtere ſimplicity had happily nurtured virtue, felt the attack, and was corrupted. When Cyneas ſpoke of the tenets of the Epicureans in the Roman ſenate, Fabricius indeed intreated the Gods that all the enemies of the republic might become his followers. But thoſe were the feeble efforts of expiring virtue; and when Lucretius introduced the popular doctrine in his poetical compoſition, the ſmoothneſs and beauty of the numbers contributed, with the effeminacy of the Epicureans, to enervate the conquerors of the world. Diog. in vitâ.—*Ælian. EPIDIUS, a man who wrote concerning unuſual prodigies. Plin. 16, c. 25.

EPIDOTÆ, certain deities who preſided over the birth of children. They were worſhipped by the Lacedæmonians, and chiefly invoked by thoſe who were perſecuted by the ghoſts of the dead, &c. Pauſ. 3, c. 17, &c.

EPIGENES, a Babylonian aſtrologer and hiſtorian. Plin. 7, c. 56.

EPIGEUS, a Greek killed by Hector.

EPIGŌNI, the ſons and deſcendants of the Grecian heroes who were killed in the firſt Theban war. The war of the Epigoni is famous in ancient hiſtory. It was undertaken ten years after the firſt. The ſons of thoſe who had periſhed in the firſt war, reſolved to avenge the death of their fathers, and marched againſt Thebes, under the command of Therſander; or, according to others, of Alcmæon the ſon of Amphiaraus. The Argives were aſſiſted by the Corinthians, the people of Meſſenia, Arcadia, and Megara. The Thebans had engaged all their neighbours in their quarrel, as in one common cauſe, and the two hoſtile armies met and engaged on the banks of the Gliſſas. The fight was obſtinate and bloody, but victory declared for the Epigoni, and ſome of the Thebans fled to Illyricum with Leodamas their general, while others retired into Thebes, where they were ſoon beſieged, and forced to ſurrender. In this war Ægialeus alone was killed, and his father Adraſtus was the only perſon who eſcaped alive in the firſt war. This whole war, as Pauſanias obſerves, was written in verſe; and Callinus, who quotes ſome of the verſes, aſcribes them to Homer, which opinion has been adopted by many writers. For my part, continues the geographer, I own that next to the Iliad and Odyſſey of Homer, I have never ſeen a finer poem. Pauſ. 9, c. 9 & 25.—Apollod. 1 & 3.—Diod. 4.——This name has been applied to the ſons of thoſe Macedonian veterans who in the age of Alexander formed connections with the women of Aſia.

EPILARIS, a daughter of Theſpius.—Apollod.

EPIMĔLĬDES, the founder of Corone. Pauſ. 4, c. 34.

EPIMĔNES, a man who conſpired againſt Alexander's life. Curt. 8, c. 6.

EPIMENĬDES, an epic poet of Crete, contemporary with Solon. His father's name was Agiaſarchus. He is reckoned one of the ſeven wiſe men, by thoſe who exclude Periander from the number. While he was tending his flocks one day, he entered into a cave, where he fell aſleep. His ſleep continued for 57 years, according to tradition, and when he awoke he found every object ſo conſiderably altered, that he ſcarce knew where he was. His brother apprized him of the length of his ſleep to his great aſtoniſhment. It is ſuppoſed that he lived 289 years. After death he was revered as a god, and greatly honored by the Athenians, whom he had delivered from a plague, and to whom he had given many good and uſeful counſels. He is ſaid to be the firſt who built temples in the Grecian communities. Cic. de Div. 1.—Diog. in vitâ.—Pauſ. 1, c. 14.—Plut. in Solon.—Val. Max. 8, c. 13.—Strab. 10.—Plin. 7. c. 12.

EPĬMĒTHEUS, a ſon of Japetus and Clymene, one of the Oceanides, who inconſiderately married Pandora, by whom he had Pyrrha, the wife of Deucalion. He had the curioſity to open the box which Pandora had brought with her, [Vid. Pandora] and from thence iſſued a train of evils, which from that moment have never ceaſed to afflict the human race. Hope was the only one which remained at the bottom of the box, not having ſufficient time to eſcape, and it is ſhe alone which comforts men under misfortunes. Epimetheus was changed into a monkey by the gods, and ſent into the iſland of Pithecuſa. Apollod. 1, c. 2 & 7.—Hygin. fab.—Heſiod. Theog. [Vid. Prometheus.] EPĬMĒTHIS, a patronymic of Pyrrha, the daughter of Epimetheus. Ovid. Met. 1. v. 390.

ERASIPPUS, a ſon of Hercules and Lyſippe.

ERASISTRĂTUS, a celebrated phyſician, grandſon to the philoſopher Ariſtotle. He diſcovered by the motion of the pulſe the love which Antiochus had conceived for his mother-in-law Stratonice, and was rewarded with 100 talents for the cure by the father of Antiochus. He was a great enemy to bleeding and violent phyſic. He died B. C. 257. Val. Max. 5, c. 7.—Plut. in Demetr.

ERĂTO, one of the Muſes, who preſided over lyric, tender, and amorous poetry. She is repreſented as crowned with roſes and myrtle, holding a lyre in her hand. She appears with a thoughtful and ſometimes with a gay and animated look. She was invoked by lovers, eſpecially in the month of April, which, among the Romans, was more particularly devoted to love. Apollod. 10.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 37.—Ovid. de art. am. 2.——One of the Nereides. Apollod. 1, c. 2.——One of the Dryades, wife of Arcas, king of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 4.——One of the Danaides who married Bromius.—— A queen of the Armenians, after the death of Ariobarzanes, &c. Tacit. Am. 2, c. 4.

ERATOSTHĔNES, a native of Cyrene, who was the ſecond entruſted with the care of the Alexandrian library. He dedicated his time to grammatical criticiſm and philoſophy, but more particularly to poetry and mathematics. He has been called a ſecond Plato, the coſmographer, and the geometer of the world. He is ſuppoſed the inventor of the armillary ſphere. With the inſtruments with which the munificence of the Ptolemies ſupplied the library of Alexandria, he was enabled to meaſure the obliquity of the ecliptic, which he called 20½ degrees. He alſo meaſured a degree of the meridian, and determined the extent and circumference of the earth with great exactneſs, by means adopted by the moderns. He ſtarved himſelf after he had lived to his 82d year, B. C. 194. Some few fragments remain of his compoſitions. He collected the annals of the Egyptian kings by order of one of the Ptolemies. Cic. ad Attic. 2, ep. 6.—Varro. de R. R. 1, c. 2.

ERATOSTRĂTUS, an Epheſian who burnt the famous temple of Diana, the ſame night that Alexander the Great was born. This burning, as ſome writers have obſerved, was not prevented or ſeen by the goddeſs of the place, who was then preſent at the labors of Olympias, and the birth of the conqueror of Perſia. Eratoſtratus did this villainy merely to eternize his name by ſo uncommon an action. Plut. in Alex. —Val. Max. 8, c. 14.

ERĀTUS, a ſon of Hercules and Dynaſte. Apollod.——A king of Sicyon, who died B. C. 1671.

ERCHIA, a ſmall village of Attica, the birth place of Xenophon. Laert. 2, c. 48.

ERĔBUS, a deity of hell, ſon of Chaos and Darkneſs. He married Night, by whom he had the light and the day. The poets often uſed the word Erebus to ſignify hell itſelf, and particularly that part where dwelt the ſouls of thoſe who had lived a virtuous life, from whence they paſſed into the Elyſian fields. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 17.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 26.

ERECHTHEUS, ſon of Pandion 1ſt, was the ſixth king of Athens. He was father of Cecrops 2d, Metion, Pandorus, and four daughters, Creuſa, Orithya, Procris, and Othonia, by Praxithea. In a war againſt Eleuſis he ſacrificed Othonia, called alſo Chthonia, to obtain a victory which the oracle promiſed for ſuch a ſacrifice. In that war he killed Eumolpus, Neptune's ſon, who was the general of the enemy, for which he was ſtruck with thunder by Jupiter at Neptune's requeſt. Some ſay that he was drowned in the ſea. After death he received divine honors at Athens. He reigned 50 years, and died B. C. 1347. According to ſome accounts, he firſt introduced the myſteries of Ceres at Eleuſis. Ovid. 6, v. 877.—Pauſ. 2, c. 25.—Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Cic. pro Sext. 21. Tuſc. 1, c. 48. *Nat. ERIPHIDAS, a Lacedæmonian who being ſent to ſuppreſs a ſedition at Heraclea, aſſembled the people and beheaded 500 of the ringleaders. Diod. 14.

ERĬPHŸLE, a ſiſter of Adraſtus king of Argos, who married Amphiaraus. She was daughter of Talaus and Lyſimache. When her huſband concealed himſelf that he might not accompany the Argives in their expedition againſt Thebes, where he knew he was to periſh, Eriphyle ſuffered herſelf to be bribed by Polynices with a golden necklace which had been formerly given to Hermione by the goddeſs Venus, and ſhe diſcovered where Amphiaraus was. This treachery of Eriphyle compelled him to go to the war; but before he departed, he charged his ſon Alcmæon to murder his mother as ſoon as he was informed of his death. Amphiaraus periſhed in the expedition, and his death was no ſooner known than his laſt injunctions were obeyed, and Eriphyle was murdered by the hands of her ſon. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 445.—Homer. Od. 11.—Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 18.—Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 3, c. 6 & 7.—Hygin. fab. 73.—Pauſ. 5, c. 17.

ERIS, the goddeſs of diſcord among the Greeks. She is the ſame as the Diſcordia of the Latins. Vid. Diſcordia.

ERISICHTHON, a Theſſalian, ſon of Triops, who derided Ceres and cut down her groves. This impiety irritated the goddeſs, who afflicted him with continual hunger. He ſquandered all his poſſeſſions to gratify the cravings of his appetite, and at laſt he devoured his own limbs for want of food. His daughter had the power of transforming herſelf into whatever animal ſhe pleaſed, and ſhe made uſe of that artifice to maintain her father, who ſold her, after which ſhe aſſumed another ſhape and became again his property. Ovid. Met. fab. 18.

ERITHUS, a ſon of Actor, killed by Perſeus. Ovid. Met. 5.

ERIXO, a Roman knight condemned by the people for having whipped his ſon to death. Senec. 1, de Clem. 14.

ERŌCHUS, a town of Phocis. Pauſ. 10, c. 3.

ERYMNEUS, a Peripatetic philoſopher who floriſhed B. C. 126.

ERŸMUS, a huntſman of Cyzicus.

ERYTHĒA, an iſland between Gades and Spain, where Geryon reigned. Plin. 4, c. 22.—Mela. 3, c. 6.—Propert 4. el. 10, v. 1.—Sil. 16, v. 195.—Ovid. Faſt. 5, v. 649.——A daughter of Geryon. Pauſ. 10, c. 37.

ERYTHĪNI, a town of Paphlagonia.

ERŸTHRÆ, a town of Ionia, oppoſite Chios, once the reſidence of a Sibyl. It was built by Neleus, the ſon of Codrus. Pauſ. 10, c. 12.—Liv. 44, c. 28. l. 38, c. 39.——A town of Bœotia. Id. 6, c. 21.——One in Libya,—another in Locris.

ERŸTHRÆUM MARE, a part of the ocean on the coaſt of Arabia. As it has a communication with the Perſian gulf, and that of Arabia or the Red Sea, it has often been miſtaken by ancient writers, who by the word Erythrean, underſtood indiſcriminately either the Red Sea or the Perſian gulf. It received this name either from Erythras, or from the redneſs (ερυθρος, ruber) of its ſand or waters. Curt. 8, c. 9.—Plin. 6, c. 23.—Herodot. 1, c. 180 & 189. l. 3, c. 93. l. 4, c. 37.—Mela. 3, c. 8.

ERŸTHRAS, a ſon of Hercules. Apollod.——A ſon of Perſeus and Andromeda, drowned in the Red Sea, which from him was called Erythræum. Arrian. Ind. 6, c. 19.—Mela. 3, c. 7.

ERYTHRION, a ſon of Athamas and Themiſtone. Apollod.

ERŸTHROS, a place of Latium.

ERYX, a ſon of Butes and Venus, who relying upon his ſtrength, challenged all ſtrangers to fight with him in the combat of the ceſtus. Hercules accepted his challenge after many had yielded to his ſuperior dexterity, and Eryx was killed in the combat, and buried on the mountain, where he had built a temple to Venus. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 402.——An Indian killed by his ſubjects for oppoſing Alexander, &c. Curt. 8, c. 11.——A mountain of Sicily now Giuliano near Drepanum, which received its name from Eryx, who was buried there. This mountain was ſo ſteep that the houſes which were built upon it ſeemed every moment ready to fall. Dædalus had enlarged the top, and encloſed it with a ſtrong wall. He alſo conſecrated there to Venus Erycina a golden heifer, which ſo much reſembled life, that it ſeemed to exceed the power of art. Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 478.—Hygin. fab. 16 & 260.—Liv. 22, c. 9.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Pauſ. 3, c. 16.

ERYXO, the mother of Battus, who artfully killed the tyrant Learchus who courted her. Herodot. 4, c. 160.

ESERNUS, a famous gladiator. Cic.

ESQUĬLIÆ & ESQUILĪNUS MONS, one of the ſeven hills of Rome, which was joined to the city by king Tullus. Birds of prey generally came to devour the dead bodies of criminals who had been executed there, and thence they were called Equilinæ alites. Liv. 2, c. 11.—Horat. 5, epod. v. 100.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 32.

ESSEDŎNES, a people of Aſia, above the Palus Mæotis, who eat the fleſh of their parents mixed with that of cattle. They gilded the head and kept it as ſacred. Mela. 2, c. 1.—Plin. 4, c. 12.

ESTIÆOTIS, a diſtrict of Theſſaly.

ESŬLA, a town of Italy near Tibur. Horat. 3, Od. 29, v. 6.

ESTIAIA, ſolemn ſacrifices to Veſta, of which it was unlawful to carry away any thing or communicate it to any body.

ETEARCHUS, a king of Oaxus in Crete. After the death of his wife, he married a woman who made herſelf odious for her tyranny over her ſtep-daughter Phronima. Etearchus gave ear to all the accuſations which were brought againſt his daughter, and ordered her to be thrown into the ſea. She had a ſon called Battus, who led a colony to Cyrene. Herodot. 4, c. 154.

ETEŎCLES, a ſon of Œdipus and Jocaſta. After his father's death, it was agreed between him and his brother Polynices, that they ſhould both ſhare the royalty, and reign alternately each a year. Eteocles by right of ſeniority firſt aſcended the throne, but after the firſt year of his reign was expired he refuſed to give up the crown to his brother according to their mutual agreement. Polynices, reſolving to puniſh ſuch an open violation of a ſolemn engagement, went to implore the aſſiſtance of Adraſtus, king of Argos. He received that king's daughter in marriage, and was ſoon after aſſiſted with a ſtrong army, headed by ſeven famous generals. Theſe hoſtile preparations were watched by Eteocles, who on his part did not remain inactive. He choſe ſeven brave chiefs to oppoſe the ſeven leaders of the Argives, and ſtationed them at the ſeven gates of the city. He placed himſelf againſt his brother Polynices, and he oppoſed Menalippus to Tydeus, Polyphontes to Capaneus, Megareus to Eteoclus, Hyperbius to Parthenopæus, and Laſthenes to Amphiaraus. Much blood was ſhed in light and unavailing ſkirmiſhes, and it was at laſt agreed between the two brothers that the war ſhould be decided by ſingle combat. They both fell in an engagement conducted with the moſt inveterate fury on either ſide, and it is even ſaid that the aſhes of theſe two brothers, who had been ſo inimical one to the other, ſeparated themſelves on the burning pile, as if even after death, ſenſible of reſentment, and hoſtile to reconciliation. Stat. Theb.—Apollod. 3, c. 5, &c.—Æſchyl. Sept. ante Theb.—Eurip. in Phæniſ.—Pauſ. 5, c. 9. l. 9, c. 6.——A Greek, the firſt who raiſed altars to the Graces. Pauſ.

ETEŎCLUS, one of the ſeven chiefs of the army of Adraſtus, in his expedition againſt Thebes. He was killed by Megareus, the ſon of Creon, under the walls of Thebes. Furip.—Apollod. 3, c. 6.——A ſon of Iphis.

ETEOCRĒTÆ, an ancient people of Crete.

ETEONES, a town of Bœotia on the Aſopus. Stat. Theb. 7, v. 266.

ETEONEUS, an officer of Menelaus. Homer. Od. 4.

ETEONĪCUS,

ETEONĪCUS, a Lacedæmonian general, who upon hearing that Callicratidas was conquered at Arginuſæ, ordered the meſſengers of this news to be crowned, and to enter Mitylene in triumph. This ſo terrified Conon, who beſieged the town, that he concluded that the enemy had obtained ſome advantageous victory, and he raiſed the ſiege. Diod. 13.—Polyæn. 1.

ETĒSIÆ, northern winds of a gentle and mild nature, very common in the months of ſpring and autumn. Lucret. 5, v. 741.

ETIAS, a daughter of Æneas. Pauſ. 3, c. 22.

ETIS, a town of Peloponneſus. Id. Ib.

ETRŪRIA. Vid. Hetruria.

ETYLUS, the father of Theocles. Id. 6, c. 19.

EVADNE, a daughter of Iphis or Iphicles of Argos, who ſlighted the addreſſes of Apollo, and married Capaneus one of the ſeven chiefs who went againſt Thebes. When her huſband had been ſtruck with thunder by Jupiter for his blaſphemies and impiety, and his aſhes had been ſeparated from thoſe of the reſt of the Argives, ſhe threw herſelf on his burning pile and periſhed in the flames. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 447. —Propert. 1, el. 15, v. 21.—Stat. Theb. 12, v. 800.——A daughter of the Strymon and Neæra. She married Argus, by whom ſhe had four children. Apollod. 2.

EVAGES, a poet famous for his genius but not for his learning.

EVĂGŎRAS, a king of Cyprus who retook Salamis, which had been taken from his father by the Perſians. He made war againſt Artaxerxes, the king of Perſia with the aſſiſtance of the Egyptians, Arabians and Tyrians, and obtained ſome advantage over the fleet of his enemy. The Perſians however ſoon repaired their loſſes, and Evagoras ſaw himſelf defeated by ſea and land, and obliged to be tributary to the power of Artaxerxes, and to be ſtripped of all his dominions except the town of Salamis. He was aſſaſſinated ſoon after this fatal change of fortune, by an eunuch, 374 B. C. He left two ſons, Nicocles, who ſucceeded him, and Protagoras, who deprived his nephew Evagoras of his poſſeſſions. Evagoras deſerves to be commended for his ſobriety, moderation, and magnanimity, and if he was guilty of any political error in the management of his kingdom, it may be ſaid, that his love of equity was a full compenſation. His grandſon bore the ſame name, and ſucceeded his father Nicocles. He ſhowed himſelf oppreſſive, and his uncle Protagoras took advantage of his unpopularity to deprive him of his power. Evagoras fled to Artaxerxes Ochus, who gave him a government more extenſive than that of Cyprus, but his oppreſſion rendered him odious, and he was accuſed before his benefactor, and by his orders put to death. C. Nep. 12, c. 2.—Diod. 14.—Pauſ. 1, c. 3.—Juſtin. 5, c. 6. —— A man of Elis who obtained a prize at the Olympian games. Pauſ. 5, c. 8.—— A Spartan famous for his ſervices to the people of Elis. Id. 6, c. 10.——A ſon of Neleus and Chloris. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—— A ſon of Priam. Id. 3, c. 12.——A king of Rhodes.——An hiſtorian of Lindos.—— Another of Thaſos, whoſe works proved ſerviceable to Pliny in the completion of his natural hiſtory. Plin. 10.

EVAN, a ſirname of Bacchus, which he received from the wild ejaculation of Evan! Evan! by his prieſteſſes. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 15.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 517.

EVANDER, a ſon of the propheteſs Carmente, king of Arcadia. An accidental murder obliged him to leave his country, and he came to Italy, where he drove the Aborigines from their ancient poſſeſſions, and reigned in that part of the country where Rome was afterwards founded. He kindly received Hercules when he returned from the conqueſt of Geryon; and he was the firſt who raiſed him altars. He gave Æneas aſſiſtance againſt the Rutuli, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his hoſpitality. It is ſaid that he firſt brought the Greek alphabet into Italy, and introduced there the worſhip of the Greek deities. He was honored as a God after death, and his ſubjects raiſed him an altar on mount Aventine. Pauſ. 8, c. 43.—Liv. 1, c. 7.—Ital. 7, v. 18.—Dionyſ. Hal. 1, c. 7.—Ovid. Faſt. 1, v. 500. l. v. 91. —Virg. Æn. 8, v. 100, &c.——A philoſopher of the 2d academy, who floriſhed B. C. 215.

Eubius, an obſcene writer, &c. Ovid. Triſt. 2, v. 415.

Eubœa, the largeſt iſland in the Ægean ſea after Crete, now called Negropont. It is ſeparated from the continent of Bœotia by the narrow ſtraits of the Euripus, and was anciently known by the different names of Macris, Ocha, Ellopia, Chalcis, Abantis, Aſopis. It is 150 miles long, and 37 broad in its moſt extenſive parts, and 365 in circumference. The principal town was Chalcis; and it was reported that in the neighbourhood of Chalcis, the iſland had been formerly joined to the continent. Eubœa was ſubjected to the power of the Greeks; ſome of its cities, however, remained for ſome time independent. Plin. 4, c. 12. —Strab. 10.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 155.—— One of the three daughters of the river Aſterion, who was one of the nurſes of Juno. Pauſ. 2, c. 17.—— One of Mercury's miſtreſſes.——A daughter of Theſpius. Apollod. 2.—— A town of Sicily near Hybla.

Euchēnor, a ſon of Ægyptus and Arabia. Apollod.

Euchides, an Athenian who went to Delphi and returned the ſame day, a journey of about 107 miles. The object of his journey was to obtain ſome ſacred fire.

Euclīdes, a native of Megara, diſciple of Socrates, B. C. 404. When the Athenians had forbidden all the people of Megara on pain of death to enter their city, Euclides diſguiſed himſelf in women's cloathes to introduce himſelf into the preſence of Socrates. Diog. in Socrate.——A mathematician of Alexandria, who floriſhed 300 B. C. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his writings on muſic and geometry, but particularly by 15 books on the elements of mathematics, which conſiſt of problems and theorems with demonſtrations. This work has been greatly mutilated by commentators. Euclid was ſo reſpected in his life time that king Ptolemy became one of his pupils. Euclid eſtabliſhed a ſchool at Alexandria, which became ſo famous that, from his age to the time of the Saracen conqueſt, no mathematician was found but what had ſtudied at Alexandria. He was ſo reſpected that Plato, himſelf a mathematician, being aſked concerning the building of an altar at Athens, referred his enquirers to the mathematician of Alexandria. The lateſt edition of Euclid's writings is that of Gregory, fol. Oxon. 1703. Val. Max. 8, c. 12. —Cic. de Orat. 3, c. 72.

Eudoxus, a ſon of Æſchines of Cnidus, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his knowledge of aſtrology, medicine, and geometry. He was the firſt who regulated the year among the Greeks, among whom he firſt brought from Egypt the celeſtial ſphere and regular aſtronomy. He ſpent a great part of his life on the top of a mountain, to ſtudy the motion of the ſtars, by whoſe appearance he pretended to foretell the events of futurity. He died in his 53d year, B. C. 352. Lucan. 10, v. 187.—Diog.—Petron. 88.——A native of Cyzicus, who ſailed all round the coaſt of Africa from the Red ſea, and entered the Mediterranean by the columns of Hercules.——A Sicilian, ſon of Agathocles.——A phyſician. Diog.

Evelthon, a king of Salamis in Cyprus.

Euemĕridas, an hiſtorian of Cnidus.

Evemĕrus, an ancient hiſtorian of Meſſenia, intimate with Caſſander. He travelled over Greece and Arabia, and wrote an hiſtory of the gods, in which he proved that they all had been upon earth, as mere mortal men. Ennius tranſlated it into Latin. It is now loſt.

Evēnus, an elegiac poet of Paros.——A river of Ætolia flowing into the Ionian ſea. It receives its name from Evenus, ſon of Mars and Sterope, who being unable to overcome Idas, who had promiſed him his daughter Marpeſſa in marriage, if he ſurpaſſed him in running, grew ſo deſperate that he threw himſelf into the river, which afterwards bore his name. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 104.—Strab. 7.——A ſon of Jaſon and Hypſipyle, queen of Lemnos. Homer. Il. 7.

Evephēnus, a Pythagorean philoſopher, whom Dionyſius condemned to death becauſe he had alienated the people of Metapontum from his power. The philoſopher begged leave of the tyrant to go and marry his ſiſter, and promiſed to return in ſix months. Dionyſius conſented by receiving Eucritus, who pledged himſelf to die if Evephenus did not return in time. Evephenus returned at the appointed moment, to the aſtoniſhment of Dionyſius, and delivered his friend Eucritus from the death which threatened him. The tyrant was ſo pleaſed with theſe two friends, that he pardoned Evephenus, and begged to ſhare their friendſhip and confidence. Polyæn. 5.

Everes, a ſon of Peteralaus,—of Hercules and Parthenope.——The father of Tireſias. Apollod.

Evergĕtæ, a people of Scythia called alſo Arimaſpi. Curt. 7, c. 3.

Evergĕtes, a ſirname, ſignifying benefactor, given to Philip of Macedonia, and to Antigonus Doſon, and Ptolemy of Egypt. It was alſo commonly given to the kings of Syria and Pontus, and we often ſee among the former an Alexander Evergetes, and among the latter a Mithridates Evergetes. Some of the Roman emperors alſo claimed that epithet, ſo expreſſive of benevolence and humanity.

Evesperĭdes, a people of Africa. Herodot. 4, c. 171.

Eugănei, a people of Italy on the borders of the Adriatic, who, upon being expelled by the Trojans, ſeized upon a part of the Alps. Sil. 8, v. 604.—Liv. 1, c. 1.

Eumĕnes, a Greek officer in the army of Alexander, ſon of a charioteer. He was the moſt worthy of all the officers of Alexander to ſucceed after the death of his maſter. He conquered Paphlagonia and Cappadocia, of which he obtained the government, till the power and jealouſy of Antigonus obliged him to retire. He joined his forces to thoſe of Perdiccas, and defeated Craterus and Neoptolemus. Neoptolemus periſhed by the hands of Eumenes. When Craterus had been killed during the war, his remains received an honorable funeral from the hand of the conqueror; and Eumenes, after weeping over the aſhes of a man who once was his deareſt friend, ſent his remains to his relations in Macedonia. Eumenes fought againſt Antipater and conquered him, and after the death of Perdiccas, his ally, his arms were directed againſt Antigonus, by whom he was conquered, chiefly by the treacherous conduct of his officers. This fatal battle obliged him to diſband the greateſt part of his army to ſecure himſelf a retreat, and he fled with only 700 faithful attendants to Nora, a fortified place on the confines of Cappadocia, where he was ſoon beſieged by the conqueror. He ſupported the ſiege for a year with courage and reſolution, but ſome diſadvantageous ſkirmiſhes ſo reduced him, that his ſoldiers, grown deſperate, and bribed by the offers of the enemy, had the infidelity to betray him into the hands of Antigonus. The conqueror, from ſhame or remorſe, had not the courage to viſit Eumenes; but when he was aſked by his officers, in what manner he wiſhed him to be kept, he anſwered, keep him as carefully as you would keep a lion. This ſevere command was obeyed; but the aſperity of Antigonus vaniſhed in a few days, and Eumenes, delivered from the weight of chains, was permitted to enjoy the company of his friends. Even Antigonus heſitated whether he ſhould not reſtore to his liberty a man with whom he had lived in the greateſt intimacy while both were ſubſervient to the command of Alexander, and theſe ſecret emotions of pity and humanity were not a little encreaſed by the petitions of his ſon Demetrius for the releaſe of Eumenes. But the calls of ambition prevailed; and when Antigonus recollected what an active enemy he had in his power, he ordered Eumenes to be put to death in the priſon; (though ſome imagine he was murdered without the knowledge of his conqueror). His bloody commands were executed B. C. 315. Such was the end of a man who raiſed himſelf to power by merit alone. His ſkill in public exerciſes firſt recommended him to the notice of Philip, and under Alexander his attachment and fidelity to the royal perſon, and particularly his military accompliſhments, promoted him to the rank of a general. Even his enemies revered him; and Antigonus, by whoſe orders he periſhed, honored his remains with a ſplendid funeral, and conveyed his aſhes to his wife and family in Cappadocia. It has been obſerved, that Eumenes had ſuch an univerſal influence over the ſucceſſors of Alexander, that none during his life time dared to aſſume the title of king; and it does not a little reflect to his honor, to conſider that the wars he carried on were not from private or intereſted motives, but for the good and welfare of his deceaſed benefactor's children. Plut. & C. Nep. in vitâ.—Diod. 19.—Juſtin. 13. —Curt. 10.—Arian.——A king of Pergamus, who ſucceeded his uncle Philetærus on the throne, B. C. 263. He made war againſt Antiochus the ſon of Seleucus, and enlarged his poſſeſſions by ſeizing upon many of the cities of the kings of Syria. He lived in alliance with the Romans, and made war againſt Pruſias, king of Bithynia. He was a great patron of learning, and given much to wine. He died of an exceſs in drinking, after a reign of 22 years. He was ſucceeded by Attalus. Strab. 15.—— The ſecond of that name ſucceeded his father Attalus on the throne of Aſia and Pergamus. His kingdom was ſmall and poor, but he rendered it powerful and opulent, and his alliance with the Romans did not a little contribute to the encreaſe of his dominions after the victories obtained over Antiochus the Great. He carried his arms againſt Pruſias and Antigonus, and died B. C. 159, after a reign of 38 years, leaving the kingdom to his ſon Attalus 2d. He has been been admired for his benevolence and magnanimity, and his love of learning greatly enriched the famous library of Pergamus, which had been founded by his predeceſſors in imitation of the Alexandrian collection of the Ptolemies. His brothers were ſo attached to him and devoted to his intereſt, that they enliſted among his body guards to ſhow their fraternal fidelity. Strab. 13. —Juſtin. 31 & 34.—Polyb.——A celebrated orator of Athens about the beginning of the fourth century. Some of his harangues and orations are extant.——An hiſtorical writer in Alexander's army.

EUMĔNIA, a city of Phrygia, built by Attalus in honor of his brother Eumenes. ——A city of Thrace,——of Caria. Plin. 5, c. 29,—of Hyrcania.

EUMĔNIDES & EUMENES, a man mentioned Ovid. 3. Triſt. el. 4, v. 27.

EUMĔNĬDES, a name given to the Furies by the antients. They ſprang from the drops of blood which flowed from the wound which Cœlus received from his ſon Saturn. According to others they were daughters of the earth, and conceived from the blood of Saturn. Some make them daughters of Acheron and Night, or Pluto and Proſerpine. According to the moſt received opinions, they were three in number, Tiſiphone, Megara, and Alecto, to which ſome add Nemeſis. Plutarch mentions only one called Adraſta, daughter of Jupiter and Neceſſity. They were ſuppoſed to be the miniſters of the vengeance of the gods, and therefore appeared ſtern and inexorable; always employed in puniſhing the guilty upon earth, as well as in the infernal regions. They inflicted their vengeance upon earth by wars, peſtilence, and diſſenſions, and by the ſecret ſtings of conſcience; and in hell they puniſhed the guilty by continual flagellation and torments. They were alſo called Furiæ and Erinnyes. Their worſhip was almoſt univerſal, and people preſumed not to mention their names or fix their eyes upon their temples. They were honored with ſacrifices and libations, and in Achaia they had a temple, which when entered by any one guilty of crime, ſuddenly rendered him furious, and deprived him of the uſe of his reaſon. In their ſacrifices, the votaries uſed branches of cedar and of alder, hawthorn, ſaffron, and juniper, and the victims were generally turtle doves and ſheep, with libations of wine and honey. They were generally repreſented with a grim and frightful aſpect, with a black and bloody garment, and ſerpents wreathing round their head inſtead of hair. They held a burning torch in one hand, and a whip of ſcorpions in the other, and were always attended by terror, rage, paleneſs, and death. In hell they were ſeated around Pluto's throne, as the miniſters of his vengeance. Æſchyl. in Eumen.—Sophocl. in Oedip. Col.

EUMĔNĬDIA, feſtivals in honor of the Eumenides, called by the Athenians σεμναι θεαι venerable goddeſſes. They were celebrated once every year with ſacrifices of pregnant ewes, with offerings of cakes made by the moſt eminent youths, and libations of honey and wine. At Athens none but free-born citizens were admitted, ſuch as had led a life the moſt virtuous and unſullied. Such only were accepted by the goddeſs who puniſhed all ſorts of wickedneſs in a ſevere manner.

EUMĒNIUS, a Trojan killed by Camilla in Italy. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 666.

EUMOLPĬDÆ, the prieſts of Ceres at the celebration of her feſtivals of Eleuſis. All cauſes relating to impiety or profanation were referred to their judgment, and their deciſions, though occaſionally ſevere, were conſidered as generally impartial. The Eumolpidæ were deſcended from Eumolpus, a king of Thrace, who was made prieſt of Ceres by Erechtheus king of Athens. He became ſo powerful after his appointment to the prieſthood, that he maintained a war againſt Erechtheus. This war proved fatal to both; Erechtheus and Eumolpus were both killed, and peace was re-eſtabliſhed among their deſcendants, on condition that the prieſthood ſhould ever remain in the family of Eumolpus, and the regal power in the houſe of Erechtheus. The prieſthood continued in the family of Eumolpus for 1200 years; and this is ſtill more remarkable, becauſe he who was once appointed to the holy office, was obliged to remain in perpetual celibacy. Pauſ. 2, c. 14.

EUMOLPUS, a king of Thrace, ſon of Neptune and Chione. He was thrown into the ſea by his mother, who wiſhed to conceal her ſhame from her father. Neptune ſaved his life, and carried him into Æthiopia, where he was brought up by a woman, one of whoſe daughters he married. An act of violence to his ſiſter-in-law obliged him to leave Æthiopia, and he fled to Thrace with his ſon Iſmarus, where he married the daughter of Tegyrius the king of the country. This connection to the royal family rendered him ambitious; he conſpired againſt his father-in-law, and fled, when the conſpiracy was diſcovered, to Attica, where he was initiated in the myſteries of Ceres of Eleuſis, and made Hierophantes or High Prieſt. He was afterwards reconciled to Tegyrius, and inherited his kingdom. He made war againſt Erechtheus, the king of Athens, who had appointed him to the office of high prieſt, and periſhed in battle. His deſcendants were alſo inveſted with the prieſthood, which which remained for about 1200 years in that family. Vid. Eumolpidæ. Apollod. 2, c. 5. &c.—Hygin. fab. 73.—Diod. 5.—Pauſ. 2, c. 14.

EUNÆUS, a ſon of Jaſon by Hypſipyle daughter of Thoas. Homer. Il. 7.

EUNAPIUS, a phyſician, ſophiſt, and hiſtorian, born at Sardis. He floriſhed in the reign of Valentinian and his ſucceſſors, and wrote an hiſtory of the Cæſars, of which few fragments remain. His life of the philoſophers of his age is ſtill extant. It is compoſed with fidelity and elegance, preciſion and correctneſs.

EUNŎMIA, a daughter of Juno, one of the Horæ. Apollod.

EUNŎMUS, a ſon of Prytanes, who ſucceeded his father on the throne of Sparta. Pauſ. 2, c. 36.——A famous muſician of Locris, rival to Ariſton. Strab. 6.——A man killed by Hercules. Apollod.——A Thracian, who adviſed Demoſthenes not to be diſcouraged by his ill ſucceſs in his firſt attempts to ſpeak in public. Plut. in Dem. ——The father of Lycurgus killed by a kitchen knife. Plut. in Lyc.

EUNUS, a Syrian ſlave who inflamed the minds of the ſervile multitude by pretended inſpiration and enthuſiaſm. He filled a nut with ſulphur in his mouth, and by artfully conveying fire to it, he breathed out flames to the aſtoniſhment of the people, who believed him to be a god, or ſomething more than human. Oppreſſion and miſery compelled 2000 ſlaves to join his cauſe, and he ſoon ſaw himſelf at the head of 50,000 men. With ſuch a force he defeated the Roman armies, till Perpenna obliged him to ſurrender by famine, and expoſed on a croſs the greateſt part of his followers; B. C. 132. Plut. in Sert.

EUONYMOS, one of the Lipari iſles.

EUORAS, a grove of Laconia. Pauſ. 3, c. 10.

EUPAGIUM, a town of Peloponneſus.

EUPALĂMON, one of the hunters of the Calydonian boar. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 360.

EUPALĂMUS, the father of Dædalus. Apollod. 3, c. 15.

EUPĂTOR, a ſon of Antiochus.——The firname of Eupator was given to many of the Aſiatic princes, ſuch as Mithridates, &c. Strab. 12.

EUPĂTORIA, a town of Paphlagonia, built by Mithridates, and called afterwards Pompeiopolis by Pompey. Plin. 6, c. 2.—— Another called Magnopolis in Pontus, now Tehenikeh. Strab. 12.

EUPEITHES, a prince of Ithaca, father to Antinous. He was one of the moſt importuning lovers of Penelope. Homer. Od. 16.

EUPHAES, ſucceeded Androcles on the throne of Meſſenia, and in his reign the firſt Meſſenian war began. He died B.C. 730. Pauſ. 4, c. 5 & 6.

EUPHANTUS, a poet and hiſtorian of Olynthus, ſon of Eubulides, and preceptor to Antigonus king of Macedonia. Diog. in Eucl.

EUPHĒME, a woman who was nurſe to the Muſes, and mother of Crocus by Pan. Pauſ.

EUPHĒMUS, a ſon of Neptune and Europa, who was among the Argonauts, and the hunters of the Calydonian boar. He was ſo ſwift and light that he could run over the ſea without ſcarce wetting his feet. Pindar. Pyth. 4.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Pauſ. 5, c. 17. ——One of the Greek captains before Troy. Homer. Il. 2.

EUPHORBUS, a famous Trojan, ſon of Panthous, the firſt who wounded Patroclus, whom Hector killed. He periſhed by the hand of Menelaus, who hung his ſhield in the temple of Juno at Argos. Pythagoras, the founder of the doctrine of the metempſychoſis, or tranſmigration of ſouls, affirmed that he had been once Euphorbus, and that his ſoul recollected many exploits which had been done while it animated that Trojan's body. As a further proof of his aſſertion, he ſhewed at firſt ſight the ſhield of Euphorbus in the temple of Juno. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 160.—Pauſ. 2, c. 17.—Homer. Il. 16 & 17.——A phyſician of Juba, king of Mauritania.

EUPHORION, a Greek poet of Chalcis in Eubœa, in the age of Antiochus the Great. Tiberius took him for his model for correct writing, and was ſo fond of him that he hung his pictures in all the public libraries. His father's name was Polymnetus. He died in his 56th year B. C. 220. Cicero de Nat. D. 2, c. 64, calls him Obſcurum.——The father of Æſchylus bore the ſame name.

EUPHRĀNOR, a famous painter and ſculptor of Corinth. Plin. 34, c. 8.——This name was common to many Greeks.

EUPHRĀTES, a diſciple of Plato who governed Macedonia with abſolute authority in the reign of Perdiccas, and rendered himſelf odious by his cruelty and pedantry. After the death of Perdiccas, he was murdered by Parmenio.——A ſtoic philoſopher in the age of Adrian, who deſtroyed himſelf, with the emperor's leave, to eſcape the miſeries of old age, A. D. 118. Dio.——A large and celebrated river of Meſopotamia, riſing from mount Taurus in Armenia, and diſcharging itſelf with the Tigris into the Perſian gulf. It is very rapid in its courſe, and paſſes through the middle of the city of Babylon. It inundates the country of Meſopotamia at a cer-a certain ſeaſon of the year, and, like the Nile in Egypt, happily fertilizes the adjacent fields. Cyrus dried up its antient channel, and changed the courſe of the waters when he beſieged Babylon. Strab. 11.—Mela. 1, c. 2. l. 3, c. 8.—Plin. 5, c. 24.—Virg. G. 1, v. 509. l. 4, v. 560.

EUPHRON, an aſpiring man of Sicyon, who enſlaved his country by bribery. Diod. 15.

EUPHRŎSŸNA, one of the graces, ſiſter to Aglaia and Thalia. Pauſ. 9, c. 35.

EUPLÆA, an iſland of the Tyrrhene ſea, near Neapolis. Stat. 3, Silv. 1, 149.

EUPŎLIS, a comic poet of Athens, who floriſhed 435 years before the Chriſtian æra, and ſeverely laſhed the vices and immoralities of his age. It is ſaid that he had compoſed 17 dramatical pieces at the age of 17. He had a dog ſo attached to him, that at his death he refuſed all aliments, and ſtarved himſelf on his tomb. Some ſuppoſe that Alcibiades put Eupolis to death becauſe he had ridiculed him in his verſes; but Suidas maintains that he periſhed in a ſea fight between the Athenians and the Lacedæmonians in the Helleſpont, and that on that account his countrymen, pitying his fate, decreed, that no poet ſhould ever after go to war. Horat. 1. ſat. 4. l. 2, ſat. 10.—Cic. ad Attic. 6, ep. 1.—Ælian.

EUPOMPUS, a geometrician of Macedonia. ——A painter. Plin. 34, c. 8.

EURIANASSA, a town near Chios. Plin. 5, c. 31.

EURĬPĬDES, a celebrated tragic poet born at Salamis the day on which the army of Xerxes was defeated by the Greeks. He ſtudied eloquence under Prodicus, ethics under Socrates, and philoſophy under Anaxagoras. He applied himſelf to dramatical compoſition, and his writings became ſo much the admiration of his countrymen, that the unfortunate Greeks, who had accompanied Nicias in his expedition againſt Syracuſe, were freed from ſlavery, only by repeating ſome verſes from the pieces of Euripides. The poet often retired from the ſociety of mankind, and confined himſelf in a ſolitary cave where he wrote and finiſhed his moſt excellent tragedies. The talents of Sophocles were looked upon by Euripides with jealouſy, and the great enmity which always reigned between the two poets, gave an opportunity to the comic muſe of Ariſtophanes to ridicule them both on the ſtage with ſucceſs and humor. During the repreſentation of one of the tragedies of Euripides, the audience, diſpleaſed with ſome lines in the compoſition, deſired the writer to ſtrike them off. Euripides heard the reproof with indignation; he advanced forward on the ſtage, and told the ſpectators, that he came there to inſtruct them, and not to receive inſtruction. Another piece in which he called riches the ſummum bonum and the admiration of gods and men, gave equal diſſatisfaction, but the poet deſired the audience to liſten with ſilent attention, for the concluſion of the whole would ſhow them the puniſhment which attended the lovers of opulence. The ridicule and envy to which he was continually expoſed, obliged him at laſt to remove from Athens. He retired to the court of Archelaus king of Macedonia, where he received the moſt conſpicuous marks of royal munificence and friendſhip. His end was as deplorable as it was uncommon. It is ſaid that the dogs of Archelaus met him in his ſolitary walks and tore his body to pieces 407 years before the chriſtian era, in the 78th year of his age. Euripides wrote 75 tragedies, of which only 19 are extant; the moſt approved of which are his Phœniſſæ, Oreſtes, Medea, Andromache, Electra, Hippolytus, Iphigenia in Aulis, Iphigenia in Tauris, Hercules and the Troades. He is peculiarly happy in expreſſing the paſſions of love, eſpecially the more tender and animated. To the pathos he has added ſublimity, and the moſt common expreſſions have received a perfect poliſh from his pen. In his perſon, as it is reported, he was noble and majeſtic, and his deportment was always grave and ſerious. He was ſlow in compoſing, and labored with difficulty, from which circumſtance a fooliſh and malevolent poet once obſerved, that he had written 100 verſes in three days, while Euripides had written only three. True, ſays Euripides, but there is this difference between your poetry and mine; yours will expire in three days, but mine ſhall live for ages to come. Euripides was ſuch an enemy to the fair ſex that ſome have called him μισογυνης woman hater, and perhaps from this averſion ariſe the impure and diabolical machinations which appear in his female characters, an obſervation, however, which he refuted, by ſaying he had faithfully copied nature. In ſpite of all this antipathy he was married twice, but his connections were ſo injudicious, that he was compelled to divorce both his wives. The beſt editions of this great poet are that of Muſgrave, 4 vols. 4to. Oxon. 1778; that of Canter apud Commelin, 12mo. 2 vols. 1597; and that of Barnes, fol. Cantab. 1694. There are alſo ſeveral valuable editions of detached plays. Diod. 13.—Val. Max. 3, c. 7.—Cic. In. 1, c. 50. Or. 3, c 7. Acad. 1, 4. Offic. 3; Finib. 2. Tuſc. 1 & 4, &c.

EURĪPUS, a narrow ſtrait which ſeparates the iſland of Eubœa from the coaſt of Bœotia. Its flux and reflux, which continued regular during 18 or 19 days, and was uncommonly unsettled the rest of the month, was a matter of deep inquiry among the antients, and it is said that Aristotle threw himself into it because he was unable to find out the causes of that phænomenon. Liv. 28, c. 6.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Plin. 2, c. 95.—Strab. 9.

EURISTHENES. Vid. Eurysthenes.

EURŌMUS, a city of Caria. Liv. 32, c. 33. l. 33, c. 30.

EURŌPA, one of the three grand divisions of the earth, known among the antients, extending, according to modern surveys, about 3000 miles from north to south, and 2500 from east to west. It is superior to the others in the learning, power, and abilities of its inhabitants. It is bounded on the east by the Ægean sea, Hellespont, Euxine, Palus Mæotis, and the Tanais in a northern direction. The Mediterranean divides it from Africa on the south, and on the west and north it is washed by the Atlantic and Northern Oceans. It is supposed to receive its name from Europa, who was carried there by Jupiter. Mela. 2, c. 1.—Plin. 3, c. 1, &c.—Lucan. 3, v. 275.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 222.——A daughter of Agenor king of Phœnicia, and Telephassa. She was so beautiful that Jupiter became enamoured of her, and the better to seduce her he assumed the shape of a bull and mingled with the herds of Agenor, while Europa, with her female attendants were gathering flowers in the meadows. Europa caressed the beautiful animal, and at last had the courage to sit upon his back. The god took advantage of her situation, and with precipitate steps retired towards the shore, and crossed the sea with Europa on his back, and arrived safe in Crete. Here he assumed his original shape and declared his love. The nymph consented, though she had once made vows of perpetual celibacy, and she became mother of Minos, Sarpedon, and Rhadamanthus. After this distinguished amour with Jupiter, she married Asterius king of Crete. This monarch seeing himself without children by Europa, adopted the fruit of her amours with Jupiter, and always esteemed Minos, Sarpedon, and Rhadamanthus, as his own children. Some suppose that Europa lived about 1552 years before the Christian era. Ovid. Met. 2, fab. 13.—Mosch. Idyl.—Apollod. 2, c. 5. l. 3. c. 1.——One of the Oceanides.——A part of Thrace near mount Hæmus. Justin. 7, c. 1.

Eurydămĭdas, a king of Lacedæmon, of the family of the Proclidæ. Pauſ. 3, c. 10.

Eurydĭce, the wife of Amyntas, king of Macedonia. She had by her huſband Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip, and one daughter called Euryone. A criminal partiality for her daughter's huſband, to whom ſhe offered her hand and the kingdom, made her conſpire againſt Amyntas, who muſt have fallen a victim to her infidelity had not Euryone diſcovered it. Amyntas forgave her. Alexander aſcended the throne after his father's death, and periſhed by the ambition of his mother. Perdiccas who ſucceeded him ſhared his fate; but Philip, who was the next in ſucceſſion, ſecured himſelf againſt all attempts from his mother, and aſcended the throne with peace and univerſal ſatisfaction. Eurydice fled to Iphicrates the Athenian general for protection. The manner of her death is unknown. C. Nep. in Iphic. 3.——A daughter of Amyntas, who married her uncle Aridæus, the illegitimate ſon of Philip. After the death of Alexander the Great, Aridæus aſcended the throne of Macedonia, but he was totally governed by the intrigues of his wife, who called back Caſſander and joined her forces with his to march againſt Polyperchon and Olympias. Eurydice was forſaken by her troops, Aridæus was pierced through with arrows by order of Olympias, who commanded Eurydice to deſtroy herſelf either by poiſon, the ſword, or the halter. She choſe the latter. ——The wife of the poet Orpheus. As ſhe fled before Ariſtæus, who wiſhed to offer her violence, ſhe was bit by a ſerpent in the graſs, and died of the wound. Orpheus was ſo diſconſolate that he ventured to go to hell, where, by the melody of his lyre, he obtained from Pluto the reſtoration of his wife to life provided he did not look behind before he came upon earth. He violated the conditions, as his eagerneſs to ſee his wife rendered him forgetful. He looked behind, and Eurydice was for ever taken from him. [Vid. Orpheus.] Virg. Il. 2.——A prince of Olenus, who went with Hercules againſt Laomedon. Pauſ. 7, c. 19.——A ſon of Meciſteus who ſignalized himſelf in the war of the Epigoni againſt Thebes. Apollod. 3.——A ſon of Temenus king of Meſſenia, who conſpired againſt his father's life. Id. 3, c. 6.——A ſon of Neptune killed by Hercules. Id. 2, c. 7.——One of Penelope's ſuitors. Id. 3, c. 10.——A Theſſalian who became delirious for looking into a box which fell to his ſhare after the plunder of Troy. Pauſ. 7, c. 19.——A foothſayer in the Grecian camp before Troy, ſent to conſult the oracle of Apollo, how his countrymen could return ſafe home. The reſult of his enquiries was the injunction to offer an human ſacrifice. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 114.—Ovid.

Eurysthĕnes, a ſon of Ariſtodemus, who lived in perpetual diſſention with his twin brother Procles, while they both ſat on the Spartan throne. It was unknown which of the two was born firſt, the mother, who wiſhed to ſee both her ſons raiſed on the throne, refuſed to declare it, and they were both appointed kings of Sparta by order of the oracle of Delphi, B. C. 1102. After the death of the two brothers, the Lacedæmonians, who knew not to what family the right of ſeniority and ſucceſſion belonged, permitted two kings to ſit on the throne, one of each family. The deſcendants of Euryſthenes were called Euryſthenidæ, and thoſe of Procles, Proclidæ. It was inconſiſtent with the laws of Sparta for two kings of the ſame family to aſcend the throne together, yet that law was ſometimes violated by oppreſſion and tyranny. Euryſthenes had a ſon called Agis who ſucceeded him. His deſcendants were called Agidæ. There ſat on the throne of Sparta 31 kings of the family of Euryſthenes, and only 24 of the Proclidæ. The former were the more illuſtrious. Herodot. 4, c. 147. l. 6, c. 52.—Pauſ. 3, c. 1.—C. Nep. in Ageſ.

Eurysthenĭdæ. Vid. Euryſthenes.

Eurysthĕus, a king of Argos and Mycenæ, ſon of Sthenelus and Nicippe the daughter of Pelops. Juno haſtened his birth by two months, that he might come into the world before Hercules the ſon of Alcmena, as the younger of the two was doomed by order of Jupiter to be ſubſervient to the will of the other. [Vid. Alcmena.] This natural right was cruelly exerciſed by Euryſtheus, who was jealous of the fame of Hercules, and who, to deſtroy ſo powerful a relation, impoſed upon him the moſt dangerous and uncommon enterprizes well known by the name of the twelve labors of Hercules. The ſucceſs of Hercules in atchieving thoſe perilous labors alarmed Euryſtheus in a greater degree, and he furniſhed himſelf with a brazen veſſel, where he might ſecure himſelf a ſafe retreat in caſe of danger. After the death of Hercules, Euryſtheus renewed his cruelties againſt his children, and made war againſt Ceyx king of Trachinia becauſe he had given them ſupport, and treated them with hoſpitality. He was killed in the proſecution of this war by Hyllus the ſon of Hercules. His head was ſent to Alcmena the mother of Hercules, who mindful of the cruelties which her ſon had ſuffered, inſulted it, and tore out the eyes with the moſt inveterate fury. Euryſtheus was ſucceeded on the throne of Argos by Atreus his nephew. Hygin. fab. 30 & 32.—Apollod. 2, c. 4, &c.—Pauſ. 1, c. 33. l. 3, c. 6.—Ovid. Met. 9, fab. 6.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 292.

Eurўte, a daughter of Hippodamus, who married Parthaon. Apollod.——The mother of Hallirhotius, by Neptune. Id.

Eryteæ, a town of Achaia. Pauſ. 7, c. 18.

Eurўtĕle, a daughter of Theſpius.——A daughter of Leucippus. Apollod.

Eurythĕmis, the wife of Theſtius. Apollod.

Eurўthion & Eurytion, a Centaur whoſe inſolence to Hippodamia was the cauſe of the quarrel between the Lapithæ and Centaurs, at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12.—Pauſ. 5, c. 10.—Heſiod. Theog.——A herdſman of Geryon killed by Hercules. Apollod. 2.——A king of Sparta who ſeized upon Mantinea by ſtratagem. Polyæn. 2.——One of the Argonauts. Ovid. Met. 8, v. 311——A ſon of Lycaon, who ſignalized himſelf during the funeral games exhibited in Sicily by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 495.——A ſilverſmith. Id. 10, v. 499.——A man of Heraclea convicted of adultery.

tery. His puniſhment was the cauſe of the abolition of the oligarchical power there. Ariſtot. 5 Polit.

EURYTIS, (idos) a patronymic of Iole daughter of Eurytus. Ovid. Met. 9. fab. 11.

EURŸTUS, a ſon of Mercury, among the Argonauts. Flacc. 1, v. 439.——A king of Œchalia, father to Iole. He offered his daughter to him who ſhot a bow better than himſelf. Hercules conquered him, and put him to death becauſe he refuſed him his daughter as the prize of his victory. Apollod. 2, c. 4 & 7.——A ſon of Actor, concerned in the wars between Augias and Hercules.——A ſon of Augias killed by Hercules as he was going to Corinth to celebrate the Iſthmian games Apollod.——A perſon killed in hunting the Calydonian boar.——A ſon of Hippocoon. Id. 3, c. 10. ——A giant killed by Hercules or Bacchus for making war againſt the Gods.

EUSEBIA, an empreſs, wife to Conſtantius, &c.

EUSEBIUS, a biſhop of Cæſarea in great favor with the emperor Conſtantine. He was concerned in the theological diſputes of Arius and Athanaſius, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his writings, which conſiſted of an eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, the life of Conſtantine, Chronicon, evangelical preparations, and other numerous treatiſes, moſt of which are now loſt. The beſt edition of his Præparatio & Demonſtratio Evangelica, is by Vigerus, 2 vols. folio; Rothomagi, 1628; and of his eccleſiaſtical hiſtory by Reading, folio Cantab. 1720.

EUSEBIUS, a ſirname of Bacchus.

EUSEPUS & PEDASUS, the twin ſons of Bucolion killed in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 6.

EUSTATHIUS, a Greek commentator on the works of Homer. The beſt edition of this very valuable author, is that publiſhed at Baſil, 3 vols. fol. 1560. It is to be lamented the deſign of Alexander Politus, began at Florence in 1735, and publiſhed in the firſt 5 books of the Iliad, is not executed, as a Latin tranſlation of theſe excellent commentaries is among the deſiderata of the preſent day.——A man who wrote a very fooliſh romance in Greek, entitled de Iſmeniæ & Iſmenes amoribus, edited by Gaulminus, 8vo. Paris, 1617.

EUTÆA, a town of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 27.

EUTELIDAS, a famous ſtatuary of Argos. Id. 6, c. 10.

EUTERPE, one of the Muſes, daughter o Jupiter and Mnemoſyne. She preſided over muſic, and was looked upon as the inventreſs of the flute. She is repreſented as crowned with flowers and holding a flute in her hands. Some mythologiſts attributed to her the invention of tragedy, more commonly ſuppoſed to be the production of Melpomene.——The name of the mother of Themiſtocles according to ſome.

EUTHYCRĂTES, a ſculptor of Sicyon, ſon of Lyſippus. He was peculiarly happy in the proportions of his ſtatues. Thoſe of Hercules and Alexander were in general eſteem, and particularly that of Medea, which was carried on a chariot by four horſes. Plin. 34, c. 8.——A man who betrayed Olynthus to Philip.

EUTHYDĒMUS, an orator and rhetorician who greatly diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his eloquence, &c. Strab. 14.

EUTHŸMUS, a celebrated boxer of Locri in Italy, &c. Pauſ. 6, c. 6.

EUTRAPĔLUS, a man deſcribed as artful and faliacious by Horat 1, ep. 18, v. 31. ——A hair dreſſer. Martial. 7, ep. 82.

EUTRĂPĔLUS, (Volumn.) a friend of M. Antony, &c.

EUTROPIUS, a Latin hiſtorian in the age of Julian, under whom he carried arms in the fatal expedition againſt the Perſians. His origin as well as his dignity are unknown; yet ſome ſuppoſe, from the epithet of Clariſſimus prefixed to his hiſtory, that he was a Roman ſenator. He wrote an epitome of the hiſtory of Rome, from the age of Romulus to the reign of the emperor Valens, to whom the work was dedicated. He wrote a treatiſe on medicine without being acquainted with the art. Of all his works the Roman hiſtory alone is extant. It is compoſed with conciſeneſs and preciſion, but without elegance. The beſt edition of Eutropius is that of Haverkamp, Cum notis variorum, 8vo. L. Bat. 1729 & 1762.——A famous eunuch at the court of Arcadius the ſon of Theodoſius the great, &c.

EUTYCHĬDE, a woman who was thirty times brought to bed, and carried to the grave by twenty of her children. Plin. 7, c. 3.

EUTYCHĬDES, a learned ſervant of Atticus, &c. Cic. 15. ad Attic.——A ſculptor.

EUXANTHIUS, a daughter of Minos and Dexithea. Apollod.

EUXENĬDAS, a painter, &c. Plin. 35.

EUXĔNUS, a man who wrote a poetical hiſtory of the fabulous ages of Italy. Dionyſ. Hal. 1.

EUXĪNUS PONTUS, a ſea between Aſia and Europe, partly at the north of Aſia Minor and at the weſt of Colchis. It was antiently called ἀξεινος inhoſpitable, on account of the ſavage manners of the inhabitants on its coaſts. Commerce with foreign nations, and the plantation of colonies in their neighbourhood, gradually ſoftened their roughneſs, and the ſea was no longer called Axenus, but Euxenus, hoſpitable. The Euxine is ſuppoſed by Herodotus to be 1387 miles long and 420 broad. Strabo calls it 1100 miles long, and in circumference 3125. It abounds in all varieties of fish, and receives the tribute of above 40 rivers. It is not of great depth, except in the eastern parts, whence some have imagined that it had a subterraneous communication with the Caspian. It is called the Black sea, from the thick dark fogs which cover it. Ovid. Trist. 3, el. 13. l. 4, el. 4, v. 54.—Strab. 2, &c.—Mela. 1, c. 1.—Plin. 9.—Herodot 4, c. 85.

EUXIPPE, a woman who killed herself because the ambassadors of Sparta had offered violence to her virtue, &c.

EXADIUS, one of the Lapithæ at the nuptials of Pirithous. Homer. Il. 1, v. 264.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 266.

EXÆTHES, a Parthian who cut off the head of Crassus, &c. Polyæn. 7.

EXAGŎNUS, the ambassador of a nation in Cyprus who came to Rome and talked so much of the power of herbs, serpents, &c. that the consuls ordered him to be thrown into a vessel full of serpents. These venomous creatures far from hurting him, caressed him, and harmlessly licked him with their tongues. Plin. 28, c. 3.

EXOMĂTRÆ, a people of Asiatic Sarmatia. Flacc. 6, v. 144.

FABARIS, now Farfa, a river of Italy in the territories of the Sabines, called also Farfarus. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 715.

FABIA. Vid. Fabius Fabricianus.

FĂBIA LEX, de ambitu was to circumscribe the number of Sectatores or attendants which were allowed to candidates in canvassing for some high office. It was proposed but did not pass.

FĂBIA, a tribe at Rome. Horat. 1, ep. 7, v. 52.——A vestal virgin sister to Terentia Cicero's wife.

FĂBIĀNI, some of the Luperci at Rome, instituted in honor of the Fabian family.

FĂBII, a noble and powerful family at Rome, who derived their name from faba, a bean, because some of their ancestors cultivated this pulse. They were once so numerous that they took upon themselves to wage a war against the Veientes. They came to a general engagement near the Cremera, in which all the family, consisting of 306 men, were totally slain, B. C. 477. There only remained one whose tender age had detained him at Rome, and from him arose the noble Fabii in the following ages. The family was divided into six different branches, the Ambusti, the Maximi, the Vibulani, the Buteones, the Dorsones, and the Pictores, the three first of which are frequently mentioned in the Roman history, but the others seldom. Dionys. 9.—Liv. 2, c. 46, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 2.—Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 235.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 845.

FĂBIUS Maximus Rullianus was the first of the Fabii who obtained the surname of Maximus, for lessening the power of the populace at elections. He was master of horse, and his victory over the Samnites in that capacity, nearly cost him his life, because he engaged the enemy without the command of the dictator. He was five times consul, twice dictator, and once censor. He triumphed over seven different nations in the neighbourhood of Rome, and rendered himself illustrious by his patriotism.——Rusticus, an historian in the age of Claudius and Nero. He was intimate with Seneca, and the encomiums which Tacitus passes upon his style, make us regret the loss of his compositions.——Marcellinus, an historian in the second century.——A Roman lawyer whom Horat. 1, sat. 2, v. 134, ridicules as having been caught in adultery.——Q. Maximus, a celebrated Roman, first surnamed Verrucosus from a wart on his lip, and Agnicula from his inoffensive manners. From a dull and unpromising childhood he burst into deeds of valor and heroism, and was gradually raised by merit to the highest offices of the state. In his first consulship, he obtained a victory over Liguria, and the fatal battle of Thrasymenus occasioned his election to the dictatorship. In this important office he began to oppose Annibal, not by fighting him in the open field, like his predecessors, but he continually harassed his army by countermarches and ambuscades, from which he received the surname of Cunctator or delayer. Such operations, for the commander of the Roman armies, gave offence to some, and Fabius was even accused of cowardice. He, however, still pursued the measures which prudence and reflection seemed to dictate as most salutary to Rome, and he patiently bore to see his master of horse raised to share the dictatorial dignity with himself, by means of his enemies at home. When he had laid down his office of dictator, his successors, for a while, followed his plan, but the rashness of Varro, and his contempt for the operations of Fabius occasioned the fatal battle of Cannæ. Tarentum was obliged to surrender to his arms after the battle of Cannæ, and on that that occaſion the Carthaginian enemy obſerved that Fabius was the Annibal of Rome. When he had made an agreement with Annibal for the ranſom of the captives, which was totally diſapproved by the Roman Senate, he ſold all his eſtates to pay the money, rather than forfeit his word to the enemy. The bold propoſals of young Scipio to go and carry the war from Italy to Africa, was rejected by Fabius as chimerical and dangerous. He did not, however, live to ſee the ſucceſs of the Roman arms under Scipio, and the conqueſt of Carthage, by meaſures which he treated with contempt and heard with indignation. He died in the 100th year of his age, after he had been five times conſul, and twice honored with a triumph. The Romans were ſo ſenſible of his great merit and ſervices that the expences of his funeral were defrayed from the public treaſury. Plut. in vitâ.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Liv.—Polyb.——His ſon bore the ſame name, and ſhowed himſelf worthy of his noble father's virtues. During his conſulſhip he received a viſit from his father on horſeback in the camp. The ſon ordered the father to diſmount, and the old man chearfully obeyed, embracing his ſon, and ſaying, I wiſhed to know whether you knew what it is to be conſul. He died before his father, and the Cunctator with the moderation of a philoſopher delivered a funeral oration over the dead body of his ſon. Plut. in Fabio.——Pictor, the firſt Roman who wrote an hiſtorical account of his country. He floriſhed B. C. 225. The work which is now extant, and which is attributed to him, is a ſpurious compoſition.——A loquacious perſon mentioned by Horat. 1, Sat. 1, v. 14.——A Roman conſul, ſirnamed Ambuſtus, becauſe he was ſtruck with lightening.——A lieutenant of Cæſar in Gaul.——Fabricianus, a Roman aſſaſſinated by his wife Fabia, that ſhe might more freely enjoy the company of a favorite youth. His ſon was ſaved from his mother's cruelties, and when he came of age he avenged his father's death by murdering his mother and her adulterer. The ſenate took cognizance of the action, and patronized the parricide. Plut. in Parall.——A chief prieſt at Rome when Brennus took the city. Plut.——A Roman ſent to conſult the oracle of Delphi, while Annibal was in Italy.——Another choſen dictator merely to create new ſenators.——A lieutenant of Lucullus defeated by Mithridates.——A ſon of Paulus Æmilius, adopted into the family of the Fabii.——A Roman ſirnamed Allobrogicus from his victory over the Allobroges, &c. Flor. 2, c. 17.——Another choſen general againſt the Carthaginians in Italy. He loſt all his forces in a battle, and fell wounded by the ſide of Annibal. Plut. in Parall.——A conſul with J. Cæſar, who conquered Pompey's adherents in Spain.——A high prieſt who wrote ſome annals and made war againſt Viriathus in Spain. Liv. 30, c. 26.—Flor. 3, c. 2.——Dorſo. Vid. Dorſo.

FĀBRĀTĔRIA, a colony and town of the Volſci in Latium. Ital. 8, c. 398.—Cic. Fam. 9, ep. 24.

FABRĬCIUS, a Latin writer in the reign of Nero, who employed his pen in ſatyrizing and defaming the ſenators. His works were burnt by order of Nero.——Caius Luſcinus, a celebrated Roman who, in his firſt conſulſhip, obtained ſeveral victories over the Samnites and Lucanians, and was honored with a triumph. The riches which were acquired in thoſe battles were immenſe, the ſoldiers were liberally rewarded by the conſul, and the treaſury was enriched with 400 talents. Two years after Fabricius went as ambaſſador to Pyrrhus, and refuſed with contempt the preſents, and heard with indignation the offers, which might have corrupted the fidelity of a leſs virtuous citizen. Pyrrhus had occaſion to admire the magnanimity of Fabricius, but his aſtoniſhment was more powerfully awakened when he ſaw him make a diſcovery of the perfidious offers of his phyſician, who pledged himſelf to the Roman general for a ſum of money to poiſon his royal maſter. To this greatneſs of ſoul was added the moſt conſummate knowledge of military affairs, and the greateſt ſimplicity of manners. Fabricius never uſed rich plate at his table. A ſmall ſalt-cellar, whoſe feet were of horn, was the only ſilver veſſel which appeared in his houſe. This contempt of luxury and uſeleſs ornaments Fabricius wiſhed to inſpire among the people, and during his cenſorſhip he baniſhed from the ſenate Cornelius Rufinus, who had been twice conſul and dictator, becauſe he kept in his houſe more than ten pound weight of ſilver plate. Such were the manners of the conqueror of Pyrrhus, who obſerved that he wiſhed rather to command thoſe that had money, than poſſeſs it himſelf. He lived and died in the greateſt poverty. His body was buried at the public charge, and the Roman people were obliged to give a dowry to his two daughters, when they had arrived to marriageable years. Val Max. 2, c. 9. l. 4, c. 4.—Flor. 1, c. 18.—Cic. 3, de offic.—Plut. in Pyrrh.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 844.——A bridge at Rome, built by the conſul Fabricius, over the Tiber. Horat. 2. Ser. 3, v. 36.

FALERNUS, a fertile mountain and plain of Campania, famous for its wine, which the Roman poets have greatly celebrated. Liv. 22, c. 14.—Martial. 12, ep. 57.—Virg. G. 2, v. 96.—Horat. 1, od. 20, v. 10. 2. Sat. 4, v. 15.—Strab. 5.—Flor. 1, c. 15.

FĂLISCI, a people of Etruria, originally a Macedonian colony. When they were beſieged by Camillus, a ſchool-maſter went out of the gates of the city with his pupils and betrayed them into the hands of the Roman enemy, that by ſuch a poſſeſſion he might eaſily oblige the place to ſurrender. Camillus heard the propoſal with indignation, and ordered the man to be ſtripped naked and whipped back to the town by thoſe whom his perfidy wiſhed to betray. This inſtance of generoſity operated upon the people ſo powerfully that they ſurrendered to the Romans. Plut. in Camill.

FALISCUS GRATIUS. Vid. Gratius.

FAMA, (fame), was worſhipped by the antients as a powerful goddeſs, and generally repreſented blowing a trumpet, &c. Stat. 3. Theb. 427.

FAULA, a miſtreſs of Hercules.

FAUNA, a deity among the Romans, daughter of Picus, and originally called Marica. Her marriage with Faunus procured her the name of Fauna, and her knowledge of futurity that of Fatua and Fatidica. It is ſaid that ſhe never ſaw a man after her marriage with Faunus, and that her uncommon chaſtity occaſioned her being ranked among the gods after death. She is the ſame, according to ſome, as Bona Mater. Some mythologiſts accuſe her of drunkenneſs, and ſay that ſhe expired under the blows of her huſband, for an immoderate uſe of wine. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 47, &c.—Varro.—Juſtin. 43, c. 1.

FAUNALIA, feſtivals at Rome, in honor of Faunus.

FAUNI, certain deities of the country repreſented as having the legs, feet, and ears of goats, and the reſt of the body human. They were called ſatyrs by the Greeks. The peaſants offered them a lamb or a kid, with great ſolemnity. Virg. G. 1, v. 10.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 392.

FAUNUS, a ſon of Picus, who is ſaid to have reigned in Italy about 1300 years B.C. His bravery as well as wiſdom, have given riſe to the tradition that he was ſon of Mars. His great popularity, and his fondneſs for agriculture made his ſubjects revere him as one of their country deities after death. He was repreſented with all the equipage of the ſatyrs, and was conſulted to give oracles. Dionyſ. 1, c. 7.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 47. l. 8, v. 314. l. 10, v. 55.—Horat. 1, od. 17.

When the Romans thought themſelves injured, one of the ſacerdotal body was impowered to demand redreſs, and after the allowance of 33 days to conſider the matter, war was declared if ſubmiſſions were not made, and the Fecialis hurled a bloody ſpear into the territories of the enemy in proof of intended hoſtilities. Liv. 1, c. 3. l. 4, c. 30.

FELGINAS, a Roman knight, killed by Pompey at Dyrrachium. Cæſ. 3, Bell. Civ.

FELIX, M. ANTONIUS, a freed man of Claudius Cæſar, made governor of Judæa, Samaria, and Paleſtine. He is called by Suetonius the huſband of 3 queens, as he married the 2 Druſillæ, one granddaughter of Antony and Cleopatra, and the other a Jewiſh princeſs, ſiſter of Agrippa. The name of his third wife is unknown. Suet. in Cl. 18.—Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 14.

FELTRIA, a town of Italy at the north of Venice.

FENESTELLA, a Roman hiſtorian in the age of Auguſtus. He died at Cumæ.—— One of the gates of Rome. Ovid. Faſt. 6, v. 578.

FENNI or FINNI, the inhabitants of Finningia or Eningia, conſidered as Finland. Tacit. G. 46.—Plin. 4, c. 13.

FERĀLIA, a feſtival in honor of the dead, obſerved at Rome the 17th or 21ſt of February. It continued for 11 days, during which time preſents were carried to the groves of the deceaſed, marriages were forbidden, and the temples of the gods were ſhut. It was univerſally believed that the manes of their departed friends came and hovered over their graves, and feaſted upon the proviſions that the hand of piety and affection had procured for them. Their puniſhments in the infernal regions were alſo ſuſpended, and during that time they enjoyed reſt and liberty.

FERENTĪNUM, a town of the Hernici, at the eaſt of Rome. The inhabitants were called Ferentinates, or Ferentini. Sil. 8, v. 394.—Liv. 1, c. 50. l. 9, c. 43 & 44.

FERENTUM, or FORENTUM, a town of Apulia, now Forenza. Horat. 3, od. 4, v. 15.—Liv. 9, c. 16 & 20.

FĔRĒTRIUS, a ſirname of Jupiter, a ferendo, becauſe he had aſſiſted the Romans, or a feriendo, becauſe he had conquered their enemies under Romulus. He had a temple at Rome, built by Romulus, where the ſpoils called opima were always carried. Only two generals obtained theſe celebrated ſpoils after the age of Romulus. Liv. 1, c. 10.—Plut in Rom.

FERIÆ LATĪNÆ, feſtivals at Rome inſtituted by Tarquin the Proud. The principal magiſtrates of 47 towns in Latium uſually aſſembled on a mount near Rome, where they altogether with the Roman magiſtrates offered a bull to Jupiter Latialis, of which they carried home ſome part after the immolation, after they had ſworn mutual friendſhip and alliance. It continued but one day originally, but in proceſs of time four days were dedicated to its celebration. Dionyſ. Hal. 4.—Cic. ep. 6.—Liv. 21, &c. The feriæ among the Romans were certain days ſet apart to celebrate feſtivals, and during that time it was unlawful for any perſon to work. They were either public or private. The public were of four different kinds. The feriæ ſtativæ, were certain immoveable days always marked in the calendar, and obſerved by the whole city with much feſtivity and public rejoicing. The feriæ conceptivæ, tivæ, were moveable feasts, and the day appointed for the celebration was always previously fixed by the magistrates or priests. Among these were the feriæ Latinæ, which were first established by Tarquin, and observed by the consuls regularly, before they set out for the provinces; the Compitalia, &c. The feriæ imperativæ, were appointed only by the command of the consul, dictator, or prætor, as a public rejoicing for some important victory gained over the enemy of Rome. The feriæ Nundinæ, were regular days, in which the people of the country and neighbouring towns assembled together and exposed their respective commodities to sale. They were called Nundinæ because kept every ninth day. The feriæ privatæ, were observed only in families in commemoration of birth days, marriages, funerals, and the like. The days on which the feriæ were observed were called by the Romans festi dies, because dedicated to mirth, relaxation, and festivity.

FERŌNIA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the woods and groves. The name is derived a ferendo, because she gave assistance to her votaries, or perhaps from the town Feronia, near mount Soracte, where she had a temple. It was usual to make a yearly sacrifice to her, and to wash the face and hands in the waters of the sacred fountain, which flowed near her temple. It is said that those who were filled with the spirit of this goddess could walk barefooted over burning coals without receiving any injury from the flames. The goddess had a temple and grove about 3 miles from Anxur, and also another in the district of Capena. Liv. 33, c. 26.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 697 & 800.—Varro de L. L. 4, c. 10.—Ital. 13.—Strab. 5.—Horat. 1. Sat. 5, v. 24.

FESCENNIA, (iorum or ium) a town of Etruria, now Galese, where the Fescennine verses were first invented. These verses, the name of which conveys an idea of vulgar obscenity, were a sort of rustic dialogue spoken extempore, in which the actors exposed before their audience the failings and vices of their adversaries, and by a satyrical humour and merriment endeavoured to raise the laughter of the company. They were often repeated at nuptials, and many lascivious expressions were used for the general diversion, as also at harvest-home, when gestures were made adapted to the sense of the unpolished verses that were used. They were proscribed by Augustus as of immoral tendency. Plin. 3, c. 5.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 695.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 145.

FESULÆ, a town of Etruria, where Sylla settled a colony. Cic. Cat. 3, c. 6.

FESTUS, a friend of Domitian who killed himself in an illness. Martial. 1. ep. 79.——Porcius, a proconsul who succeeded Felix as governor of Judæa, under Claudius.

FICANA, a town of Latium, at the south of Rome, near the Tiber. Liv. 1, c. 33.

FICARIA, a small island on the east of Sardinia, now Serpentera. Plin. 3, c. 7.

FICULEA or FICULNEA, a town of Latium beyond mount Sacer at the north of Rome. Cicero had a villa there, and the road that led to the town was called Ficulnensis, afterwards Nomentana Via. Cic. 12. Att. 34.—Liv. 1, c. 38. 3, c. 52.

FIDĒNA, an inland town of Latium, whose inhabitants are called Fidenates. The place was conquered by the Romans B. C. 435. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 773.—Juv. 1, v. 44.—Liv. 1, c. 14, 15 & 27. l. 2, c. 19. l. 4, c. 17 & 21.

FIDENTIA, a town of Gaul on the south of the Po, between Placentia and Parma. Vell. 2, c. 28.—Plin. 3, c. 15.—Cic. In. 2, c. 54.

FIDES, the goddess of faith and honesty, worshipped by the Romans. Numa was the first who paid her divine honors.

FĬDĬCŬLÆ, a place of Italy. Val. Max. 7, c. 6.

FIDIUS DIUS, a divinity by whom the Romans generally swore. He was also called Sancus or Sanctus and Semipater, and he was solemnly addressed in prayers the 5th of June, which was yearly consecrated to his service. Ovid. Fast. 6.—Varro de L. L. 4, c. 10.—Dionys. Hal. 2. & 9.

FIMBRIA, a Roman officer who besieged Mithridates in Pritane, and failed in his attempts to take him prisoner. He was deserted by his troops for his cruelty, upon which he killed himself. Plut. in Lucull.

FIRMUM now Fermo, a town of Picenum on the Adriatic, the port of which was called Castellum Firmanum. Cic. 8, Att. 12.—Plin. 7, c. 8.—Velleius. 1, c. 14.

M. FIRMIUS, a powerful native of Seleucia who proclaimed himself emperor, and was at last conquered by Aurelian.

FISCELLUS, a part of the Apennine mountains in Umbria, where the Nar rises. Ital. 8, v. 518.—Plin. 3, c. 12.

FLACILLA ANTONIA, a Roman matron in Nero's age, &c. Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 7.

FLACCUS, a consul who marched against Sylla, and was assassinated by Fimbria. Plut.——A poet. Vid. Valerius.——A governor of Egypt who died A. D. 39.——Verrius a grammarian, tutor to the two grandsons of Augustus, and supposed author thor of the Capitoline marbles.——A name of Horace. Vid. Horatius.

Ælia Flacilla, the mother of Arcadius and Honorius, was daughter of Antonius, a prefect of Gaul.

Flāmĭnia Lex agraria, by C. Flaminius, the tribune, A. U. C. 525. It required that the lands of Picenum, from which the Gauls Senones had been expelled, should be divided among the Roman people.

Flaminia via, a celebrated road which led from Rome to Ariminum and Aquileia. It received its name from Flaminius, who built it, and was killed at the battle of Thrasymenus against Annibal.——A gate of Rome opening to the same road, now del popolo.

C. Flāmĭnius, a Roman consul of a turbulent disposition, who was drawn into a battle near the lake of Thrasymenus, by the artifice of Annibal. He was killed in the engagement, with an immense number of Romans, B. C. 217. The conqueror wished to give a burial to his body, but it was not found in the heaps of slain. While tribune of the people he proposed an agrarian law against the advice of his friends, of the senate, and of his own father. Cic. de inv. 2. c. 17.—Liv. 22, c. 3, &c.—Polyb.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Val. Max. 1. c. 6.

T. Q. Flāmĭnius or Flaminīnus, a celebrated Roman raised to the consulship, A. U. C. 554. He was trained in the art of war against Annibal, and he shewed himself capable in every respect to discharge with honor the great office with which he was entrusted. He was sent at the head of the Roman troops against Philip, king of Macedonia, and in his expedition he met with uncommon success. The Greeks gradually declared themselves his firmest supporters, and he totally defeated Philip on the confines of Epirus, and made all Locris, Phocis, and Thessaly, tributary to the Roman power. He granted peace to the conquered monarch, and proclaimed all Greece free and independant at the Isthmian games. This celebrated action procured the name of patrons of Greece to the Romans, and insensibly paved their way to universal dominion. Flaminius behaved among them with the greatest policy, and by his ready compliance with their national customs and prejudices, he gained uncommon popularity, and received the name of father and deliverer of Greece. He was afterwards sent ambassador to king Prusias, who had given refuge to Annibal, and there his prudence and artifice hastened out of the world a man who had long been the terror of the Romans. Flaminius was found dead in his bed, after a life spent in the greatest glory, in which he had imitated with success the virtues of his model Scipio. Plut. in vitâ.—Flor.——Lucius, the brother of the preceding, signalized himself in the wars of Greece. He was expelled from the senate for killing a Gaul, by Cato his brother's colleague in the censorship, an action which was highly resented by Titus. Plut. in Flam.——Calp. Flamma, a tribune, who at the head of 300 men saved the Roman army in Sicily, B. C. 258, by engaging the Carthaginians and cutting them to pieces.

Flanaticus sinus, a bay of the Flanates, in Liburnia, on the Adriatic, now the gulf of Carnero. Plin. 3, c. 19 & 21.

Flāvia lex agraria, by L. Flavius, A. U. C. 693, for the distribution of a certain quantity of lands among Pompey's soldiers, and the commons.

Flāviānum, a town of Etruria, on the Tiber, called also Flavinium. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 696.—Sil. 8, v. 492.

Flavinia, a town of Latium, which assisted Turnus against Æneas. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 696.

Flavius, a senator who conspired with Piso against Nero, &c. Tacit.——A tribune of the people deposed by J. Cæsar.——A Roman who informed Gracchus of the violent measures of the senate against him.——A brother of Vespasian, &c.——A tribune who wounded one of Annibal' elephants in an engagement.——A schoolmaster at Rome in the age of Horace. 1 Sat. 6, v. 72.——One of the names of the emperor Domitian. Juv. 4, v. 37.

Flevus, the right branch of the Rhine, which formed a large lake on its falling into the sea, called Flevo, now Zuider-Zee, It was afterwards called Helium, now Ulie, when its breadth became more contracted, and a fort erected there, obtained the name of Flevum Frisiorum. Tacit. An. 2, c. 6. l. 4, v. 72.—Plin. 4, c. 15.—Mela. 3, c. 2.

Flōra, the goddess of flowers and gardens among the Romans, the same as the Chloris of the Greeks. Some suppose that she was originally a common courtezan, who left to the Romans the immense riches which she had acquired by prostitution and lasciviousness, in remembrance of which a yearly festival was instituted in her honor. She was worshipped even among the Sabines, long before the foundation of Rome, and Tatius was the first who raised her a temple in the city of Rome. It is said that she married Zephyrus, and that she received from him the privileges of presiding over flowers, and of enjoying perpetual youth. [Vid. Floralia] She was represented as crowned with flowers, and holding in her hand the horn of plenty. Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 195, &c.—Varro. de R. R. 1.—Lactant.

Lactant. 1.——A celebrated courtezan paſſionately loved by Pompey the Great. She was ſo beautiful, that when the temple of Caſtor and Pollux at Rome was adorned with paintings, her picture was drawn and placed among the reſt.——Another courtezan, &c. Juv. 2, v. 49.

FLORĀLIA, games in honor of Flora at Rome. They were inſtituted about the age of Romulus, but they were not celebrated with regularity and proper attention till the year U. C. 580. They were obſerved yearly, and exhibited a ſcene of the moſt unbounded licentiouſneſs. It is reported that Cato wiſhed once to be preſent at the celebration, and that when he ſaw that the deference for his preſence interrupted the feaſt, he retired, not chuſing to be the ſpectator of the proſtitution of naked women in a public theatre. This behaviour ſo captivated the degenerate Romans, that the venerable ſenator was treated with the moſt uncommon applauſe as he retired. Val. Max. 2, c. 10.—Varro. de L. L. 1.—Paterc. c. 1.—Plin. 8.

FLŌRENTIA, a town of Italy on the Arnus, now Florence, the capital of Tuſcany. Tacit. An. 1, c. 79.—Flor. 3, c. 21. Plin. 3, c. 5.

FLORIĀNUS, a man who wore the imperial purple at Rome only for two months A. D. 276.

FLŌRUS, L. Annæus Julius, a Latin hiſtorian of the ſame family which produced Seneca and Lucan, A. D. 116. He wrote an abridgement of Roman annals in four books, compoſed in a florid and poetical ſtile, and rather a panegyric on many of the great actions of the Romans than a faithful and correct recital of their hiſtory. He alſo wrote poetry, and entered the liſts againſt the emperor Adrian, who ſatyrically reproached him with frequenting taverns and places of diſſipation. The beſt editions of Florus are Duker's, 2 vols. 8vo. L. Bat. 1722 & 1744; and that of J. Frid. Fiſcher, 8vo. Lipſ. 1760.——Julius, a friend of Horace, who accompanied Claudius Nero in his military expeditions. The poet has addreſſed two epiſtles to him.

FLUŌNIA, a ſirname of Juno.

FOLIA, a woman of Ariminum, famous for her knowledge of poiſonous herbs, and for her petulance. Horat. ep. 5, v. 42.

FONS SOLIS, a fountain in the province of Cyrene, cool at midday and warm at the riſing and ſetting of the ſun. Herodot. 4, c. 181.

FONTĀNUS, a poet mentioned by Ovid. Pont. 4, el. 16.

FONTĒIA, a veſtal virgin. Cic.

FONTĒIUS CAPITO, an intimate friend of Horace. 1 Sat. 5, v. 32.——A Roman who raiſed commotions in Germany after the death of Nero. Tacit. Hiſt. 1, c. 7.——A man who conducted Cleopatra into Syria by order of Antony. Plut. in Ant.

FORMIÆ, a maritime town of Campania at the ſouth-eaſt of Caieta. It was antiently the abode of the Læſtrygones, and it became known for its excellent wines, and was called Mamurrarum urbs, from a family of conſequence and opulence who lived there. Liv. 8. c. 14. l. 38, c. 36.—Horat. 1. od. 20, v. 11. l. 3. od. 17. Sat. 1, 5, v. 37.—Plin. 36. c. 6.

FORMIĀNUM, a villa of Cicero near Formiæ, near which the orator was aſſaſſinated. Cic. Fam. 11, ep. 27. l. 16. ep. 10.—Tacit. Ann. 16, c. 10.

FORMIO, now Riſano, a river of Iſtria, the antient boundary of Italy eaſtward, afterwards extended to the Arſia. Plin. 3, c. 18 & 19.

FORNAX, a goddeſs at Rome, who preſided over the baking of bread. Her feſtivals, called Fornacalia, were firſt inſtituted by Numa. Ovid. Faſt. 2, v. 525.

FORO APPII, a people of Italy, whoſe capital was called Forum Appii. Plin. 3, c. 5.

FORTŪNA, a powerful deity among the antients, daughter of Oceanus according to Homer, or one of the Parcæ according to Pindar. She was the goddeſs of fortune, and from her hand were derived riches and poverty, pleaſures and misfortunes, bleſſings and pains. She was worſhipped in different parts of Greece, and in Achaia her ſtatue held the horn of plenty in one hand, and had a winged Cupid at its feet. In Bœotia ſhe had a ſtatue which repreſented her as holding Plutus the god of riches in her arms, to intimate that fortune is the ſource whence wealth and honors flow. Bupalus was the firſt who made a ſtatue of Fortune for the people of Smyrna, and he repreſented her with the polar ſtar upon her head, and the horn of plenty in her hand. The Romans paid particular attention to the goddeſs of Fortune, and had no leſs than eight different temples erected to her honor in their city. Tullus Hoſtilius was the firſt who built her a temple, and from that circumſtance it is eaſily known when her worſhip was firſt introduced among the Romans. Her moſt famous temple in Italy was at Antium, in Latium, where preſents and offerings were regularly ſent from every part of the country. Fortune has been called Pherepolis, the protectreſs of cities, Acrea from her temple at Corinth on an eminence, ἀκρος. She was called Preneſtine at Præneſte in Italy, where ſhe had alſo a temple. Beſides ſhe was worſhipped among the Romans under different names, ſuch as Female fortune, Virile fortune, Equeſtrian, Peaceful, Virgin, &c. On the firſt of April, which was conſecrated to Venus among the Romans, the Italian widows and marriageable virgins aſſembled in the temple of Virile fortune, and after burning incenſe and offering their garments, they intreated the goddeſs to hide from the eyes of their huſbands whatever defects there might be on their bodies. The goddeſs of Fortune is repreſented on antient monuments with a horn of plenty, and ſometimes two, in her hands. She is blind-folded, and generally holds a wheel in her hand as an emblem of her inconſtancy. Sometimes ſhe appears with wings, and treads upon the prow of a ſhip, and holds a rudder in her hands. Dionyſ. Hal. 4.—Ovid. Faſt. 6, v. 569.—Plut. de fort. Rom. & in Cor.—Cic. de Div. 2.—Liv. 10.—Auguſtin. de Civ. D. 4.—Flor. 1.—Val. Max. 1, c. 5.—Lucan. 2, &c.

FORTŪNĀTÆ INSULÆ, iſlands at the weſt of Mauritania in the Atlantic ſea. They are ſuppoſed to be the Canary iſles of the moderns, thought to be only two in number, at a little diſtance one from the other, and 10,000 ſtadia from the ſhores of Libya. They were repreſented as the ſeats of the bleſſed, where the ſouls of the virtuous were placed after death. The air was wholeſome and temperate, the earth produced an immenſe number of various fruits without the labors of men. When they had been deſcribed to Sertorius in the moſt enchanting colors, that celebrated general expreſſed a wiſh to retire thither, and to remove himſelf from the noiſe of the world, and the dangers of war. Strab. 1.—Plut. in Sertor.—Horat. 4, od. 8, v. 27. Epod. 10.—Plin. 6, c. 31 & 32.

FULLINUM & FULGINUM, a ſmall town of Umbria.

FULVIA LEX was propoſed but rejected A. U. C. 628, by Flaccus Fulvius. It tended to make all the people of Italy citizens of Rome.

FULVIA, a bold and ambitious woman who married the tribune Clodius, and afterwards Curio, and at laſt M. Antony. She took a part in all the intrigues of her huſband's triumvirate and ſhewed herſelf cruel as well as revengeful. When Cicero's head had been cut off by order of Antony, Fulvia ordered it to be brought to her, and with all the inſolence of barbarity, ſhe bored the orator's tongue with her golden bodkin. Antony divorced her to marry Cleopatra, upon which ſhe attempted to avenge her wrongs, by perſuading Auguſtus to take up arms againſt her huſband. When this ſcheme did not ſucceed, ſhe raiſed a faction againſt Auguſtus, in which ſhe engaged L. Antonius her brother-in-law, and when all her attempts proved fruitleſs, ſhe retired into the eaſt, where her huſband received her with great coldneſs and indifference. This unkindneſs totally broke her heart, and ſhe ſoon after died, about 40 years before the chriſtian era. Plut. in Cic. & Anton.——A woman who diſcovered to Cicero the deſigns of Catiline upon his life. Plut. in Cic.

FULVIUS, a Roman ſenator, intimate with Auguſtus. He diſcloſed the emperor's ſecrets to his wife who made it public to all the Roman matrons, for which he received ſo ſevere a reprimand from Auguſtus, that he and his wife hanged themſelves in deſpair.——A friend of C. Gracchus who was killed in a ſedition with his ſon. His body was thrown into the river, and his widow was forbidden to put on mourning for his death. Plut. in Gracch.——Flaccus Cenſor, a Roman who plundered a marble temple of Juno, to finiſh the building of one which he had erected to Fortune. He was always unhappy after this ſacrilege. Liv. 25, c. 2.——Ser. Nobilior, a Roman conſul who went to Africa after the defeat of Regulus. After he had acquired much glory againſt the Carthaginians, he was ſhipwrecked at his return with 200 Roman ſhips. His grandſon Marcus was ſent to Spain, where he greatly ſignalized himſelf. He was afterwards rewarded with the conſulſhip.

FURIUS, a military tribune with Camillus.

millus. He was ſent againſt the Tuſcans by his colleague.——A Roman ſlave who obtained his freedom, and applied himſelf with unremitted attention to cultivate a ſmall portion of land which he had purchaſed. The uncommon fruits which he reaped from his labors rendered his neighbours jealous of his proſperity. He was accuſed before a Roman tribunal of witchcraft, but honorably acquitted.——M. Bibaculus, a Latin poet of Cremona, who wrote annals in Arabic verſe, and was univerſally celebrated for the wit and humor of his expreſſions. It is ſaid that Virgil imitated his poetry and even borrowed ſome of his lines. Horace however has not failed to ridicule his verſes. Quintil. 8, c. 6, &c.—Horat. 2, Sat. 5, v. 40.

FURNIUS, a man accuſed of adultery with Claudia Pulchra, and condemned, &c. Tacit. Hiſt. 4, v. 52.——A friend of Horace, who was conſul and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his elegant hiſtorical writings. 1 Sat. 10, v. 36.

ARIST. FUSCUS, a friend of Horace as conſpicuous for the integrity and propriety of his manners, as for his learning and abilities. The poet addreſſed his 22 Od. Lib. 1 and 1 Ep. 10, to him.——Corn. a prætor ſent by Domitian againſt the Daci, where he periſhed. Juv. 4, v. 112.

FUSIA LEX de Comitiis, A. U. C. 527, forbad any buſineſs to be tranſacted at the public aſſemblies on certain days, though among the faſti.——Another, A. U. C. 690, which ordained that the votes in a public aſſembly ſhould be given ſeparately.——Caninia, another by Camillus & C. Caninius Galbus, A. U. C. 751, to check the manumiſſion of ſlaves.

FUSIUS, a Roman orator. Cic. 2. de Orat. c. 22.——A Roman, killed in Gaul, while he preſided there over one of the provinces. Cæſ. Bell. G. 7, c. 3.——A Roman actor, whom Horace ridicules. 2 Sat. 3, v. 60. He intoxicated himſelf; and when on the ſtage, he fell aſleep whilſt he perſonated Ilione, where he ought to have been rouſed and moved by the cries of a ghoſt; but in vain.

GĂBĪNA, the name of Juno, worſhipped at Gabii. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 682.

GĂBĪNIA LEX de Comitiis, by A. Gabinius, the tribune, A. U. C. 614. It required that in the public aſſemblies for electing magiſtrates, the votes ſhould be given by tablets, and not vivâ voce.——Another for convening daily the ſenate from the kalends of February to thoſe of March.——Another de Comitiis, which made it a capital puniſhment to convene any clandeſtine aſſembly, agreeable to the old law of the 12 tables.——Another de Militiâ, by A. Gabinius the tribune, A. U. C. 685. It granted Pompey the power of carrying on the war againſt the pirates, during three years, and of obliging all kings, governors, and ſtates, to ſupply him with all the neceſſaries he wanted, over all the Mediterranean ſea, and in the maritime provinces, as far as 400 ſtadia from the ſea.——Another, de Uſurâ, by Aul. Gabinius the tribune, A. U. C. 685. It ordained, that no action ſhould be granted for the recovery of any money borrowed upon ſmall intereſt, to be lent upon larger. This was an uſual practice at Rome, which obtained the name of verſuram facere.——Another, againſt fornication.

GABINIĀNUS, a rhetorician, in the reign of Veſpaſian.

GĂBĪNIUS, a Roman hiſtorian.——Aulius, a Roman conſul, who made war in Judæa, and re-eſtabliſhed tranquillity there. He ſuffered himſelf to be bribed, and replaced Ptolemy Auletes on the throne of Egypt. He was accuſed, at his return, of receiving bribes. Cicero, at the requeſt of Pompey, ably defended him. He was baniſhed, and died about 40 years before Chriſt, at Salona.——A lieutenant of Antony.——A conſul, who behaved with uncommon rudeneſs to Cicero.

GADES (ium), GADIS (is), & GADIRA, a ſmall iſland in the Atlantic, on the Spaniſh coaſt, 25 miles from the columns of Hercules. It was ſometimes called Tarteſſus and Erythia, according to Pliny, and is now known by the name of Cadiz. Geryon, whom Hercules killed, fixed his reſidence there. Hercules, ſirnamed Gaditanus, had there a celebrated temple, in which all his labors were engraved with excellent workmanſhip. The inhabitants were called Gaditani, and their women were known for their agility of body, and their incontinency. Horat. 2, od. 2, v. 11. — Stat. 3, Sylv. 1, v. 183.—Liv. 21, c. 21. l. 24, c. 49. l. 26. c. 43.—Plin. 4, c. 23.—Strab. 3.—*Cic. pro. GÆTŪLICUS, Cn. Lentulus, an officer in the age of Tiberius, &c. Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 42.

GALĂBRII, a nation near Thrace.

GALACTOPHĂGI, a people of Aſiatic Scythia. Homer. Il. 3.

GALÆSUS. Vid. Galeſus.

GALANTHIS, a ſervant maid of Alcmena, whoſe ſagacity eaſed the labors of her miſtreſs. When Juno reſolved to retard the birth of Hercules, and haſten the labors of the wife of Sthenelus, ſhe ſolicited the aid of Lucina; who immediately repaired to the houſe of Alcmena, and in the form of an old woman, ſat near the door with her legs croſſed, and her fingers joined. In this poſture ſhe uttered ſome magical words, which ſerved to prolong the labors of Alcmena, and render her ſtate the more miſerable. Alcmena had already paſſed ſome days in the moſt excruciating torments, when Galanthis began to ſuſpect the jealouſy of Juno; and concluded that the old woman, who continued at the door always in the ſame unchanged poſture, was the inſtrument of the anger of the goddeſs. With ſuch ſuſpicions Galanthis ran out of the houſe, and with a countenance expreſſive of joy, ſhe informed the old woman that her miſtreſs had juſt brought forth. Lucina, at the words, roſe from her poſture, and that inſtant Alcmena was ſafely delivered. The uncommon laugh which Galanthis raiſed upon this, made Lucina ſuſpect that ſhe had been deceived. She ſeized Galanthis by the hair, and threw her on the ground; and while ſhe attempted to reſiſt ſhe was changed into a weazel, and condemned to bring forth her young, in the moſt agonizing pains, by the mouth, by which ſhe had uttered falſehood. This transformation alludes to a vulgar notion among the antients, who believed this of the weazel, becauſe ſhe carries her young in her mouth, and continually ſhifts from place to place. The Bœotians paid great veneration to the weazel, which, as they ſuppoſed, facilitated the labors of Alcmena. Ælian. H. Anim. 2.—Ovid. Met. 9, fab. 6.

GALATA, a town of Syria.——An iſland near Sicily.——A town of Sicily.——A mountain of Phocis.

GĂLĂTÆ, the inhabitants of Galatia. Vid. Galatia.

GĂLĂTÆA & GALATHÆA, a ſea nymph, daughter of Nereus and Doris. She was paſſionately loved by the Cyclops Polyphemus, whom ſhe treated with coldneſs and diſdain; while Acis, a ſhepherd of Sicily, enjoyed her unbounded affection. The happineſs of theſe two lovers was diſturbed by the jealouſy of the Cyclops, who cruſhed his rival to pieces with a piece of a broken rock, while he ſat in the boſom of Galatæa. Galatæa was inconſolable for the loſs of Acis, and as ſhe could not reſtore him to life, ſhe changed him into a fountain. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 789.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 103. ——The daughter of a Celtic king, from whom the Gauls were called Galatæ. Ammian. 15.——A country girl, &c. Virg. Ecl. 3.

GĂLĂTIA, or GALLOGRÆCIA, a country of Aſia Minor, between Phrygia, the Euxine, Cappadocia, and Bithynia. It received its name from the Gauls, who migrated there under Brennus, ſome time after the ſacking of Rome. Strab. 12.—Juſtin. 37, c. 4.—Liv. 38, c. 12, 40. — Lucan. 7, v. 540.—Cic. 6, Att. 5.—Plin. 5, c. 32.——The name of antient Gaul among the Greeks.

GALAXIA, a feſtival, in which they boiled a mixture of barley, pulſe, and milk, called Γαλαξια by the Greeks.

GALBA, a ſirname of the firſt of the Sulpitii, from the ſmallneſs of his ſtature. The word ſignifies a ſmall worm, or according to ſome, it implies, in the language of Gaul, fatneſs, for which the founder of the Sulpitian family was remarkable.——A king among the Gauls, who made war againſt J. Cæſar. Cæſ. bell. Gall. 2, c. 4.——A brother of the emperor Galba, who killed himſelf, &c.——A mean buffoon, in the age of Tiberius. Juv. 5, v. 4.——Servius, a lawyer at Rome, who defended the cauſe of adulterers with great warmth, as being one of the fraternity. Horace ridicules him 1. Sat. 2, v. 46.

v. 46.——Servius Sulpicius, a Roman who roſe gradually to the greateſt offices of the ſtate, and exerciſed his power in the provinces with equity and unremitted diligence. He dedicated the greateſt part of his time to ſolitary purſuits, chiefly to avoid the ſuſpicions of Nero. His diſapprobation of the emperor's oppreſſive command in the provinces, was the cauſe of new diſturbances. Nero ordered him to be put to death, but he eſcaped from the hands of the executioner, and was publicly ſaluted emperor. When he was ſeated on the throne, he ſuffered himſelf to be governed by favorites, who expoſed the goods of the citizens to ſale, to gratify their avarice. Exemptions were ſold at a high price, and the crime of murder was blotted out, and impunity purchaſed with a large ſum of money. Such irregularities in the emperor's miniſters, greatly diſpleaſed the people; and when Galba refuſed to pay the ſoldiers the money which he had promiſed them, when he was raiſed to the throne, they aſſaſſinated him in the 73d year of his age, and in the eighth month of his reign, and proclaimed Otho emperor in his room, January 16th, A. D. 69. The virtues which had ſhone ſo bright in Galba, when a private man, totally diſappeared when he aſcended the throne; and he who ſhewed himſelf the moſt impartial judge, forgot the duties of an emperor, and of a father of his people. Sueton. & Plut. in vitâ.—Tacit.——A learned man, grandfather to the emperor of the ſame name. Suet. in Galb. 4.——Sergius, a celebrated orator before the age of Cicero. He ſhowed his ſons to the Roman people, and implored their protection, by which means he ſaved himſelf from the puniſhment which either his guilt or the perſuaſive eloquence of his adverſaries, M. Cato and L. Scribonius, urged as due to him. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 53. ad Her. 4, c. 5.

GALĒNUS CLAUDIUS, a celebrated phyſician in the age of M. Antoninus and his ſucceſſors, born at Pergamus, the ſon of an architect. He applied himſelf with unremitted labor to the ſtudy of philoſophy, mathematics, and chiefly of phyſic. He viſited the moſt learned ſeminaries of Greece and Egypt; and at laſt came to Rome, where he ſoon rendered himſelf famous by his profeſſion. Many, aſtoniſhed at his cures, attributed them to magic, and ſaid that he had received all his knowledge from enchantments. He was very intimate with Marcus Aurelius, the emperor, after whoſe death he returned to Pergamus, where he died, in his 90th year, A. D. 193. He wrote no leſs than 300 volumes, the greateſt part of which were burnt in the temple of Peace at Rome, where they had been depoſited. Galenus confeſſed himſelf greatly indebted to the writings of Hippocrates, for his medical knowledge, and beſtowed great encomiums upon him. To the diligence, application, and experiments of thoſe two celebrated phyſicians, the moderns are indebted for many uſeful diſcoveries; yet, often their opinions are ill-grounded, their concluſions haſty, and their reaſoning falſe. What remains of the works of Galen, has been publiſhed, without a latin tranſlation, in 5 vols. fol. Baſil. 1538. Galen was likewiſe edited, together with Hippocrates, by Charterius, 13 vols. fol. Paris 1679, but very incorrect.

GALEOLÆ, certain prophets in Sicily. Cic.

GALERIA, one of the Roman tribes.—— The wife of Vitellius. Cæſar.—Tacit. Hiſt. 2, c. 60.——Fauſtina, the wife of the emperor Antoninus Pius.

GĂLĒRIUS, a native of Dacia, made emperor of Rome, by Diocletian. Vid. Maximianus.

GĂLĒSUS, now Galeſo, a river of Calabria, flowing into the bay of Tarentum. The poets have celebrated it for the ſhady groves in its neighbourhood, and the fine ſheep which feed on its fertile banks, and whoſe fleeces were ſaid to be rendered ſoft when they bathed in the ſtream. Martial. 2, ep. 43. l. 4. ep. 28.—Virg. G. 4, v. 126.—Horat. 2, od. 6, v. 10.——A rich perſon of Latium, killed as he attempted to make a reconciliation between the Trojans and Rutulians, when Aſcanius had killed the favorite ſtag of Tyrrheus: which was the prelude of all the enmities between the hoſtile nations. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 535.

GALILÆA, a celebrated country of Syria.

GALINTHIADIA, a feſtival at Thebes, in honor of Galinthias, a daughter of Prœtus. It was celebrated before the feſtival of Hercules, by whoſe orders it was firſt inſtituted.

GALLI, a nation of Europe, naturally fierce, and inclined to war. They were very ſuperſtitious; and in their ſacrifices they often immolated human victims. In ſome places, they had large ſtatues made with twigs, which they filled with men, and reduced to aſhes. They believed themſelves deſcended from Pluto; and from that circumſtance they always reckoned their time, not by the days, as other nations, but by the nights. Their obſequies were ſplendid; and not only the moſt precious things, but even ſlaves and oxen, were burnt on the funeral pile. Children, among them, never appeared in the preſence of their fathers, before they were able to bear arms in the defence of their country. Cæſ. bell. G.—Strab.

—Tacit. Vid. Gallia.——The prieſts of Cybele, who received that name from the river Gallus, in Phrygia, where they celebrated the feſtivals. They mutilated themſelves, before they were admitted to the prieſthood, in imitation of Atys, the favorite of Cybele. (Vid. Atys.) The chief among them was called Archigallus. Vid. Corybantes, Dactyli, &c.—Diod. 4.—Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 36.—Lucan. 1, v. 466.—Lucian. de Dea Syria.

GALLIA, a large country of Europe, called Galatia by the Greeks. The inhabitants were called Galli, Celtiberi, and Celtoſcythæ, by themſelves Celtæ, by the Greeks Galatæ. Antient Gaul was divided into four different parts by the Romans, called Gallia Belgica, Narbonenſis, Aquitania, and Celtica. Gallia Belgica, was the largeſt province bounded by Germany, Gallia Narbonenſis, and the German ocean; and contained the modern country of Alſace, Lorraine, Picardy, with part of the Low Countries, and of Champagne, and of the iſle of France. Gallia Narbonenſis, which contained the provinces now called Languedoc, Provence, Dauphiné, Savoy, was bounded by the Alps and Pyrenean mountains, by Aquitania, Belgium, and the Mediterranean. Aquitania Gallia, now called the provinces of Poitou, Santonge, Guienne, Berry, Limoſin, Gaſcogny, Auvergne, &c. was ſituate between the Garumna, the Pyrenean mountains, and the ocean. Gallia Celtica, or Lugdunenſis, was bounded by Belgium, Gallia Narbonenſis, the Alps, and the ocean. It contained the country at preſent known by the name of Lyonnois, Touraine, Franche Comté, Senenois, Switzerland, and part of Normandy. Beſides theſe grand diviſions, there is often mention made of Gallia Ciſalpina, or Citerior; Tranſalpina or Ulterior, which refers to that part of Italy which was conquered by ſome of the Gauls who croſſed the Alps. By Gallia Ciſalpina, the Romans underſtood that part of Gaul which lies in Italy; and by Tranſalpina, that which lies beyond the Alps, in regard only to the inhabitants of Rome. Gallia Ciſpadana, and Tranſpadana, is applied to a part of Italy, conquered by ſome of the Gauls, and then it means the country on this ſide of the Po, or beyond the Po, with reſpect to Rome. By Gallia Togata, the Romans underſtood Ciſalpine Gaul, where the Roman gowns, togæ, were uſually worn as the inhabitants had been admitted to the rank of citizenſhip at Rome. Gallia Narbonenſis, was called Braccata, on account of the peculiar covering of the inhabitants for their thighs. The epithet of Comata, is applied to Gallia Celtica, becauſe the people ſuffered their hair to grow to an uncommon length. The inhabitants were great warriors; and their valor overcame the Roman armies, took the cities of Rome, and invaded Greece, in different ages. They ſpread themſelves over the greateſt part of the world. They were very ſuperſtitious in their religious ceremonies, and revered the ſacerdotal order, as if they had been gods. (Vid. Druidæ.) They long maintained a bloody war againſt the Romans; and Cæſar reſided 10 years in their country before he could totally ſubdue them. Cæſ. bell. Gall. —Pauſ. 7, c. 6.—Strab. 5, &c.

GALLICĀNUS MONS, a mountain of Campania.

GALLĬCUS AGER, was applied to the country between Picenum and Ariminum, whence the Galli Senones were baniſhed, and which was divided among the Roman citizens. Liv. 23, c. 14. l. 39, c. 44.—Cic. Cat. 2.—Cæſ. Civ. 1, c. 29.——Sinus a part of the Mediterranean on the coaſt of Gaul, now called the gulf of Lyons.

GALLIĒNUS, Publ. Lucinius, a ſon of the emperor Valerian. He reigned conjointly with his father for ſeven years, and aſcended the throne as ſole emperor, A. D. 260. In his youth, he ſhowed his activity and military character, in an expedition againſt the Germans and Sarmatæ; but when he came to the purple, he delivered himſelf up to pleaſure and indolence. His time was ſpent in the greateſt debauchery; and he indulged himſelf in the groſſeſt and moſt laſcivious manner, and his palace diſplayed a ſcene, at once, of effeminacy and ſhame, voluptuouſneſs and immorality. He often appeared with his hair powdered with golden duſt; and enjoyed tranquillity at home, while his provinces abroad were torn by civil quarrels and ſeditions. He heard of the loſs of a rich province, and of the execution of a malefactor, with the ſame indifference; and when he was apprized that Egypt had revolted, he only obſerved, that he could live without the produce of Egypt. He was of a diſpoſition naturally inclined to raillery and the ridicule of others. When his wife had been deceived by a jeweller, Gallienus ordered the malefactor to be placed in the circus, in expectation of being expoſed to the ferocity of a lion. While the wretch trembled at the expectation of inſtant death, the executioner, by order of the emperor, let looſe a capon upon him. An uncommon laugh was raiſed upon this, and the emperor obſerved, that he who had deceived others, ſhould expect to be deceived himſelf. In the midſt of theſe ridiculous diverſions, Gallienus was alarmed by the revolt of two of his officers, who had aſſumed the imperial purple. This intelligence rouſed him from his lethargy; he marched againſt his antagoniſts, gonists, and put all the rebels to the sword, without showing the least favor either to rank, sex, or age. These cruelties irritated the people and the army; emperors were elected, and no less than thirty tyrants aspired to the imperial purple. Gallienus resolved boldly to oppose his adversaries; but in the midst of his preparations, he was assassinated at Milan by some of his officers, in the 50th year of his age, A. D. 268.

GALLINARIA SYLVA, a wood near Cumæ in Italy, famous as being the retreat of robbers. Juv. 3, v. 307.

GALLIPŎLIS, a fortified town of the Salentines, on the Ionian sea.

GALLOGRÆCIA, a country of Asia Minor, near Bithynia and Cappadocia. It was inhabited by a colony of Gauls, who assumed the name of Gallogræci, because a number of Greeks had accompanied them in their emigration. Strab. 2.

C. GALLŌNIUS, a Roman knight appointed over Gades, &c.

P. GALLŌNIUS, a luxurious Roman, who, as was observed, never dined well, because he was never hungry. Cic. de Fin. 2, c. 8 & 28.

GALLUS. Vid. Alectryon.——A general of Otho, &c. Plut.——A lieutenant of Sylla.——An officer of M. Antony, &c. ——Caius, a friend of the great Africanus, famous for his knowledge of astronomy, and his exact calculations of eclipses. Cic. de Senect.——Ælius, the 3d governor of Egypt in the age of Augustus.——Cornelius, a Roman knight, who rendered himself famous by his poetical, as well as military talents. He was passionately fond of the slave Lycoris or Cytheris, and celebrated her beauty in his poetry. She proved ungrateful, and forsook him to follow M. Antony, which gave occasion to Virgil to write his tenth eclogue. Gallus, as well as the other poets of his age, was in the favor of Augustus, by whom he was appointed over Egypt. He became forgetful of the favors he received; he pillaged the province, and even conspired against his benefactor, according to some accounts, for which he was banished by the emperor. This disgrace operated so powerfully upon him, that he killed himself in despair, A. D. 26. Some few fragments remain of his poetry, and it seems that he particularly excelled in elegiac composition. It is said, that Virgil wrote an eulogium on his poetical friend, and inserted it at the end of his Georgics; but that he totally suppressed it, for fear of offending his imperial patron, of whose favors Gallus had shown himself so undeserving, and instead of that he substituted the beautiful episode about Aristæus and Eurydice. This eulogium, according to some, was suppressed at the particular desire of Augustus. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Virg. Ecl. 6, & 10.—Ovid. Amat. 3, el. 15, v. 29. ——Vibius Gallus, a celebrated orator of Gaul, in the age of Augustus, of whose orations Seneca has preserved some fragments.——A Roman, who assassinated Decius, the emperor, and raised himself to the throne. He showed himself indolent and cruel, and beheld with the greatest indifference the revolt of his provinces, and the invasion of his empire by the barbarians. He was at last assassinated by his soldiers, A. D. 253.——Flavius Claudius Constantinus, a brother of the emperor Julian, raised to the imperial throne under the title of Cæsar, by Constantius his relation. He conspired against his benefactor, and was publicly condemned to be beheaded, A. D. 354.——A small river of Phrygia, whose waters were said to be very efficacious, if drank in moderation, in curing madness. Plin. 32, c. 2.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 361.

GAMAXUS, an Indian prince, brought in chains before Alexander for revolting.

GAMELIA, a firname of Juno, as Gamelius was of Jupiter, on account of their presiding over marriages.——A festival privately observed at three different times. The first was the celebration of a marriage, the second was in commemoration of a birthday, and the third was an anniversary of the death of a person.

GANDARĪTÆ, an Indian nation.

GANGAMA, a place near the Palus Mæotis.

GANGĂRĬDÆ, a people near the mouths of the Ganges. They were so powerful that Alexander did not dare to attack them. Some attributed this to the weariness and indolence of his troops. They are placed by Valer. Flaccus among the deserts of Scythia. Justin. 12, c. 8.—Curt. 9, c. 2.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 27.—Flacc. 6, v. 67.

GANGES, a large river of India, falling into the Indian ocean, said by Lucan to be the boundary of Alexander's victories in the east. It inundates the adjacent country in the summer. Like other rivers, it was held in the greatest veneration by the inhabitants, and this superstition is said to exist still in some particular instances. The Ganges is now discovered to rise in the mountains of Thibet, and to run upwards of 2000 miles before it reaches the sea, receiving in its course the tribute of several rivers, 11 of which are superior to the Thames, and often equal to the great body of the waters of the Rhine. Lucan. 3, v. 230.—Strab. 5. —Plin. 6. c. 87.—Curt. 8, c. 9.—Mela. 3, c. 7.—*Virg. GĔLA, a town on the ſouthern parts of Sicily, about 10 miles from the ſea, according to Ptolemy, which received its name from a ſmall river in the neighbourhood, called Gelas. It was built by a Rhodian and Cretan colony, 713 years before the Chriſtian era. After it had continued in exiſtence 404 years, Phintias, tyrant of Agrigentum, carried the inhabitants to Phintias, a town in the neighbourhood, which he had founded, and he employed the ſtones of Gela to beautify his own city. Phintias was alſo called Gela. The inhabitants were called Gelenſes, Geloi, and Gelani. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 702.—Pauſ. 8, c. 46.

GELĀNOR, a king of Argos, who ſucceeded his father, and was deprived of his kingdom by Danaus the Egyptian. Pauſ. 2, c. 16. Vid. Danaus.

GELLIA CORNELIA LEX, de Civitate, by by L. Gellius and Cn. Cornel. Lentulus, A. U. C 681. It enacted that all those who had been presented with the privilege of citizens of Rome by Pompey, should remain in the possession of that liberty.

Gellius, a censor, &c. Plut. in Pomp.——A consul who defeated a party of Germans, in the interest of Spartacus. Plut.

Aulus Gellius, a Roman grammarian in the age of M. Antoninus, about 130 A.D. He published a work which he called Noctes Atticæ, because he composed it at Athens during the long nights of the winter. It is a collection of incongruous matter, which contains many fragments from the ancient writers, and often serves to explain antique monuments. It was originally composed for the improvement of his children, and abounds with many grammatical remarks. The best editions of A. Gellius are, that of Gronovius, 4to, L. Bat. 1706, and that of Conrad, 2 vols. 8vo, Lipf. 1762.

Gelo & Gelon, a son of Dinomenes, who made himself absolute at Syracuse, 491 years before the Christian era. He conquered the Carthaginians at Himera, and made his oppression popular by his great equity and moderation. He reigned seven years, and his death was universally lamented at Syracuse. He was called the father of his people, and the patron of liberty, and honored as a demi-god. His brother Hiero succeeded him. Pauf. 8, c. 42.—Herodot. 7, c. 153, &c.—Diod. 11.——A man who attempted to poison Pyrrhus.——A governor of Bœotia.——A son of Hiero the younger. Pauf. 6, c. 9.——A general of Phocis, destroyed with his troops by the Thessalians. Pauf. 10, c. 1.

Geloi, the inhabitants of Gela. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 701.

Gĕlōnes & Gĕlōni, a people of Scythia, inured from their youth to labor and fatigue. They paint themselves to appear more terrible in battle. They were descended from Gelonus, a son of Hercules. Virg. G. 2, v. 15. Æn. 8, v. 725.—Mela. 1, c. 1.—Claudian. in Ruf. 1, v. 315.

Gelos, a port of Caria. Mela. 1, c. 16.

Gemĭnius, a Roman, who acquainted M. Antony with the situation of his affairs at Rome, &c.——An inveterate enemy of Marius. He seized the person of Marius, and carried him to Minturnæ. Plut. in Mario.——A friend of Pompey, from whom he received a favorite mistress called Flora.—Plut.

Gemĭnus, an astronomer and mathematician of Rhodes, B. C. 77.

Gemoniæ, a place at Rome where the carcases of criminals were thrown. Suet. Tib. 53 & 61.—Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 74.

Genābum, a town of Gaul, now Orleans, on the Loire. Cæsar. B. G. 7, c. 3.—Lucan. 1, v. 440.

Genauni, a people of Vindelicia. Horat. 4. Od. 14, v. 10.

Gēnēva, an antient populous and well fortified city in the country of the Allobroges on the lake Lemanus, now of Geneva.

Genīsus, a man of Cyzicus, killed by the Argonauts, &c. Flacc. 3, v. 45.

Genius, a spirit or dæmon, which, according to the ancients, presided over the birth and life of every man. Vid. Dæmon.

Genšĕric, a famous Vandal prince, who passed from Spain to Africa, where he took Carthage. He laid the foundation of the Vandal kingdom in Africa, and in the course of his military expeditions, invaded Italy, and sacked Rome in July 455.

Gentius, a king of Illyricum, who imprisoned the Roman ambassadors at the request of Perseus king of Macedonia. This offence was highly resented by the Romans, and Gentius was conquered by Anicius and led in triumph with his family, B. C. 169. Liv. 43, c. 19, &c.

Genua, now Genoa, a celebrated town of Liguria, which Annibal destroyed. It was rebuilt by the Romans. Liv. 21, c. 32. l. 28, c. 46. l. 30, c. 1.

Genūcius, a tribune of the people.——A consul.

Genūsus, now Semno, a river of Macedonia, falling into the Adriatic, above Apollonia. Lucan. 5, v. 462.

Genutia lex, de magistratibus, by L. Genutius the tribune, A. U. C. 411. It ordained that no person should exercise the same magistracy within ten years, or be invested with two offices in one year.

Georgĭca, a poem of Virgil in four books. The first treats of ploughing the ground; the second of sowing it; the third speaks of the management of cattle, &c. and in the fourth, the poet gives an account of bees, and of the manner of keeping them among the Romans. The word is derived from γεα terra and εργον opus, because it particularly treats of husbandry. The work is dedicated to Mæcenas the great patron of poetry in the age of Virgil. The author was seven years in writing and polishing it, and in that composition he showed how much he excelled all other writers. He imitated Hesiod who wrote a poem nearly on the same subject, called Opera & Dies.

Gephȳra, one of the cities of the Seleucidæ in Syria. Strab. 9.

Gephȳræi, a people of Phœnicia, who paſſed with Cadmus into Bœotia, and from thence into Attica. Herodot. 5, c. 57.

Gerānia, a mountain between Megara and Corinth.

Geranthræ, a town of Laconia. Pauſ. 3, c. 2.

Geresticus, a harbour of Teios in Ionia. Liv. 37, c. 27.

Gergithum, a town near Cumæ in Æolia. Plin. 5, c. 30.

Gergōbia, a town of Gaul. Cæſ. B.G. 7, c. 9.

Gerion, an ancient augur.

Germānia, an extenſive country of Europe, at the eaſt of Gaul. Its inhabitants were warlike, fierce, and uncivilized, and always proved a watchful enemy againſt the Romans. Cæſar firſt entered their country, but he rather checked their fury than conquered them. His example was followed by his imperial ſucceſſors or their generals, who ſometimes entered the country to chaſtiſe the inſolence of the inhabitants. The ancient Germans were very ſuperſtitious, and, in many inſtances, their religion was the ſame as that of their neighbours, the Gauls; whence ſome have concluded that theſe two nations were of the ſame origin. They paid uncommon reſpect to their women, who, as they believed, were endowed with ſomething more than human. They built no temples to their gods, and paid great attention to the heroes and warriors which their country had produced. Their rude inſtitutions, gradually gave riſe to the laws and manners which ſtill prevail in the countries of Europe, which their arms invaded or conquered. Tacitus, in whoſe age even letters were unknown among them, obſerved their cuſtoms with nicety, and has delineated them with the genius of an hiſtorian, and the reflection of a philoſopher. Tacit. de Morib. Germ.—Mela. 1, c. 3. l. 3, c. 3. —Cæſ. bell. G.

Germānicus Cæsar, a ſon of Druſus and Antonia, the niece of Auguſtus. He was adopted by his uncle Tiberius, and raiſed to the moſt important offices of the ſtate. When his grandfather Auguſtus died, he was employed in a war in Germany, and the affection of the ſoldiers unanimouſly ſaluted him emperor. He refuſed the unſeaſonable honor, and appeaſed the tumult which his indifference occaſioned. He continued his wars in Germany, and defeated the celebrated Arminius, and was rewarded with a triumph at his return in Rome. Tiberius declared him emperor of the eaſt, and ſent him to appeaſe the ſeditions of the Armenians. But the ſucceſs of Germanicus in the eaſt was ſoon looked upon with an envious eye by Tiberius, and his death was meditated. He was ſecretly poiſoned at Daphne near Antioch by Piſo, A. D. 19, in the 34th year of his age. The news of his death was received with the greateſt grief, and the moſt bitter lamentations, and Tiberius ſeemed to be the only one who rejoiced in the fall of Germanicus. He had married Agrippina, by whom he had nine children, one of whom, Caligula, diſgraced the name of his illuſtrious father. Germanicus has been commended, not only for his military accompliſhments, but alſo for his learning, humanity, and extenſive benevolence. In the midſt of war, he devoted ſome moments to ſtudy, and he favored the world with two Greek comedies, ſome epigrams, and a tranſlation of Aratus in Latin verſe. Sueton.——This name was common in the age of the emperors, not only to thoſe who had obtained victories over the Germans, but even to thoſe who had entered the borders of their country at the head of an army. Domitian applied the name of Germanicus, which he himſelf had vainly aſſumed, to the month of September in honor of himſelf. Suet. in Dom. 13.—Martial. 9, ep. 2, v. 4.

Germanii, a people of Perſia. Herodot. 1, c. 125.

Gerrhæ, a people of Scythia, in whoſe country the Boryſthenes riſes. The kings of Scythia were generally buried in their territories. Id. 4, c. 71.

Gerus & Gerrhus, a river of Scythia. Id. 4, c. 56.

Geronthræ, a town of Laconia, where a yearly feſtival, called Geronthræa, was obſerved in honor of Mars. The god had there a temple, with a grove, into which no woman was permitted to enter, during the time of the ſolemnity. Pauſ. Lacon.

Gēryon & Gēryŏnes, a celebrated monſter, born from the union of Chryſaor with Callirhoe, and repreſented by the poets as having three bodies and three heads. He lived in the iſland of Gades, where he kept numerous flocks, which were guarded by a two headed dog, called Orthos, and by Eurythion. Hercules, by order of Euryſtheus, went to Gades, and deſtroyed Geryon, Orthos, and Eurythion, and carried away all his flocks and herds to Tirynthus. Heſiod. Theog. 187.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 661. l. 8, v. 202 —Ital. 1, v. 277.

Gessātæ, a people of Gallia Togata. Plut. in Marcell.

Gessoriācum, a town of Gaul, now Boulogne, in Picardy.

Gessus, a river of Ionia.

Geta, a man who raiſed ſeditions at Rome in Nero's reign, &c. Tacit. Hiſt. 2, c. 72.——Septimius, a ſon of the emperor Severus, brother to Caracalla. In the eighth year of his age he was moved with compaſſion at the fate of ſome of the partizans of Niger and Albinus, who had been ordered to be executed; and his father, ſtruck with his humanity, retracted his ſentence. After his father's death he reigned at Rome, conjointly with his brother; but Caracalla, who envied his virtues, and was jealous of his popularity, ordered him to be poiſoned; and when this could not be effected, he murdered him in the arms of his mother Julia, who in the attempt of defending the fatal blows from his body, received a wound in her arm, from the hand of her ſon, the 28th of March, A. D. 212. Geta had not reached the 23d year of his age, and the Romans had reaſon to lament the death of ſo virtuous a prince, while they groaned under the cruelties and oppreſſion of Caracalla.

Getæ, (Getes, ſing.) a people of European Scythia, near the Daci. Ovid, who was baniſhed in their country, deſcribes them as a ſavage and warlike nation. The word Geticus is frequently uſed for Thracian. Ovid. de Pont. Triſt. 5, el. 7, v. 111.—Strab. 7.—Stat. 2. Sylv. 2, v. 61. l. 3, ſ. 1, v. 17.—Lucan. 2, v. 54. l. 3, v. 95.

Getulia. Vid. Gætulia.

Gĭgantes, the ſons of Cœlus and Terra, who, according to Heſiod, ſprang from the blood of the wound which Cœlus received from his ſon Saturn; whilſt Hyginus calls them ſons of Tartarus and Terra. They are repreſented as men of uncommon ſtature, with ſtrength proportioned to their gigantic ſize. Some of them, as Cottus, Briareus, and Gyges, had 50 heads and 100 arms, and ſerpents inſtead of legs. They were of a terrible aſpect, their hair hung looſe about their ſhoulders, and their beard was ſuffered to grow untouched. Pallene, and its neighbourhood, was the place of their reſidence. The defeat of the Titans, to whom they were nearly related, incenſed them againſt Jupiter, and they all conſpired to dethrone him. The god was alarmed, and called all the deities to aſſiſt him againſt a powerful enemy, who made uſe of rocks, oaks, and burning woods for their weapons, and who had already heaped mount Oſſa upon Pelion, to ſcale with more facility the walls of heaven. At the ſight of ſuch dreadful adverſaries, the gods fled with the greateſt conſternation into Egypt, where they aſſumed the ſhape of different animals, to ſcreen themſelves from their purſuers. Jupiter, however, remembered that they were not invincible, provided he called a mortal to his aſſiſtance; and by the advice of Pallas, he armed his ſon Hercules in his cauſe. With the aid of this celebrated hero, the giants were ſoon put to flight and defeated. Some were cruſhed to pieces under mountains, or buried in the ſea; and others were flead alive, or beaten to death with clubs, (Vid. Enceladus, Aloides, Porphyrion, Typhon, Otus, Titanes, &c.) The exiſtence of giants, has been ſupported by all the writers of antiquity, and received as an undeniable truth. Homer tells us, that Tityus, when extended on the ground, covered nine acres; and that Polyphemus eat two of the companions of Ulyſſes at once, and walked along the ſhores of Sicily, leaning on a ſtaff, which might have ſerved for the maſt of a ſhip. The Grecian heroes, during the Trojan war, and Turnus in Italy, attacked their enemies by throwing ſtones, which four men of the ſucceeding ages would be unable to move. Plutarch alſo mentions, in ſupport of the gigantic ſtature, that Sertorius opened the grave of Antæus in Africa, and found a ſkeleton which meaſured ſix cubits in length. Apollod. 1, c. 6.—Pauſ. 8, c. 2, &c.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 151.—Plut. in Sertor.—Hygin. fab. 28, &c.—Homer. od. 7, & 10.—Virg. G. 1, v. 280, &c.

Gĭgartum, a town of Phœnicia.

Gigis, one of the female attendants of Paryſatis, who was privy to the poiſoning of Statira. Plut. in Artax.

Gildo, a governor of Africa, in the reign of Arcadius. He died A. D. 398.

Gillo, an infamous adulterer, in Juvenal's age. Juv. 1, v. 40.

Gindanes, a people Libya, who fed on the leaves of the lotus. Herodot. 4, c. 176.

Gindes, a river of Albania, flowing into the Cyrus.——Another of Meſopotamia. Tibull. 4, el. 1, v. 141.

Ginge. Vid. Gigis.

Gingūnum, a mountain of Umbria.

Gippius, a Roman who pretended to ſleep, that his wife might indulge her adulterous propenſities, &c.

Gisco, ſon of Hamilcon the Carthaginian general, was baniſhed from his country by the influence of his enemies. He was afterwards recalled, and empowered by the Carthaginians to puniſh, in what manner he pleaſed, thoſe who had occaſioned his baniſhment. He was ſatisfied to ſee them proſtrate on the ground, and to place his foot on their neck, ſhewing that independence and forgiveneſs are two of the moſt brilliant virtues of a great mind. He was made a general ſoon after, in Sicily, againſt the Corinthians, about 309 years before the Chriſtian era; and by his ſucceſs and intrepidity, he obliged the enemies of his country to ſue for peace.

Glădiātōrii ludi, combats originally exhibited on the grave of deceaſed perſons at Rome. They were firſt introduced at Rome by the Bruti, upon the death of their father, A. U. C. 488. It was ſuppoſed that the ghoſts of the dead were rendered propitious by human blood; therefore at funerals, it was uſual to murder ſlaves in cool blood. In ſucceeding ages, it was reckoned leſs cruel to oblige them to kill one another like men, than to ſlaughter them like brutes, therefore the barbarity was covered by the ſpecious ſhow of pleaſure and voluntary combat. Originally captives, criminals, or diſobedient ſlaves, were trained up for combat: but when the diverſion became more frequent, and was exhibited on the ſmalleſt occaſion, to procure eſteem and popularity, many of the Roman citizens enliſted themſelves among the gladiators, and Nero, at one ſhow, exhibited no leſs than 400 ſenators and 600 knights. The people were treated with theſe combats, not only by the great and opulent, but the very prieſts had their Ludi pontificales, and Ludi ſacerdotales. It is ſuppoſed that there were no more than three pair of gladiators exhibited by the Bruti. Their numbers, however, increaſed with the luxury and power of the city; and the gladiators became ſo formidable, that Spartacus, one of their body, had courage to take up arms, and the ſucceſs to defeat the Roman armies, only with a train of his fellow-ſufferers. The more prudent of the Romans were ſenſible of the dangers which threatened the ſtate, by keeping ſuch a number of deſperate men in arms, and therefore, many ſalutary laws were propoſed to limit their number, as well as to ſettle the time in which the ſhew could be exhibited with ſafety and convenience. Under the emperors, not only ſenators and knights, but even women engaged among the gladiators, and ſeemed to forget the inferiority of their ſex. When there were to be any ſhows, hand-bills were circulated to give notice to the people, and to mention the place, number, time, and every circumſtance requiſite to be known. When they were firſt brought upon the arena, they walked round the place with great pomp and ſolemnity, and after that they were matched in equal pairs with great nicety. They firſt had a ſkirmiſh with wooden ſiles, called rudes or arma luſoria. After this the effective weapons, ſuch as ſwords, daggers, &c. called arma decretoria were given them, and the ſignal for the engagement was given by the ſound of a trumpet. As they had all previouſly ſworn to fight till death, or ſuffer death in the moſt excruciating torments, the fight was bloody and obſtinate, and when one ſignified his ſubmiſſion by ſurrendering his arms, the victor was not permitted to grant him his life, without the leave and approbation of the multitude. This was done by clenching the fingers of both hands between each other, and holding the thumbs upright cloſe together, or by bending back their thumbs. The firſt of theſe was called pollicem premere, and ſignified the wiſh of the people to ſpare the life of the conquered. The other ſign, called pollicem vertere, ſignified their diſapprobation, and ordered the victor to put his antagoniſt to death. The victor was generally rewarded with a palm, and other expreſſive marks of the people's favor. He was moſt commonly preſented with a pileus and rudis. When one of the combatants received a remarkable wound, the people exclaimed habet, and expreſſed their concern by ſhouts. The combats of gladiators, were ſometimes different, either in weapons or dreſs, whence they were generally diſtinguiſhed into the following orders: The ſecutores were armed with a ſword and buckler, to keep off the net of their antagoniſts, the retiarii. Theſe laſt endeavoured to throw their net over the head of their antagoniſt, and in that manner to entangle him, and prevent him from ſtriking. If this did not ſucceed, they betook themſelves to flight. Their dreſs was a ſhort coat with a hat tied under the chin with broad ribbon. They wore a trident in their left hand. The Threces, originally Thracians, were armed with a faulchion, and ſmall round ſhield. The myrmillones, called alſo Galli, from their Gallic dreſs, were much the ſame as the ſecutores. They were, like them, armed with a ſword, and, on the top of their head-piece, they wore the figure of a fiſh emboſſed, called μορμυρος, whence their name. The Hoplomachi, were completely armed from head to foot, as their name implies. The Samnites, armed after the manner of the Samnites, wore a large ſhield broad at the top, and growing more narrow at the bottom, more conveniently to defend the upper parts of the body. The Eſſedarii, generally fought from the eſſedum, or chariot uſed by the ancient Gauls and Britons. The andabatæ, αναβαται, fought on horſeback, with a helmet that covered and defended their faces and eyes. Hence andabatarum more pugnare, is to fight blindfolded. The meridiani, engaged in the afternoon. The poſtulatitii, were men of great ſkill and experience, and ſuch as were generally produced by the emperors. The fiſcales were maintained out of the emperor's treaſury, fiſcus. The dimachæri fought with two ſwords in their hands, whence their name. After theſe cruel exhibitions had been continued for the amuſement of the Roman populace, they were aboliſhed by Conſtantine the Great, near 600 years after their firſt inſtitution. They were, however, revived under the reign of Conſtantius and his two ſucceſſors, but Honorius for ever put an end to theſe cruel barbarities.

Roman

GLAUCIPPUS, a Greek, who wrote a treatiſe concerning the ſacred rites obſerved at Athens.

GLAUCON, a writer of dialogues at Athens. Diog. in vit.

GLAUCONŎME, one of the Nereides.

GLAUCŌPIS, a ſirname of Minerva, from the blueneſs of her eyes.

GLAUCUS, a ſon of Hippolochus, the ſon of Bellerophon. He aſſiſted Priam in the Trojan war, and had the ſimplicity to exchange his golden ſuit of armour with Diomedes for an iron one, whence came the proverb of Glauci et Diomedis permutatio, to expreſs a fooliſh purchaſe. He behaved with much courage, and was killed by Ajax. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 483.—Martial. 9, ep. 96.—Homer. Il. 6.——A fiſherman of Anthedon in Bœotia, ſon of Neptune and Nais, or according to others of Polybius the ſon of Mercury. As he was fiſhing, he obſerved that all the fiſhes which he laid on the graſs received freſh vigor as they touched the ground, and immediately eſcaped from him by leaping into the ſea. He attributed the cauſe of it to the graſs, and by taſting it, he found himſelf ſuddenly moved with a deſire of living in the ſea. Upon this he leaped into the water, and was made a ſea deity by Oceanus and Tethys, at the requeſt of the gods. After this transformation, he became enamoured of the Nereid Scylla, whoſe ingratitude was ſeverely puniſhed by Circe. [Vid. Scylla]. He is repreſented like the other ſea deities with a long beard, diſhevelled hair, and ſhaggy eyebrows, and with the tail of a fiſh. He received the gift of prophecy from Apollo, and according to ſome accounts he was the interpreter of Nereus. He aſſiſted the Argonauts in their expedition, and foretold them that Hercules, and the two ſons of Leda, would one day receive immortal honors. The fable of his metamorphoſis has been explained by ſome authors, who obſerve that he was an excellent diver, who was devoured by fiſhes as he was ſwimming in the ſea. Ovid. Del.—Pauſ. 9, c. 22.——A ſon of Siſyphus king of Corinth, by Merope the daughter of Atlas, born at Potnia, a village of Bœotia. He prevented his mares from having any commerce with the ſtallions, in the expectation that they would become ſwifter in running, upon which Venus inſpired the mares with ſuch fury, that they tore his body to pieces as he returned from the games, which Adraſtus had celebrated in honor of his father. He was buried at Potnia. Hygin. fab. 250.—Virg. G. 3, v. 367.—Apollod. 1 & 2.——A ſon of Minos the 2d, and Paſiphae, who was ſmothered in a caſk of honey. His father, ignorant of his fate, conſulted the oracle to know where he was, and received for anſwer, that the ſoothſayer who beſt deſcribed him an ox, which was of three different colors among his flocks, would beſt give him intelligence of his ſon's ſituation. Polyidus was found ſuperior to all the other ſoothſayers, and was commanded by the king to find the young prince. When he had found him, Minos confined him with the dead body, and told him that he never would reſtore his liberty, if he did not reſtore him to life. Polyidus was ſtruck with the king's ſeverity, but while he ſtood in aſtoniſhment, a ſerpent ſuddenly came towards the body and touched it. Polyidus killed the ſerpent, and immediately a ſecond came, who ſeeing the other without motion or ſigns of life, diſappeared, and ſoon after returned with a certain herb in his mouth. This herb he laid on the body of the dead ſerpent, who was immediately reſtored to life. Polyidus, who had attentively conſidered what paſſed, ſeized the herb, and with it he rubbed the body of the dead prince, who was inſtantly raiſed to life. Minos received Glaucus with gratitude, but he refuſed refuſed to reſtore Polyidus to liberty, before he taught his ſon the art of divination and prophecy. He conſented with great reluctance, and when he was at laſt permitted to return to Argolis his native country, he deſired his pupil to ſpit in his mouth. Glaucus willingly conſented, and from that moment he forgot all the knowledge of divination and healing, which he had received from the inſtructions of Polyidus. Hyginus aſcribes the recovery of Glaucus to Æſculapius. Apollod. 2, c. 3.—Hygin. 136 & 251, &c.——A ſon of Epytus, who ſucceeded his father on the throne of Meſſenia, about 10 centuries before the Auguſtan age. GORDIÆI, mountains in Armenia, where the Tigris riſes, ſuppoſed to be the Ararat of ſcripture.

GORDIĀNUS, M. Antonius Africanus, a ſon of Metius Marcellus, deſcended from Trajan, by his mother's ſide. In the greateſt affluence he cultivated learning, and was an example of piety and virtue. He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of poetry, and compoſed a poem in 30 books upon the virtues of Titus Antoninus, and M. Aurelius. He was ſuch an advocate for good breeding and politeneſs, that he never ſat down in the preſence of his father-in-law, Annius Severus, who paid him daily viſits, before he was promoted to the prætorſhip. He was ſometime after elected conſul, and went to take the government of Africa, in the capacity of proconſul. After he had attained his 80th year, in the greateſt ſplendor and domeſtic tranquillity, he was roufed from his his peaceful occupations by the tyrannical reign of the Maximini, and he was proclaimed emperor by the rebellious troops of his province. He long declined to accept the imperial purple, but the threats of immediate death gained his compliance. Maximinus marched againſt him with the greateſt indignation; and Gordian ſent his ſon, with whom he ſhared the imperial dignity, to oppoſe the enemy. Young Gordian was killed; and the father, worn out with age, and grown deſperate on account of his misfortunes, ſtrangled himſelf at Carthage, before he had been ſix weeks at the head of the empire, A. D. 236. He was univerſally lamented by the army and people.——M. Antonius Africanus, ſon of Gordianus, was inſtructed by Serenus Samnoticus, who left him his library, which conſiſted of 62,000 volumes. His enlightened underſtanding, and his peaceful diſpoſition, recommended him to the favor of the emperor Heliogabalus. He was made preſect of Rome, and afterwards conſul, by the emperor Alexander Severus. He paſſed into Africa, in the character of lieutenant to his father, who had obtained that province; and ſeven years after he was elected emperor, in conjunction with him. He marched againſt the partizans of Maximinus, his antagoniſt in Mauritania, and was killed in a bloody battle on the 25th of June, A. D. 236, after a reign of about ſix weeks. He was of an amiable diſpoſition, but he has been juſtly blamed by his biographers, on account of his laſcivious propenſities, which reduced him to the weakneſs and infirmities of old age, though he was but in his 46th year at the time of his death.——M. Antonius Pius, grandſon of the firſt Gordian, was but 12 years old when he was honored with the title of Cæſar. He was proclaimed emperor, in the 16th year of his age, and his election was attended with univerſal marks of approbation. In the 18th year of his age, he married Furia Sabina Tranquillina, daughter of Miſitheus, a man celebrated for his eloquence and public virtues. Miſitheus was entruſted with the moſt important offices of the ſtate by his ſon-in-law; and his adminiſtration proved how deſerving he was of the confidence and affection of his imperial maſter. He corrected the various abuſes which prevailed in the ſtate, and reſtored the antient diſcipline among the ſoldiers. By his prudence and political ſagacity, all the chief towns in the empire were ſtored with proviſions, which could maintain the emperor and a large army during 15 days upon any emergency. Gordian was not leſs active than his father-in-law; and when Sapor, the king of Perſia, had invaded the Roman provinces in the eaſt, he boldly marched to meet him, and in his way defeated a large body of Goths, in Mœſia. He conquered Sapor, and took many floriſhing cities in the eaſt, from his adverſary. In this ſucceſs the ſenate decreed him a triumph, and ſaluted Miſitheus as the guardian of the republic. Gordian was aſſaſſinated in the eaſt, A. D. 244, by the means of Philip, who had ſucceeded to the virtuous Miſitheus, and who uſurped the ſovereign power by murdering a warlike and amiable prince. The ſenate, ſenſible of his merit, honored him with a moſt ſplendid funeral on the confines of Perſia, and ordered that the deſcendants of the Gordians ſhould ever be free, at Rome, from all the heavy taxes and burdens of the ſtate. During the reign of Gordianus, there was an uncommon eclipſe of the ſun, in which the ſtars appeared in the middle of the day.

Gordium, a town of Phrygia. Juſtin. 11, c. 7.—Liv. 38, c. 18.—Curt. 3, c. 1.

Gordius, a Phrygian, who, though originally a peaſant, was raiſed to the throne. During a ſedition the Phrygians conſulted the oracle, and were told that all their troubles would ceaſe as ſoon as they choſe for their king, the firſt man they met going to the temple of Jupiter, mounted on a chariot. Gordius was the object of their choice, and he immediately conſecrated his chariot in the temple of Jupiter. The knot which tied the yoke to the draught tree, was made in ſuch an artful manner, that the ends of the cord could not be perceived. From this circumſtance, a report was ſoon ſpread that the empire of Aſia was promiſed by the oracle to him that could untie the Gordian knot. Alexander, in his conqueſt of Aſia, paſſed by Gordium; and as he wiſhed to leave nothing undone, which might inſpire his ſoldiers with courage, and make his enemies believe that he was born to conquer Aſia, he cut the knot with his ſword; and from that circumſtance aſſerted that the oracle was really fulfilled, and that his claims to univerſal empire were fully juſtified. Juſtin. 11, c. 7.—Curt. 3, c. 1.—Arrian. 1. ——A tyrant of Corinth. Ariſtot.

GORGO, the wife of Leonidas, king of Sparta, &c.——The name of the ſhip which carried Perſeus, after he had conquered Meduſa.

GORGŎNES, three celebrated ſiſters, daughters of Phorcys and Ceto, whoſe names were Stheno, Euryale, and Meduſa, all immortal except Meduſa. According to the mythologiſts, their hairs were intwined with ſerpents, their hands were of braſs, their body was covered with impenetrable ſcales, and their teeth were as long as the tuſks of a wild boar, and they turned to ſtones all thoſe on whom they fixed their eyes. Meduſa alone had ſerpents in her hair, according to Ovid, and this proceeded from the reſentment of Minerva, in whoſe temple Meduſa had gratified the paſſion of Neptune, who was enamoured of the beautiful color of her locks, which the goddeſs changed into ſerpents. Æſchylus ſays, that they had only one tooth and one eye between them, of which they had the uſe each in her turn; and accordingly it was at the time that they were exchanging the eye, that Perſeus attacked them, and cut off Meduſa's head. According to ſome authors, Perſeus, when he went to the conqueſt of the Gorgons, was armed with an inſtrument like a ſcythe by Mercury, and provided with a looking-glaſs by Minerva, beſides winged ſhoes, and a helmet of Pluto, which rendered all objects clearly viſible and open to the view, while the perſon who wore it remained totally inviſible. With weapons like theſe, Perſeus obtained an eaſy victory; and after his conqueſt, returned his arms to the different deities, whoſe favors and aſſiſtance he had ſo recently experienced. The head of Meduſa remained in his hands; and after he had finiſhed all his laborious expeditions he gave it to Minerva, who placed it on her ægis, with which ſhe turned into ſtones all ſuch as fixed their eyes upon it. It is ſaid, that after the conqueſt of the Gorgons, Perſeus took his flight in the air towards Æthiopia; and that the drops of blood which fell to the ground from Meduſa's head were changed into ſerpents, which have ever ſince infeſted the ſandy deſarts of Libya. The horſe Pegaſus alſo aroſe from the blood of Meduſa, as well as Chryſaor with his golden ſword. The reſidence of the Gorgons was beyond the ocean towards the weſt, according to Heſiod. Æſchylus makes them inhabit the eaſtern parts of Scythia; and Ovid, as the moſt received opinion, ſupports that they lived in the inland parts of Libya, near the lake of Triton, or the gardens of the Heſperides. Diodorus, and others, explain the fable of the Gorgons, by ſuppoſing that they were a warlike race of women near the Amazons, whom Perſeus, with the help of a large army, totally deſtroyed. *Heſiod. GORGŎNIA, a ſirname of Pallas, becauſe Perſeus, armed with her ſhield, had conquered the Gorgon, who had polluted her temple with Neptune.

GORGŎNIUS, a man ridiculed by Horace for his ill ſmell. Horat. 1, Sat. 2, v. 27.

GORGŎPHŎNE, a daughter of Perſeus and Andromeda, who married Perieres, king of Meſſenia, by whom ſhe had Apharеus and Leucippus. After the death of Perieres, ſhe married Œbalus, who made her mother of Icarus and Tyndarus. She is the firſt whom the mythologiſts mention as having had a ſecond huſband. Pauſ. 4, c. 2.—Apollod. 1, 2 & 3.——One of the Danaides. Apollod. 2, c. 1.

GORGŎPHŎNUS, a ſon of Electryon and Anaxo. Apollod. 2, c. 4.

GORGŎPHŎRA, a ſirname of Minerva, from her ægis, on which was the head of the gorgon Meduſa.

GORGUS, the ſon of Ariſtomenes the Meſſenian. He was married, when young, to a virgin by his father, who had experienced the greateſt kindneſſes from her humanity, and had been enabled to conquer ſeven Cretans, who had attempted his life, &c. Pauſ. 4, c. 19.——A ſon of Theron, tyrant of Agrigentum.——A man, whoſe knowledge of metals proved very ſerviceable to Alexander, &c.

GORGYTHION, a ſon of Priam, killed by Teucer. Homer. Il. 8.

GORTUÆ, a people of Eubœa, who fought with the Medes at the battle of Arbela. Curt. 4, c. 12.

GORTYN, GORTYS, & GORTŸNA, an inland town of Crete. It was on the inhabitants of this place, that Annibal, to ſave his money, practiſed an artifice recorded in C. Nep. in Ann. 9.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Lucan. 6, v. 214. l. 7, v. 214.—Virg. Æn. 11, v. 773.

GORTŸNIA, a town of Arcadia in Peloponneſus. Pauſ. 8, c. 28.

GOTTHI, a celebrated nation of Germany, called called also Gothones, Gutones, Gythones and Guttones. They were warriors by profession, as well as all their savage neighbours. They extended their power over all parts of the world, and chiefly directed their arms against the Roman empire. Their first attempt against Rome, was on the provinces of Greece, whence they were driven by Constantine. They plundered Rome, under Alaric, one of their most celebrated kings, A. D. 410. From becoming the enemies of the Romans, the Goths gradually became their mercenaries; and as they were powerful and united they soon dictated to their imperial masters, and introduced disorders, anarchy, and revolutions in the west of Europe. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 2, &c.

Gracchus, T. Sempronius, father of Tiberius and Caius Gracchus, twice consul, and once censor, was distinguished by his integrity as well as his prudence and superior ability either in the senate or at the head of the armies. He made war in Gaul, and met with much success in Spain. He married Sempronia, of the family of the Scipio's, a woman of great virtue, piety, and learning. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 48. Their children, Tiberius and Caius, who had been educated under the watchful eye of their mother, rendered themselves famous for their eloquence, seditions, and an obstinate attachment to the interests of the populace, which at last proved fatal to them. With a winning eloquence, affected moderation, and uncommon popularity, Tiberius began to renew the Agrarian law, which had already caused such dissensions at Rome. (Vid. Agraria.) By the means of violence, his proposition passed into a law, and he was appointed commissioner, with his father-in-law Appius Claudius, and his brother Caius, to make an equal division of the lands among the people. The riches of Attalus, which were left to the Roman people by will, were distributed without opposition; and Tiberius enjoyed the triumph of his successful enterprize, when he was assassinated in the midst of his adherents by P. Nasica, while the populace were all unanimous to re-elect him to serve the office of tribune the following year. The death of Tiberius checked, for a while, the friends of the people; but Caius, spurred by ambition and furious zeal, attempted to remove every obstacle which stood in his way by force and violence. He supported the cause of the people with more vehemence, but less moderation, than Tiberius; and his success served only to awaken his ambition, and animate his resentment against the nobles. With the privileges of a tribune, he soon became the arbiter of the republic, and treated the patricians with contempt. This behaviour hastened the ruin of Caius, and in the tumult he fled to the temple of Diana, where his friends prevented him from committing suicide. This encreased the sedition, and he was murdered by order of the consul Opimius, B. C. 121, about 13 years after the unfortunate end of Tiberius. His body was thrown into the Tiber, and his wife was forbidden to put on mourning for his death. Caius has been accused of having stained his hands in the blood of Scipio Africanus the younger, who was found murdered in his bed. Plut. in vitâ.—Cic. in Cat. 1.—Lucan. 6, v. 796.—Flor. 2, c. 17. l. 3, c. 14, &c.——Sempronius, a Roman, banished to the coast of Africa for his adulteries with Julia, the daughter of Augustus. He was assassinated by order of Tiberius, after he had been banished 14 years. Julia also shared his fate. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 53.——A general of the Sabines, taken by Q. Cincinnatus.——A Roman consul, defeated by Annibal, &c. C. Nep. in Ann.

Grādīvus, a surname of Mars among the Romans, perhaps from χραδαινειν, brandishing a spear. His residence was supposed to be among the fierce and savage Thracians and Getæ, over whom he particularly presided. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 35.—Homer. Il.—Liv. 1, c. 20.

Græci, the inhabitants of Greece. Vid. Græcia.

Græcia, a celebrated country of Europe, bounded on the west by the Ionian sea, south by the Mediterranean sea, east by the Ægean, and north by Thrace and Dalmatia. It is generally divided into four large provinces: Macedonia, Epirus, Achaia or Hellas, and Peloponnesus. This country has been reckoned superior to every other part of the earth, on account of the salubrity of the air, the temperature of the climate, the fertility of the soil; and above all, the fame, learning, and arts of its inhabitants. The Greeks have severally been called Achæans, Argians, Danai, Dolopes, Hellenians, Ionians, Myrmidons, and Pelasgians. The most celebrated of their cities were Athens, Sparta, Argos, Corinth, Thebes, Sicyon, Mycenæ, Delphi, &c. The inhabitants, whose history is darkened in its primitive ages with fabulous accounts and traditions, supported that they were the original inhabitants of the country, and born from the earth where they dwelt; and they heard with contempt the probable conjectures, which traced their origin among the first inhabitants of Asia, and the colonies of Egypt. In the first periods of their history the Greeks were governed by monarchs; and there were as many kings as there were cities. The monarchical power gradually decreased; the love of liberty established the republican government; and no part of Greece, except Macedonia, remained in the hands of an abſolute ſovereign. The expedition of the Argonauts firſt rendered the Greeks reſpectable among their neighbours; and in the ſucceeding age, the wars of Thebes and Troy, gave opportunity to their heroes and demi-gods to diſplay their valor in the field of battle. The ſimplicity of the ancient Greeks rendered them virtuous; and the eſtabliſhment of the Olympic games, in particular, where the noble reward of the conqueror was a laurel crown, contributed to their aggrandizement, and made them ambitious of fame, and not the ſlaves of riches. The auſterity of their laws, and the education of their youth, particularly at Lacedæmon, rendered them brave and active, inſenſible to bodily pain, fearleſs and intrepid in the time of danger. The celebrated battles of Marathon, Thermopylæ, Salamis, Platæa, and Mycale, ſufficiently ſhow what ſuperiority the courage of a little army can obtain over millions of undiſciplined barbarians. After many ſignal victories over the Perſians, they became elated with their ſucceſs; and when they found no one able to diſpute their power abroad, they turned their arms one againſt the other, and leagued with foreign ſtates to deſtroy the moſt floriſhing of their cities. The Meſſenian and Peloponneſian wars, are examples of the dreadful calamities which ariſe from civil diſcord, and long proſperity, and the ſucceſs with which the gold and the ſword of Philip and of his ſon corrupted and enſlaved Greece, fatally proved that when a nation becomes indolent and diſſipated at home, it ceaſes to be reſpectable in the eyes of the neighbouring ſtates. The annals of Greece however abound with ſingular proofs of heroiſm and reſolution. The bold retreat of the ten thouſand, who had aſſiſted Cyrus againſt his brother Artaxerxes, reminded their countrymen of their ſuperiority over all other nations; and taught Alexander, that the conqueſt of the eaſt might be effected with a handful of Grecian ſoldiers. While the Greeks rendered themſelves ſo illuſtrious by their military exploits, the arts and ſciences were aſſiſted by conqueſt, and received freſh luſtre from the application and induſtry of their profeſſors. The labors of the learned were received with admiration, and the merit of a compoſition was determined by the applauſe or diſapprobation of a multitude. Their generals were orators; and eloquence ſeemed to be ſo nearly connected with the military profeſſion, that he was deſpiſed by his ſoldiers, who could not addreſs them upon any emergency with a ſpirited and well delivered oration. The learning, as well as the virtues of Socrates, procured him a name; and the writings of Ariſtotle have, perhaps, gained him a more laſting fame, than all the conqueſts and trophies of his royal pupil. Such were the occupations and accompliſhments of the Greeks; their language became almoſt univerſal, and their country was the receptacle of the youths of the neighbouring ſtates, where they imbibed the principles of liberty and moral virtue. The Greeks planted ſeveral colonies, and totally peopled the weſtern coaſts of Aſia Minor. In the eaſtern parts of Italy, there were alſo many ſettlements made; and the country received from its Greek inhabitants, the name of Magna Græcia. For ſome time Greece ſubmitted to the yoke of Alexander and his ſucceſſors, and at laſt, after a ſpirited though ineffectual ſtruggle in the Achæan league, it fell under the power of Rome, and became one of its dependent provinces governed by a pro-conſul.

GRÆCIA MAGNA, a part of Italy, where the Greeks planted colonies, whence the name. Its boundaries are very uncertain; ſome ſay that it extended on the ſouthern parts of Italy, and others ſuppoſe that Magna Græcia comprehended only Campania and Lucania. To theſe ſome add Sicily, which was likewiſe peopled by Greek colonies. Ovid. Faſt. 4, v. 64.—Strab. &c.

GRÆCUS, a man from whom ſome ſuppoſe that Greece received its name. Ariſtot.

GRAIUS, an inhabitant of Greece.

GRAMPIUS MONS, the Grampian mountains in Scotland. Tacit. Agric. 29.

GRANĪCUS, a river of Bithynia, famous for the battle fought there between the armies of Alexander and Darius, 22d of May, B.C. 334, when 600,000 Perſians were defeated by 30,000 Macedonians. Diod. 17.—Plut. in Alex.—Juſtin.—Curt. 3, c. 1.

GRANIUS PETRONIUS, an officer, who being taken by Pompey's generals, refuſed the life which was tendered to him; obſerving that Cæſar's ſoldiers received not, but granted life. He killed himſelf. Plut. in Cæſ.——A queſtor, whom Sylla had ordered to be ſtrangled, only one day before he died a natural death. Plut.——A ſon of the wife of Marius, by a former huſband. ——Quintus, a man intimate with Craſſus and other illuſtrious men of Rome, whoſe vices he laſhed with an unſparing hand. Cic. Brut. 43 & 46. Orat. 2, c. 60.

GRATIÆ, three goddeſſes. Vid. Charites.

GRĀTIĀNUS, a native of Pannonia, father to the emperor Valentinian 1ſt. He was raiſed to the throne, though only eight years old; and after he had reigned for ſome time conjointly with his father, he became ſole emperor, in the 16th year of his age. He ſoon after took, as his imperial colleague, Theodoſius, Theodoſius, whom he appointed over the eaſtern parts of the empire. His courage in the field is as remarkable as his love of learning, and fondneſs of philoſophy. He ſlaughtered 30,000 Germans in a battle, and ſupported the tottering ſtate by his prudence and intrepidity. His enmity to the Pagan ſuperſtition of his ſubjects proved his ruin; and Maximinus, who undertook the defence of the worſhip of Jupiter and of all the gods, was joined by an infinite number of diſcontented Romans, and met Gratian near Paris in Gaul. Gratian was forſaken by his troops in the field of battle, and was murdered by the rebels, A. D. 383, in the 24th year of his age.——A Roman ſoldier, inveſted with the imperial purple by the rebellious army in Britain, in oppoſition to Honorius. He was aſſaſſinated four months after, by thoſe very troops to whom he owed his elevation, A. D. 407.

Gratidia, a woman at Neapolis, called Canidia by Horace. Epod. 3.

Gration, a giant killed by Diana.

Gratius Faliscus, a Latin poet, contemporary with Ovid. He wrote a poem on courſing, called Cynegeticon, much commended for its elegance and perſpicuity. It may be compared to the Georgics of Virgil, to which it is nearly equal in the number of verſes. The lateſt edition is of Amſt. 4to. 1728.

Gravii, a people of Spain. Ital. 3, v. 366.

Grăviscæ, now Eremo de St. Auguſtino, a maritime town of Etruria, which aſſiſted Æneas againſt Turnus. The air was unwholeſome, on account of the marſhes and ſtagnant waters in its neighbouhood. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 184.—Liv. 40, c. 29. l. 41, c. 16.

Gravius, a Roman knight of Puteoli, killed at Dyrrachium, &c. Cæſ. Bell. Civ.

Gregorius, Theod. Thaumaturgus, a diſciple of Origen, afterwards biſhop of Neocæſarea, the place of his birth. He died A. D. 266, and it is ſaid he left only ſeventeen idolaters in his dioceſe, where he had found only ſeventeen Chriſtians. Of his works, are extant his gratulatory oration to Origen, a canonical epiſtle, and other treatiſes in greek, the beſt edition of which is that of Paris, fol. 1622.——Nazianzen, ſirnamed the Divine, was biſhop of Conſtantinople, which he reſigned on its being diſputed. His writings rival thoſe of the moſt celebrated orators of Greece, in eloquence, ſublimity, and variety. His ſermons are more for philoſophers, than common hearers, but replete with ſerioufneſs and devotion. Eraſmus ſaid, that he was afraid to tranſlate his works, from the apprehenſion of not transfuſing into another language the ſmartneſs and acumen of his ſtile, and the ſtatelineſs and happy diction of the whole. He died, A. D. 389. The beſt edition is that of the Benedictins, the firſt volume of which, in fol. was publiſhed at Paris, 1778. ——A biſhop of Nyſſa, author of the Nicene creed. His ſtile is repreſented as allegorical and affected; and he has been accuſed of mixing philoſophy too much with theology. His writings conſiſt of commentaries on ſcripture, moral diſcourſes, ſermons on myſteries, dogmatical treatiſes, panegyrics on ſaints; the beſt edition of which is that of Morell, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1615. The biſhop died, A. D. 396.—— Another Chriſtian writer, whoſe works were edited by the Benedictins, in 4 vols. fol. Paris, 1705.

Grinnes, a people among the Batavians. Tacit. Hiſt. 5, c. 20.

Gropus, a man diſtinguiſhed as much for his probity as his riches, to whom Horace addreſſed 2 Od. 16.

Grudii, a people tributary to the Nervii, ſuppoſed to have inhabited the country near Tournay or Bruges in Flanders. Cæſ. G. 5, c. 38.

Grumentum, now Armento, an inland town of Lucania on the river Aciris. Liv. 23, c. 37. l. 27, c. 41.

Gryllus, a ſon of Xenophon, who killed Epaminondas, and was himſelf ſlain, at the battle of Mantinea, B. C. 363. His father was offering a ſacrifice when he received the news of his death, and he threw down the garland which was on his head; but he replaced it, when he heard that the enemy's general had fallen by his hands; and he obſerved, that his death ought to be celebrated with every demonſtration of joy, rather than of lamentation. Ariſtot.—Pauſ. 8, c. 11, &c.——One of the companions of Ulyſſes, changed into a ſwine by Circe.

Grynēum & Grynium, a town near Clazomenæ, where Apollo had a temple with an oracle, on account of which he is called Grynæus. Strab. 13.—Virg. Ecl. 6, v. 72. Æn. 4, v. 345.

Grynēus, one of the Centaurs, who fought againſt the Lapithæ, &c. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 260.

Gyărus & Gyăros, an iſland in the Ægean ſea, near Delos. The Romans were wont to ſend their culprits there. Ovid. 7. Met. v. 407.

Gyas, one of the companions of Æneas, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the games exhibited after the death of Anchiſes in Sicily. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 118, &c.——A part of the territories of Syracuſe, in the poſſeſſion of Dionyſius.——A Rutulian, ſon of Melampus, killed by Æneas in Italy. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 318.

Gygæus,

GŸGÆUS, a lake of Lydia, 40 ſtadia from Sardis. Propert. 3, el. 11, v. 18.

GŸGE, a maid of Paryſatis.

GŸGES or GYES, a ſon of Cœlus and Terra, repreſented as having a hundred hands. He, with his brothers, made war againſt the gods, and was afterwards puniſhed in Tartarus. Ovid. Triſt. 4, el. 7, v. 18.——A Lydian, to whom Candaules, king of the country, ſhowed his wife naked. The queen was ſo incenſed at this inſtance of imprudence and infirmity in her huſband, that ſhe ordered Gyges, either to prepare for death himſelf, or to murder Candaules, He choſe the latter, and married the queen, and aſcended the vacant throne, about 718 years before the Chriſtian era. He was the firſt of the Mermnadæ, who reigned in Lydia. He reigned 38 years, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the immenſe preſents which he made to the oracle of Delphi. Herodot. 1, c. 8. According to Plato, Gyges deſcended into a chaſm of the earth, where he found a brazen horſe, whoſe ſides he opened, and ſaw within the body the carcaſe of a man of uncommon ſize, from whoſe finger he took a brazen ring. This ring, when put on his finger, rendered him inviſible; and by means of its virtue, he introduced himſelf to the queen, murdered her huſband and married her, and uſurped the crown of Lydia. Cic. offic. 3, 9.——A man killed by Turnus, in his wars with Æneas. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 762.——A beautiful boy of Cnidus, in the age of Horace. Horat. 2, Od. 5, v. 30.

GYLIPPUS, a Lacedæmonian, ſent B. C. 414, by his countrymen to aſſiſt Syracuſe, againſt the Athenians. He obtained a celebrated victory over Nicias and Demoſthenes, the enemy's generals, and obliged them to ſurrender. He accompanied Lyſander, in his expedition againſt Athens, and was preſent at the taking of that celebrated town. After the fall of Athens, he was intruſted by the conqueror with the money which had been taken in the plunder, which amounted to 1500 talents. As he conveyed it to Sparta, he had the meanneſs to unſew the bottom of the bags which contained it, and ſecreted about three hundred talents. His theft was diſcovered; and to avoid the puniſhment which he deſerved, he fled from his country, and by this act of meanneſs tarniſhed the glory of his victorious actions. Tibull. 4, el. 1, v. 199.—Plut. in Nicia.——An Arcadian in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 272.

GYMNĂSIA, a large city near Colchis. Diod. 14.

GYMNĂSIUM, a place among the Greeks, where all the public exerciſes were performed, and where not only wreſtlers and dancers exhibited, but alſo philoſophers, poets, and rhetoricians repeated their compoſitions. The room was high and ſpacious, and could contain many thouſands of ſpectators. The laborious exerciſes of the Gymnaſium were running, leaping, throwing the quoit, wreſtling, and boxing, which was called by the Greeks πενταθλον, and by the Romans quinquertia. In riding, the athlete led a horſe, on which he ſometimes was mounted, conducting another by the bridle, and jumping from the one upon the other. Whoever came firſt to the goal, and jumped with the greateſt agility, obtained the prize. In running a-foot the athletes were ſometimes armed, and he who came firſt was declared victorious. Leaping was an uſeful exerciſe: its primary object was to teach the ſoldiers to jump over ditches, and paſs over eminences during a ſiege, or in the field of battle. In throwing the quoit, the prize was adjudged to him who threw it fartheſt. The quoits were made either with wood, ſtone, or metal. The wreſtlers employed all their dexterity to bring their adverſary to the ground, and the boxers had their hands armed with gauntlets, called alſo ceſtus. Their blows were dangerous, and often ended in the death of one of the combatants. In wreſtling and boxing, the athletes were often naked, whence the word Gymnaſium, γυμνος, nudus. They anointed themſelves with oil to brace their limbs, and to render their bodies ſlippery, and more difficult to be graſped.

GYMNĒSIÆ, two iſlands near the Iberus in the Mediterranean, called Baleares by the Greeks. Plut. 5, c. 8.—Strab. 2.

GYMNETES, a people of Æthiopia, who lived almoſt naked. Plin. 5, c. 8.

GYMNIÆ, a town of Colchis. Xenoph. Arab. 4.

GYMNOSOPHISTÆ, a certain ſect of philoſophers in India, who, according to ſome, placed their ſummum bonum in pleaſure, and their ſummum malum in pain. They lived naked as their name implies, and for 37 years they expoſed themſelves in the open air, to the heat of the ſun, the inclemency of the ſeaſons, and the coldneſs of the night. They were often ſeen in the fields fixing their eyes full upon the diſc of the ſun from the time of its riſing till the hour of its ſetting. Sometimes they ſtood whole days upon one foot in burning ſand without moving, or ſhewing any concern for what ſurrounded them. Alexander was aſtoniſhed at the ſight of a ſect of men who ſeemed to deſpiſe bodily pain, and who inured themſelves to ſuffer the greateſt tortures without uttering a groan, or expreſſing any marks of fear. The conqueror condeſcended to viſit them, and his aſtoniſhment was encreaſed when he ſaw one one of them aſcend a burning pile with firmneſs and unconcern, to avoid the infirmities of old age, and ſtand upright on one leg and unmoved, while the flames ſurrounded him on every ſide. Vid. Calanus. The Brachmans were a branch of the ſect of the Gymnoſophiſtæ. Vid. Brachmanes. Strab. 15, &c.—Plin. 7, c. 2.—Cic. Tuſc. 5.—Lucan. 3.—Dion.

GYNÆCEAS, a woman ſaid to have been the wife of Faunus, and the mother of Bacchus and of Midas.

GYNÆCOTHŒNAS, a name of Mars at Tegea, on account of a ſacrifice offered by the women without the aſſiſtance of the men, who were not permitted to appear at this religious ceremony. Pauſ. 8, c. 48.

GYNDES, now Zeindeh, a river of Aſſyria, falling into the Tigris. When Cyrus marched againſt Babylon, his army was ſtopped by this river, in which one of his favorite horſes was drowned. This ſo irritated the monarch that he ordered the river to be conveyed into 360 different channels by his army, ſo that after this diviſion it hardly reached the knee. Herodot. 1, c. 189. & 202.

GYTHEUM, a ſea port town of Laconia, at the mouth of the Eurotas, in Peloponneſus, built by Hercules and Apollo, who had there deſiſted from their quarrels. The inhabitants were called Gytheatæ. Cic. offic. 3, c. 11.

HABIS, a king of Spain, who firſt taught his ſubjects agriculture, &c. Juſtin. 44, c. 4.

HARPĂLICE. Vid. Harpalyce.

HAR-

HARPĂLION, a Trojan killed by Merion. Homer. Il. 13.

HARPĂLUS, a man entruſted with the treaſures of Babylon by Alexander. His hopes that Alexander would periſh in his expedition, rendered him diſſipate, negligent, and vicious. When he heard, that the conqueror was returning with great reſentment he fled to Athens, where, with his money, he corrupted the orators, among whom was Demoſthenes, when brought to juſtice. He eſcaped with impunity to Crete, where he was at laſt aſſaſſinated by Thimbro, B.C. 325. Plut. in Phoc.—Diod. 17.——A robber who ſcorned the gods. Cic. 3, de Nat. D.——A celebrated aſtronomer of Greece, 480 years B. C.

HARPĂLŸCE, the daughter of Harpalycus, king of Thrace. Her mother died when ſhe was but a child, and her father fed her with the milk of cows and mares, and inured her early to ſuſtain the fatigues of hunting. When her father's kingdom was invaded by Neoptolemus, the ſon of Achilles, ſhe repelled and defeated the enemy with manly courage. The death of her father, which happened ſoon after in a ſedition, rendered her diſconſolate; ſhe fled the ſociety of mankind, and lived in the foreſts upon plunder and rapine. Every attempt to ſecure her proved fruitleſs, till her great ſwiftneſs was overcome by intercepting her with a net. After her death the people of the country diſputed their reſpective right to the poſſeſſions ſhe had acquired by rapines, and they ſoon after appeaſed her manes by proper oblations on her tomb. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 321.—Hygin. fab. 193 & 252.——A beautiful virgin, daughter of Clymenus and Epicaſte of Argos. Her father became enamoured of her, and gained her confidence, and enjoyed her company by means of her nurſe, who introduced him as a ſtranger. Some time after ſhe married Alaſtor, but the father's paſſion became more violent and incontroulable in his daughter's abſence, and he murdered her huſband to bring her back to Argos. Harpalyce, inconſolable for the death of her huſband, and aſhamed of her father's paſſion, which was then made public, reſolved to revenge her wrongs. She killed her younger brother, or according to ſome, the fruit of her inceſt, and ſerved it before her father. She begged the gods to remove her from the world, and ſhe was changed into an owl, and Clymenus killed himſelf. Hygin. fab. 253, &c.—Parthen. in Erot.——A miſtreſs of Iphiclus, ſon of Theſtius. She died through deſpair on ſeeing herſelf deſpiſed by her lover. This mournful ſtory was compoſed in poetry, in the form of a dialogue called Harpalyce. Athen. 14.

HARPĂLŸCUS, one of the companions of Æneas, killed by Camilla. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 675.——The father of Harpalyce, king of the Amymneans, in Thrace.

HARPĂSUS, a river of Caria. Liv. 38, c. 13.

HARPŎCRĂTES, a divinity ſuppoſed to be the ſame as Orus the ſon of Iſis, among the Egyptians. He is repreſented as holding one of his fingers on his mouth, and from thence he is called the god of ſilence, and intimates, that the myſteries of religion and philoſophy ought never to be revealed to the people. The Romans placed his ſtatues at the entrance of their temples.

HARPOCRATION, a platonic philoſopher of Argos, from whom Stobæus compiled his eclogues.——A ſophiſt called alſo Ælius.——Valerius, a rhetorician of Alexandria, author of a Lexicon on ten orators.——Another, ſirnamed Caius.

HARPYIÆ, winged monſters, who had the face of a woman, the body of a vulture, and had their feet and fingers armed with ſharp claws. They were three in number, Aello, Ocypete, and Celeno, daughters of Neptune and Terra. They were ſent by Juno to plunder the tables of Phineus, whence they were driven to the iſlands called Strophades by Zethes and Calais. They emitted an infectious ſmell, and ſpoiled whatever they touched by their filth and excrements. They plundered Æneas during his voyage towards Italy, and predicted many of the calamities which attended him. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 212. l. 6, v. 289.—Heſiod. Theog. 265.

HARUDES, a people of Germany. Cæſ. G. 1, c. 31.

HARUSPEX, a ſoothſayer at Rome, who drew omens by conſulting the entrails of beaſts that were ſacrificed. He received the name of Aruſpex, ab aris aſpiciendis and that of Extiſpex, ab extis inſpiciendis. The order of Aruſpices was firſt eſtabliſhed at Rome by Romulus, and the firſt Aruſpices were Tuſcans by origin, as they were particularly famous in that branch of divination. They had received all their knowledge from a boy named Tages, who, as was commonly reported, ſprung from a clod of earth. [Vid. Tages.] They were originally three, but the Roman ſenate yearly ſent ſix noble youths, or, according to others, twelve to Etruria, to be inſtructed in all the myſteries of the art. The office of the Haruſpices conſiſted in obſerving theſe four particulars; the beaſt before it was ſacrificed; its entrails; the flames which conſumed the ſacrifice; and the flour, frankincenſe, &c. which was uſed. If the beaſt was led up to the altar with difficulty, if it eſcaped from the conductor's hands, roared when it received the blow, or died in agonies, the omen was unfortunate. But, on the contrary, if it followed without compulsion, received the blow without resistance, and died without groaning, and after much effusion of blood, the haruspex foretold prosperity. When the body of the victim was opened, each part was scrupulously examined; if any thing was wanting, if it had a double liver, or a lean heart, the omen was unfortunate. If the entrails fell from the hands of the haruspex, or seemed besmeared with too much blood, or if no heart appeared, as for instance it happened in the two victims which J. Cæsar offered a little before his death, the omen was equally unlucky. When the flame was quickly kindled, and when it violently consumed the sacrifice, and arose pure and bright, and like a pyramid, without any paleness, smoke, sparkling, or crackling, the omen was favorable. But the contrary augury was drawn, when the fire was kindled with difficulty, and was extinguished before the sacrifice was totally consumed, or when it rolled in circles round the victim with intermediate spaces between the flames. In regard to the frankincense, meal, water, and wine, if there was any deficiency in the quantity, if the color was different, or the quality was changed, or if any thing was done with irregularity, it was deemed inauspicious. This custom of consulting the entrails of victims did not originate in Tuscany, but it was in use among the Chaldæans, Greeks, Egyptians, &c. and the more enlightened part of mankind well knew how to render it subservient to their wishes or tyranny. Agesilaus, when in Egypt, raised the drooping spirit of his soldiers by a superstitious artifice. He secretly wrote in his hand the word νικη victory, in large characters, and holding the entrails of a victim in his hand till the impression was communicated to the flesh, he shewed it to his soldiers, and animated them by observing, that the gods signified their approaching victories even by marking it in the body of the sacrificed animals. Cic. de Div.

HEBE, a daughter of Jupiter and Juno. According to some she was the daughter of Juno only, who conceived her after eating lettuces. As she was fair, and always in the bloom of youth, she was called the goddess of youth, and made by her mother cup-bearer to all the gods. She was dismissed from her office by Jupiter, because she fell down in an indecent posture as she was pouring nectar to the gods at a grand festival, and Ganymedes, the favorite of Jupiter, succeeded her as cup-bearer. She was employed by her mother to prepare her chariot, and to harness her peacocks whenever requisite. When Hercules was raised to the rank of a god, he was reconciled to Juno by marrying her daughter Hebe, by whom he had two sons, Alexiares and Anicetus. As Hebe had the power of restoring gods and men to the vigor of youth, she, at the instance of her husband, performed that kind office to Jolas his friend. Hebe was worshipped at Sicyon, under the name of Dia, and at Rome under the name of Juventas. She is represented as a young virgin crowned with flowers, and arrayed in a variegated garment. Paus. 1, c. 19. l. 2, c. 12.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 400.—Apollod. 1, c. 3. l. 2, c. 7.

HECĂTE, a daughter of Perſes and Aſteria, the ſame as Proſerpine, or Diana. She was called Luna in heaven, Diana on earth, and Hecate or Proſerpine in hell, whence her name of Diva triformis, tergemina, triceps. She was ſuppoſed to preſide over magic and enchantments, and was generally repreſented like a woman, with the head of a horſe, a dog, or a boar, and ſometimes ſhe appeared with three different bodies, and three different faces only with one neck. Dogs, lambs, and honey, were generally offered to her, eſpecially in high ways and croſs roads, whence ſhe obtained the name of Trivia.. Her power was extended over heaven, the earth, ſea, and hell, and to her kings and nations ſuppoſed themſelves indebted for their proſperity. Ovid. 7, Met. v. 94.—*Heſiod. HECATĒSIA, a yearly feſtival obſerved by the Stratonicenſians in honor of Hecate. The Athenians paid alſo particular worſhip to this goddeſs, who was deemed the patroneſs of families and of children. From this circumſtance the ſtatues of the goddeſs were erected before the doors of the houſes, and upon every new moon a public ſupper was always provided at the expence of the richeſt people, and ſet in the ſtreets, where the pooreſt of the citizens were permitted to retire and feaſt upon it, while they reported that Hecate had devoured it. There were alſo expiatory offerings to ſupplicate the goddeſs to remove whatever evils might impend on the head of the public, &c.

HECATOMBOIA, a feſtival celebrated in honor of Juno by the Argians and people of Ægina. It receives its name from ἑκατὸν, & βοῦς, a ſacrifice of a hundred bulls, which were always offered to the goddeſs, and the fleſh diſtributed among the pooreſt citizens. There were alſo public games firſt inſtituted by Archinus, a king of Argos, in which the prize was a ſhield of braſs with a crown of myrtle.

HECTOR, ſon of king Priam and Hecuba, was the moſt valiant of all the Trojan chiefs that fought againſt the Greeks. He married Andromache the daughter of Eetion, by whom he had Aſtyanax. He was appointed captain of all the Trojan forces, when Troy was beſieged by the Greeks; and the valor with which he behaved ſhowed how well qualified he was to diſcharge that important office. He engaged with the braveſt of the Greeks, and according to Hyginus, no leſs than 31 of the moſt valiant of the enemy periſhed by his hand. When Achilles had driven back the Trojans toward the city, Hector, too great to fly, waited the approach of his enemy near the Scean gates, though his father and mother, with tears in their eyes, blamed his raſhneſs and entreated him to retire. The ſight of Achilles terrified him, and he fled before him in the plain. The Greek purſued and Hector was killed, and his body was dragged in cruel triumph by the conqueror round the tomb of Patroclus whom Hector had killed. The body, after it had received the groſſeſt inſult, was ranſomed by old Priam, and the Trojans obtained from the Greeks a truce of ſome days to pay the laſt offices to the greateſt of their leaders. The Thebans boaſted in the age of the geographer Pauſanias that they had the aſhes of Hector preſerved in an urn, by order of an oracle; which promiſed them undiſturbed felicity if they were in poſſeſſion of that hero's remains. The epithet of Hectoreus is applied by the poets to the Trojans, as beſt expreſſive of valor and intrepidity. Homer. Il. 1, &c.—Virg. Æn. 1, &c.—Ovid. Met. 12 & 13.—*Dictys. HECŬBA, daughter of Dymas a Phrygian prince, or according to others, of Ciſſeis, a Thracian king, was the ſecond wife of Priam king of Troy, and proved the chaſteſt of women, and the moſt tender and unfortunate of mothers. When ſhe was pregnant of Paris, ſhe dreamed that ſhe had brought into the world a burning torch which had reduced her huſband's palace and all Troy to aſhes. So alarming a dream was explained by the ſoothſayers, who declared that the ſon ſhe ſhould bring into the world would prove the ruin of his country. When Paris was born ſhe expoſed him on mount Ida to avert the calamities which threatened her family; but her attempts to deſtroy him were fruitleſs, and the prediction of the ſoothſayers was fulfilled. [Vid. Paris.] During the Trojan war ſhe ſaw the greateſt part of her children periſh by the hands of the enemy, and like a mother ſhe confeſſed her grief by her tears and lamentations, particularly at the death of Hector her eldeſt ſon. When Troy was taken, Hecuba, as one of the captives, fell to the lot of Ulyſſes, a man whom ſhe hated for his perfidy and avarice, and ſhe embarked with the conquerors for Greece. The Greeks landed in the Thracian Cherſoneſus to load with freſh honors the grave of Achilles. During their ſtay the hero's ghoſt appeared to them, and demanded, to enſure the ſafety of their return, the ſacrifice of Polyxena, Hecuba's daughter. They complied, and Polyxena was torn from her mother to be ſacrificed. Hecuba was inconſolable, and her grief was ſtill more encreaſed at the ſight of the body of her ſon Polydorus waſhed on the ſhore, who had been recommended by his father to the care and humanity of Polymneſtor king of the country. [Vid. Polydorus.] She determined to revenge the death of her ſon, and with the greateſt indignation went to the houſe of his murderer and tore his eyes, and attempted to deprive him of his life. She was hindered from executing her bloody purpoſe, by the arrival of ſome Thracians, and ſhe fled with the female companions of her captivity. She was purſued, and when ſhe ran after the ſtones that were thrown at her ſhe found herſelf ſuddenly changed into a bitch, and when ſhe attempted to ſpeak, found that ſhe could only bark. After this metamorphoſis ſhe threw herſelf into the ſea, according to Hyginus, and that place was, from that circumſtance, called Cyneum. Hecuba had a great number of children by Priam, among whom were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Pammon, Helenus, Polites, Antiphon, Hipponous, Polydorus, Troilus, and among the daughters, Creuſa, Ilione, Laodice, Polyxena, and Caſſandra. *Ovid. The Thaſians were awakened, the law was abrogated, and Hegetorides pardoned, &c. Polyæn. 2.

Hĕlĕna, the moſt beautiful woman of her age, ſprung from one of the eggs which Leda, the wife of king Tyndarus, brought forth after her amour with Jupiter metamorphoſed into a ſwan. [Vid. Leda.] According to ſome authors, Helen was daughter of Nemeſis by Jupiter, and Leda was only her nurſe; and to reconcile this variety of opinions ſome imagine that Nemeſis and

Leda

Leda are the ſame perſons. Her beauty was ſo univerſally admired even in her infancy, that Theſeus, with his friend Pirithous, carried her away before ſhe had attained her 10th year, and concealed her at Aphidnæ, under the care of his mother Æthra. Her brothers, Caſtor and Pollux, recovered her by force of arms, and ſhe returned ſafe and unpolluted to Sparta, her native country. There exiſted, however, a tradition recorded by Pauſanias, that Helen was of nubile years when carried away by Theſeus, and that ſhe had a daughter by her raviſher, who was entruſted to the care of Clytemneſtra. This violence offered to her virtue did not in the leaſt diminiſh, but rather augmented her fame, and her hand was eagerly ſolicited by the young princes of Greece. The moſt celebrated of her ſuitors were Ulyſſes, ſon of Laertes, Antilochus ſon of Neſtor, Sthenelus ſon of Capaneus, Diomedes ſon of Tydeus, Amphilochus ſon of Cteatus, Meges ſon of Phileus, Agapenor ſon of Ancæus, Thalpius ſon of Eurytus, Mneſtheus ſon of Peteus, Schedius ſon of Epiſtrophus, Polyxenus ſon of Agaſthenes, Amphilochus ſon of Amphiaraus, Aſcalaphus and Ialmus ſons of the god Mars, Ajax ſon of Oileus, Eumelus ſon of Admetus, Polypœtes ſon of Pirithous, Elphenor ſon of Chalcodon, Podalyrus and Machaon ſons of Æſculapius, Leonteus ſon of Coronus, Philoctetes ſon of Pæan, Proteſilaus ſon of Iphiclus, Eurypilus ſon of Evemon, Ajax and Teucer ſons of Telamon, Patroclus ſon of Menœtius, Menelaus ſon of Atreus, Thoas, Idomeneus, and Merion. Tyndarus was rather alarmed than pleaſed at the ſight of ſuch a number of illuſtrious princes who eagerly ſolicited each to become his ſon-in-law. He knew that he could not prefer one without diſpleaſing all the reſt, and from this perplexity he was at laſt drawn by the artifice of Ulyſſes, who began to be already known in Greece by his prudence and ſagacity. This prince, who clearly ſaw that his pretenſions to Helen would not probably meet with ſucceſs in oppoſition to ſo many rivals, propoſed to extricate Tyndarus from all his difficulties if he would promiſe him his niece Penelope in marriage. Tyndarus conſented, and Ulyſſes adviſed the king to bind, by a ſolemn oath, all the ſuitors that they would approve of the uninfluenced choice which Helen ſhould make of one among them; and engage to unite together to defend her perſon and character if ever any attempts were made to raviſh her from the arms of her huſband. The advice of Ulyſſes was followed, the princes conſented, and Helen fixed her choice upon Menelaus and married him. Hermione was the early fruit of this union, which continued for three years with mutual happineſs. After this, Paris, ſon of Priam king of Troy, came to Lacedæmon on pretence of ſacrificing to Apollo. He was kindly received by Menelaus, but ſhamefully abuſed his favors, and in his abſence in Crete he corrupted the fidelity of his wife Helen, and perſuaded her to follow him to Troy B. C. 1198. At his return Menelaus, highly ſenſible of the injury he had received, aſſembled the Grecian princes, and reminded them of their ſolemn promiſes. They reſolved to make war againſt the Trojans; but they previouſly ſent ambaſſadors to Priam to demand the reſtitution of Helen. The influence of Paris at his father's court prevented the reſtoration, and the Greeks returned home without receiving the ſatisfaction they required. Soon after their return their combined forces aſſembled and ſailed for the coaſt of Aſia. The behaviour of Helen during the Trojan war is not clearly known. Some aſſert that ſhe had willingly followed Paris, and that ſhe warmly ſupported the cauſe of the Trojans; while others believe that ſhe always ſighed after her huſband, and curſed the day in which ſhe had proved faithleſs to his bed. Homer repreſents her as in the laſt inſtance, and ſome have added that ſhe often betrayed the ſchemes and reſolutions of the Trojans, and ſecretly favored the cauſe of Greece. When Paris was killed in the ninth year of the war, ſhe voluntarily married Deiphobus, one of Priam's ſons, and when Troy was taken ſhe made no ſcruple to betray him, and to introduce the Greeks into his chamber, to ingratiate herſelf with Menelaus. She returned to Sparta, and the love of Menelaus forgave the errors which ſhe had committed. Some however ſay that ſhe obtained her life even with difficulty from her huſband, whoſe reſentment ſhe had kindled by her infidelity. After ſhe had lived for ſome years at Sparta, Menelaus died, and ſhe was driven from Peloponneſus by Megapenthes and Nicoſtratus, the illegitimate ſons of her huſband, and ſhe retired to Rhodes, where at that time Polyxo, a native of Argos, reigned over the country. Polyxo remembered that her widowhood originated in Helen, and that her huſband Tlepolemus had been killed in the Trojan war, which had been cauſed by the debaucheries of Helen, therefore ſhe meditated revenge. While Helen one day retired to bathe in the river, Polyxo diſguiſed her attendants in the habits of furies and ſent them with orders to murder her enemy. Helen was tied to a tree and ſtrangled, and her misfortunes were afterwards remembered, and the crimes of Polyxo expiated by the temple which the Rhodians raiſed to Helen Dendritis, or tied to a tree. There is a tradition mentioned by Herodotus, which ſays that Paris was driven, as he returned from Sparta, upon the coaſt of Egypt, where Proteus, king of the country, expelled him from his dominions for his ingratitude to Menelaus, and confined Helen. From that circumſtance, therefore, Priam informed the Grecian ambaſſadors that neither Helen nor her poſſeſſions were in Troy, but in the hands of the king of Egypt. In ſpite of this aſſertion the Greeks beſieged the town and took it after ten years ſiege, and Menelaus by viſiting Egypt, as he returned home, recovered Helen at the court of Proteus, and was convinced that the Trojan war had been undertaken upon very unjuſt and unpardonable grounds. Helen was honored after death as a goddeſs, and the Spartans built her a temple at Therapne, which had power of giving beauty to all the deformed women that entered it. Helen, according to ſome, was carried into the iſland of Leuce after death, where ſhe married Achilles, who had been once one of her warmeſt admirers.—The age of Helen has been a matter of deep enquiry among the chronologiſts. If ſhe was born of the ſame eggs as Caſtor and Pollux, who accompanied the Argonauts in their expedition againſt Colchis about 35 years before the Trojan war, according to ſome, ſhe was no leſs than 60 years old when Troy was reduced to aſhes, ſuppoſing that her brothers were only 15 when they embarked with the Argonauts. But ſhe is repreſented by Homer ſo incomparably beautiful during the ſiege of Troy, that though ſeen at a diſtance ſhe influenced the counſellors of Priam by the brightneſs of her charms; therefore we muſt ſuppoſe with others, that her beauty remained long undiminiſhed, and was extinguiſhed only at her death. Pauſ. 3, c. 19, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 10, &c.—Hygin. fab. 77.—Herodot. 2, c. 112.—Plut. in Theſ. &c.—Cic. de offic. 3.—Horat. 3, od. 3.—Dictys Cret. 1, &c.—*Quint. HĔLĒNOR, a Lydian prince who accompanied Æneas to Italy, and was killed by the Rutulians. His mother's name was Licymnia. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 444, &c.

HĔLĔNUS, a celebrated ſoothſayer, ſon of Priam and Hecuba, greatly reſpected by all the Trojans. When Deiphobus was given in marriage to Helen in preference to himſelf, he reſolved to leave his country, and retired to mount Ida, where Ulyſſes took him priſoner by the advice of Chalcas. As he was well acquainted with futurity, the Greeks made uſe of prayers, threats, and promiſes, to induce him to reveal the ſecrets of the Trojans, and either the fear of death or gratification of reſentment ſeduced him to diſcloſe to the enemies of his country, that Troy could not be taken whilſt it was in poſſeſſion of the Palladium, nor before Polydectes came from his retreat at Lemnos, and aſſiſted to ſupport the ſiege. After the ruin of his country, he fell to the ſhare of Pyrrhus the ſon of Achilles, and ſaved his life by warning him to avoid a dangerous tempeſt which in reality proved fatal to all thoſe who ſet ſail. This endeared him to Pyrrhus, and he received from his hand Andromache the widow of his brother Hector, by whom he had a ſon called Ceſtrinus. This marriage, according to ſome, was conſummated after the death of Pyrrhus, who lived with Andromache as his wife. Helenus was the only one of Priam's ſons who ſurvived the ruin of his country. After the death of Pyrrhus, he reigned over part of Epirus, which he called Chaonia in memory of his brother Chaon, whom he had inadvertently killed. Helenus received Æneas as he voyaged towards Italy, and foretold him ſome of the calamities which attended his fleet. The manner in which he received the gift of prophecy is doubtful. Vid. Caſſandra. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 295, &c. Pauſ. 1, c. 11. l. 2, c. 33.—*Ovid. HELIOGABĀLUS, a deity among the Phœnicians.——M. Aurelius Antoninus, a Roman emperor, son of Varius Marcellus, called Heliogabalus, because he had been priest of that divinity in Phœnicia. After the death of Macrinus, he was invested with the imperial purple, and the senate, however unwilling to submit to a youth only 14 years of age, approved of his election, and bestowed upon him the title of Augustus. Heliogabalus made his grand-mother Mœsa, and his mother Sœmias, his colleagues on the throne; and to bestow more dignity upon the sex, he chose a senate of women, over which his mother presided, and prescribed all the modes and fashions which prevailed in the empire. Rome however soon displayed a scene of cruelty and debauchery, the imperial palace was full of prostitution, and the most infamous of the populace became the favorites of the prince. He raised his horse to the honors of the consulship, and obliged his subjects to pay adoration to the god Heliogabalus, which was no other than a large black stone, whose figure resembled that of a cone. To this ridiculous deity temples were raised at Rome, and the altars of the gods plundered to deck those of the new divinity. In the midst of his extravagances Heliogabulus married four wives, and not satisfied with following the plain laws of nature, he professed himself to be a woman, and gave himself up to one of his officers, called Hierocles. In this ridiculous farce he suffered the greatest indignities from his pretended husband without dissatisfaction, and Hierocles by stooping to infamy became the most powerful of the favorites, and enriched himself by selling favors, and offices to the people. Such licentiousness soon displeased the populace, and Heliogabalus, unable to appease the seditions of the soldiers, whom his rapacity and debaucheries had irritated, hid himself in the filth and excrements of the camp, where he was found in the arms of his mother. His head was severed from his body the 10th of March, A. D. 222, in the 18th year of his age, after a reign of three years nine months and four days. He was succeeded by Alexander Severus. His cruelties were as conspicuous as his licentiousness. He burthened his subjects with the most oppressive taxes, his halls were covered with carpets of gold and silver tissue, and his mats were made with the down of hares, and with the soft feathers which were found under the wings or partridges. He was fond of covering his shoes with precious stones to draw the admiration of the people as he walked along the streets, and he was the first Roman who ever wore a dress of silk. He often invited the most common of the people to share his banquets, and made them sit down on large bellows full of wind, which, by suddenly emptying themselves, threw the guests on the ground, and left them a prey to wild beaſts. He often tied ſome of his favorites on a large wheel, and was particularly delighted to ſee them whirled round like Ixions, and ſometimes ſuſpended in the air, or ſunk beneath the water.

Heliŏpŏlis, now Matarea, a famous city of Lower Egypt, in which was a temple ſacred to the ſun. The inhabitants worſhipped a bull called Mnevis, with the ſame ceremonies as the Apis of Memphis. Apollo had an oracle there. Cic. N. D. 3, c. 21.—Plin. 36, c. 26.—Strab. 17.—Diod. 1. There was a ſmall village of the ſame name without the Delta near Babylon.——A town of Syria, now Balbeck. Plin. 5, c. 22.

Helisson, a town and river of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 29.

Helium, a name given to the mouth of the Maeſe in Germany. Plin. 4, c. 15.

Helius, a celebrated favorite of the emperor Nero, put to death by order of Galba, for his cruelties.——The Greek name of the ſun or Apollo.

Helixus, a river of Cos.

Hellanĭce, a ſiſter of Clitus, who was nurſe to Alexander. Curt. 8, c. 1.

Hellanĭcus, a celebrated Greek hiſtorian, born at Mitylene. He wrote an hiſtory of the ancient kings of the earth, with an account of the founders of the moſt famous towns in every kingdom, and died B. C. 411. in the 85th year of his age. Pauſ. 2, c. 3.——A brave officer rewarded by Alexander. Curt. 5, c. 2.——An hiſtorian of Miletus, who wrote a deſcription of the earth.

Hellanocrătes, a man of Lariſſa, &c. Ariſtot. Polit. 5, c. 10.

Hellas, an ancient name of Theſſaly, more generally applied to the territories of Acarnania, Attica, Ætolia, Doris, Locris, Bœotia, and Phocis, and alſo to all Greece. It received this name from Deucalion, and now forms a part of Livadia. Plin. 4, c. 7.—Strab. 8.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Pauſ 2, c. 20.——A beautiful woman, mentioned by Horace as beloved of Marius; the lover killed her in a fit of paſſion, and afterwards deſtroyed himſelf. Horat. 2, ſat. 3, v. 277.

Helle, a daughter of Athamas and Nephele, ſiſter to Phryxus. She fled from her father's houſe with her brother, to avoid the cruel oppreſſion of her mother-in-law, Ino. According to ſome accounts ſhe was carried through the air on a golden ram which her mother had received from Neptune, and in her paſſage ſhe became giddy and fell from her ſeat into that part of the ſea which from her received the name of Helleſpont. Others ſay that ſhe was carried on a cloud, or rather upon a ſhip, from which ſhe fell into the ſea and was drowned. Phryxus, after he had given his ſiſter a burial on the neighbouring coaſts, purſued his journey and arrived ſafe in Colchis. [Vid. Phryxus.] Ovid. Heroid. 13, &c.

Hellen, ſon of Deucalion and Pyrrha, reigned in Phthiotis about 1495 years before the Chriſtian era, and gave the name of Hellenians to his ſubjects. He had, by his wife Orſeis, three ſons; Æolus, Dorus, and Xuthus, who gave their names to the three different nations known under the name of Æolians, Dorians, and Ionians. Theſe laſt derive their name from Ion, ſon of Xuthus, and from the difference either of expreſſion, or pronunciation in their reſpective languages, aroſe the different dialects well known in the Greek language. Pauſ. 3, c. 20. l. 7, c. 1.—Diod. 5.

Hellēnes, the inhabitants of Greece. Vid. Hellen.

Hellespontias, a wind blowing from the north-eaſt. Plin. 2, c. 47.

Hellespontus, now the Dardanelles, a narrow ſtrait between Aſia and Europe, near the Propontis, which received its name from Helle who was drowned there in her voyage to Colchis. [Vid. Helle.] It is about 60 miles long, and, in the broadeſt parts, the Aſiatic coaſt is about three miles diſtant from the European, and only half a mile in the narroweſt, according to modern inveſtigation; ſo that people can converſe one with the other from the oppoſite ſhores. It is celebrated for the love and death of Leander, [Vid. Hero.] and for the bridge of boats which Xerxes built over it when he invaded Greece. The folly of this great prince is well known in beating and fettering the waves of the ſea, whoſe impetuoſity deſtroyed his ſhips, and rendered all his labors ineffectual. Strab. 13.—Plin. 8, c. 32.—Herodot. 7, c. 34.—Polyb. —Mela. 1, c. 1.—Ptol. 5, c. 2.—*Ovid. Hellopia, a ſmall country of Eubœa. The people were called Hellopes. The whole iſland bore the ſame name, according to Strabo 10. Plin. 4, c. 12.

Hellōtia, two feſtivals, one of which was obſerved in Crete, in honor of Europa, whoſe bones were then carried in ſolemn proceſſion with a myrtle garland no leſs than twenty cubits in circumference, called ἑλλωτις. The other feſtival was celebrated at Corinth with games and races, where young men entered the liſts and generally ran with burning torches in their hands. It was inſtituted in honor of Minerva, ſirnamed Elotis, απο του ἑλους, from a certain pond of Marathon, where one of her ſtatues was erected or απο του ελειν τον ιππον τον Πεγασον, Πηγασον, becauſe by her aſſiſtance Bellerophon took and managed the horſe Pegaſus, which was the original cauſe of the inſtitution of the feſtival. Others derive the name from Hellotis, a Corinthian woman, from the following circumſtance: when the Dorians and the Heraclidæ invaded Peloponneſus, they took and burnt Corinth; the inhabitants, and particularly the women, eſcaped by flight, except Hellotis and her ſiſter Eurytione, who took ſhelter in Minerva's temple, relying for ſafety upon the ſanctity of the place. When this was known, the Dorians ſet fire to the temple, and the two ſiſters periſhed in the flames. This wanton cruelty was followed by a dreadful plague, and the Dorians, to alleviate the misfortunes which they ſuffered, were directed by the oracle to appeaſe the manes of the two ſiſters, and therefore they raiſed a new temple to the goddeſs Minerva, and eſtabliſhed the feſtivals, which bore the name of one of the unfortunate women.

Helnes, an ancient king of Arcadia, &c. Polyæn. 1.

Helŏris, a general of the people of Rhegium, ſent to beſiege Meſſana, which Dionyſius the tyrant defended. He fell in battle and his troops were defeated. Diod. 14.

Helōrum & Helōrus, now Muri Ucci, a town and river of Sicily, whoſe ſwollen waters generally inundate the neighbouring country. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 698.—Ital. 11, v. 270.——A river of Magna Græcia.

Helos, a place of Arcadia. Pauſ. 8, c. 36.——A town of Laconia taken and deſtroyed by the Lacedæmonians, under Agis the third, of the race of the Heraclidæ, becauſe they refuſed to pay the tribute which was impoſed upon them. The Lacedæmonians carried their reſentment ſo far, that, not ſatisfied with the ruin of the city, they reduced the inhabitants to the loweſt and moſt miſerable ſlavery, and made a law which forbade their maſters either to give them their liberty, or to ſell them in any other country. To complete their infamy, all the ſlaves of the ſtate and the priſoners of war were called by the mean appellation of Helotæ. Not only the ſervile offices in which they were employed denoted their miſery and ſlavery, but they were obliged to wear peculiar garments, which expoſed them to greater contempt and ridicule. They never were inſtructed in the liberal arts, and their cruel maſters often obliged them to drink to exceſs, to ſhow the free-born citizens of Sparta the beaſtlineſs and diſgrace of intoxication. They once every year received a number of ſtripes, that by this wanton flagellation they might recollect that they were born and died ſlaves. The Spartans even declared war againſt them; but Plutarch, who, from intereſted motives endeavours to palliate the guilt and cruelty of the people of Lacedæmon, declares that it was becauſe they had aſſiſted the Meſſenians in their war againſt Sparta, after it had been overthrown by a violent earthquake. This earthquake was ſuppoſed by all the Greeks to be a puniſhment from heaven for the cruelties which the Lacedæmonians had exerciſed againſt the Helots. In the Peloponneſian war, theſe miſerable ſlaves behaved with uncommon bravery, and were rewarded with their liberty by the Lacedæmonians, and appeared in the temples, and at public ſhows crowned with garlands, and with every mark of feſtivity and triumph. This exultation did not continue long, and the ſudden diſappearance of the two thouſand manumitted ſlaves was attributed to the inhumanity of the Lacedæmonians. Thucyd. 4.—Pollux. 3, c. 8.—Strab. 8.—Plut. in Lyc. &c.—*Ariſtot. Hemathion, a ſon of Aurora and Cephalus.

Hemĭthea, a daughter of Cycnus and Proclea. She was ſo attached to her brother Tenes, that ſhe refuſed to abandon him when his father Cycnus expoſed him on the ſea. They were carried by the wind to Tenedos, where Hemithea long enjoyed tranquillity till Achilles, captivated by her charms, offered her violence. She was reſcued from his embrace by her brother Tenes, who was inſtantly ſlaughtered by the offended hero. Hemithea could not have been reſcued from the attempts of Achilles,

HEPHÆSTIA, the capital town of Lemnos.——A feſtival in honor of Vulcan (Ηφαιϛος) at Athens. There was then a race with torches between three young men. Each in his turn ran a race with a lighted torch in his hand, and who ever could carry it to the end of the courſe before it was extinguiſhed, obtained the prize. They delivered it one to the other after they finiſhed their courſe, and from that circumſtance we ſee many alluſions in ancient authors who compare the viciſſitudes of human affairs to this delivering of the torch, particularly in theſe lines of Lucretius 2:

Inque brevi ſpatio mutantur ſæcla animantum,
Et quaſi curſores vitai lampada tradunt.

HEPHÆSTIADES, a name applied to the Lipari iſles as ſacred to Vulcan.

HEPHÆSTII, mountains in Lycia which are ſet on fire by the lighteſt touch of a burning torch. Their very ſtones burn in the middle of water according to Pliny, 6, c. 106.

HEPHÆSTIO, a Greek grammarian of Alexandria in the age of the emperor Verus. There remains of his compoſitions a treatiſe entitled Enchiridion de metris & poemate, the beſt edition of which is that of Pauw, 4to. Ultraj. 1726.

HEPHÆSTION, a Macedonian famous for his intimacy with Alexander. He accompanied the conqueror in his Aſiatic conqueſts, and was ſo faithful and attached to him, that Alexander often obſerved that Craterus was the friend of the king, but Hephæſtion the friend of Alexander. He died at Ecbatana 325 years before the Chriſtian era, according to ſome from exceſs of drinking, or eating. Alexander was ſo inconſolable at the death of this faithful ſubject, that he ſhed tears at the intelligence, and ordered the ſacred fire to be extinguiſhed, which was never done but at the death of a Perſian monarch. The phyſician who attended Hephæſtion in his illneſs, was accuſed of negligence, and by the king's order inhumanly put to death, and the games were interrupted. His body was entruſted to the care of Perdiccas, and honored with the moſt magnificent funeral at Babylon. He was ſo like the king in features and ſtature, that he was often ſaluted by the name of Alexander. Curt.—Arrian. 7. &c.—Plut. in Alex.—Ælian. V. H. 7, c. 8.

HEPTAPHŌNOS, a portico, which received this name, becauſe the voice was re-echoed ſeven times in it. Plin. 36, c. 15.

HEPTAPŎLIS, a country of Egypt, which contained ſeven cities.

HEPTAPŸLOS, a ſirname of Thebes in Bœotia, from its ſeven gates.

HERA, the name of Juno among the Greeks.——A daughter of Neptune and Ceres when transformed into a mare.——A town of Æolia and of Arcadia. Pauſ. 6, c. 7.——A town of Sicily, called alſo Hybla. Cic. ad Attic. 2, c. 1.

HERĂCLĒA, an antient town of Sicily, near Agrigentum. Minos planted a colony there when he purſued Dædalus; and the town antiently known by the name of Macara, was called from him Minoa. It was called Heraclea after Hercules, when he obtained a victory over Eryx.—— A town of Macedonia.——Another in Pontus, celebrated for its naval power, and its conſequence among the Aſiatic ſtates. The inhabitants conveyed home in their ſhips the 10,000 at their return.——Another in Crete. ——Another in Parthia.——Another in Bithynia.——Another in Phthiotis, near Thermopylæ, called alſo Trachinea, to diſtinguiſh it from others.——Another in Lucania. Cic. Arch. 4.——Another in Syria. ——Another in Cherſoneſus Taurica.—— Another in Thrace, and three in Egypt, &c. There were no leſs than 40 cities of that name in different parts of the world, all built in honor of Hercules, whence the name is derived.——A daughter of Hiero, tyrant of Sicily, &c.

HERACLĒIA, a feſtival at Athens celebrated every fifth year, in honor of Hercules. The Thiſbians and Thebans in Bœotia, obſerved a feſtival of the ſame name, in which they offered apples to the god. This cuſtom of offering apples aroſe from this: It was always uſual to offer ſheep, but the overflowing of the river Aſopus prevented the votaries of the god from obſerving it with the antient ceremony; and as the word μηλον ſignifies both an apple, and a ſheep, ſome youths, acquainted with the ambiguity, of the word, offered apples to the god, with much ſport and feſtivity. To repreſent the ſheep, they raiſed an apple upon four ſticks as the legs, and two more were placed at the top to repreſent the horns of the victim. Hercules was delighted with the ingenuity of the youths, and the feſtivals were ever continued with the offering of apples. Pollux. 8, c. 9. There was alſo a feſtival at Sicyon in honor of Hercules. It continued two days, the firſt was called ονοματαϛ, the ſecond ἡρακλεια.——At a feſtival of the ſame name at Cos, the prieſt officiated with a mitre on his head, and in women's apparel.——At Lindus a ſolemnity of the ſame name was alſo obſerved, and at the celebration nothing was heard but execrations and profane words, and whoſoever accidently dropped any other words, was accuſed of having profaned the ſacred rites.

HERACLEUM, a promontory of Cappadocia.——A town of Egypt near Canopus on the weſtern mouth of the Nile, to which it gave its name. Diod. 1.—Tacit. A. 2, c. 60.—Strab. 2 & 17.——The port town of Gnoſſus in Crete.

HERACLEŌTES, a ſirname of Dionyſius the philoſopher.——A philoſopher of Heraclea, who, like his maſter Zeno, and all the Stoics, firmly believed that pain was not an evil. A ſevere illneſs, attended with the moſt acute pains, obliged him to renounce his principles, and at the ſame time the philoſophy of the ſtoics, about 264 years before the Chriſtian era. He became afterwards one of the Cyrenaic ſect, which placed the ſummum bonum in pleaſure. He wrote ſome poetry, and chiefly treatiſes of philoſophy. Diog. in vit.

HERACLĪDÆ, the deſcendants of Hercules, greatly celebrated in ancient hiſtory. Hercules at his death left to his ſon Hyllus all the rights and claims which he had upon the Peloponneſus, and permitted him to marry Iole, as ſoon as he came of age. The poſterity of Hercules were not more kindly treated by Euryſtheus, than their father had been, and they were obliged to retire for protection to the court of Ceyx, king of Trachinia. Euryſtheus purſued them thither; and Ceyx, afraid of his reſentment, begged the Heraclidæ to depart from his dominions. From Trachinia they came to Athens, where Theſeus, the king of the country, who had accompanied their father in ſome of his expeditions, received them with great humanity, and aſſiſted them againſt their common enemy, Euryſtheus. Euryſtheus was killed by the hand of Hyllus himſelf, and his children periſhed with him, and all the cities of the Peloponneſus became the undiſputed property of the Heraclidæ. Their triumph, however, was ſhort, their numbers were leſſened by a peſtilence, and the oracle informed them that they had taken poſſeſſion of the Peloponneſus before the gods permitted their return. Upon this they abandoned Peloponneſus, and came to ſettle in the territories of the Athenians, where Hyllus, obedient to his father's commands, married Iole the daughter of Eurytus. Soon after he conſulted the oracle, anxious to recover the Peloponneſus, and the ambiguity of the anſwer determined him to make a ſecond attempt. He challenged to ſingle combat Atreus, the ſucceſſor of Euryſtheus on the throne of Mycenæ, and it was mutually agreed that the undiſturbed poſſeſſion of the Peloponneſus ſhould be ceded to whoſoever defeated his adverſary. Echemus accepted the challenge for Atreus, and Hyllus was killed, and the Heraclidæ a ſecond time departed from Peloponneſus. Cleodæus the ſon of Hyllus, made a third attempt, and was equally unſucceſsful, and his ſon Ariſtomachus ſome time after met with the ſame unfavorable reception and periſhed in the field of battle. Ariſtodemus, Temenus, and Chreſphontes, the three ſons of Ariſtomachus, encouraged by the more expreſſive and leſs ambiguous word of an oracle, and deſirous to revenge the death of their progenitors, aſſembled a numerous force, and with a fleet invaded all Peloponneſus. Their expedition was attended with ſucceſs, and after ſome deciſive battles they became maſters of all the peninſula, which they divided among themſelves two years after. The recovery of the Peloponneſus by the deſcendants of Hercules forms an intereſting epoch in antient hiſtory, which is univerſally believed to have happened 80 years after the Trojan war, or 1104 years before the Chriſtian era. This conqueſt was totally atchieved about 120 years after the firſt attempt of Hyllus. Apollod. 2, c. 7, &c.—Herodot. 9, c. 26.—Pauſ. 1, c. 17.—Paterc. 1, c. 2.—*Clemens Alex. HERĂCLĪDES, a philoſopher of Heraclea in Pontus, for ſome time diſciple of Seuſippus and Ariſtotle. He wiſhed it to be believed that he was carried into heaven the very day of his death, and the more firmly to render it credible, he begged one of his friends to put a ſerpent in his bed. The ſerpent diſappointed him, and the noiſe which the number of viſitors occaſioned frightened him from the bed, before the philoſopher had expired. He lived about 335 years before the Chriſtian era. Cic. Tuſc. 5, ad Quint. 3.—Diog.——An hiſtorian of Pontus ſirnamed Lembus, who floriſhed B. C. 177.——A man who, after the retreat of Dionyſius the Younger from Sicily, raiſed cabals againſt Dion, in whoſe hands the ſovereign power was lodged. He was put to death by Dion's order. C. Nep. in Dion.——A youth of Syracuſe in the battle in which which Nicias was defeated.——A ſon of Agathocles.——A man placed over a garriſon at Athens by Demetrius.——A ſophiſt of Lycia, who opened a ſchool at Smyrna in the age of the emperor Severus.——A painter of Macedonia, in the reign of king Perſeus.——An architect of Tarentum, intimate with Philip king of Macedonia. He fled to Rhodes on pretence of a quarrel with Philip, and ſet fire to the Rhodian fleet. Polyæn. 5.——A man of Alexandria.

HERACLĪTUS, a celebrated Greek philoſopher of Epheſus, who floriſhed about 500 years before the Chriſtian æra. His father's name was Hyſon, or Heracion. Naturally of a melancholy diſpoſition, he paſſed his time in a ſolitary and unſocial manner, and received the appellation of the obſcure philoſopher, and the mourner, from his unconquerable cuſtom of weeping at the follies, frailty, and viciſſitude of human affairs. He employed his time in writing different treatiſes, and one particularly, in which he ſupported that there was a fatal neceſſity, and that the world was created from fire, which he deemed a god omnipotent and omniſcient. His opinions about the origin of things were adopted by the Stoics, and Hippocrates entertained the ſame notions of a ſupreme power. Heraclitus deſerves the appellation of man hater for the ruſticity with which he anſwered the polite invitations of Darius king of Perſia. To remove himſelf totally from the ſociety of mankind, he retired to the mountains where for ſome time he fed on graſs in common with the wild inhabitants of the place. Such a diet was ſoon productive of a dropſical complaint, and the philoſopher condeſcended to reviſit the town. The enigmatical manner in which he conſulted the phyſicians made his applications unintelligible, and he was left to depend for cure only upon himſelf. He fixed his reſidence in a dunghill, in hopes that the continual warmth which proceeded from it might diſſipate the watery accumulation and reſtore him to the enjoyment of his former health. Such a remedy proved ineffectual, and the philoſopher deſpairing of a cure by the application of ox dung, ſuffered himſelf to die in the 60th year of his age. Some ſay that he was torn to pieces by dogs. Diog. in vitâ.——A Lyric poet.——A writer of Halicarnaſſus, intimate with Callimachus. He was remarkable for the elegance of his ſtyle.——A native of Leſbos, who wrote an hiſtory of Macedonia.——A writer of Sicyon, &c. Plut.

HERACLIUS, a river of Greece. Pauſ. 10, c. 37.——A brother of Conſtantine, &c.——A Roman emperor, &c.

HERÆA, a town of Arcadia.——Feſtivals at Argos in honor of Juno, who was the patroneſs of that city. They were alſo obſerved by the colonies of the Argives which had been planted at Samos and Ægina. There were always two proceſſions to the temple of the goddeſs without the city walls. The firſt was of the men in armour, the ſecond of the women, among whom the prieſteſs, a woman of the firſt quality, was drawn in a chariot by white oxen. The Argives always reckoned their years from her prieſthood, as the Athenians from their archons, or the Romans from their conſuls. When they came to the temple of the goddeſs they offered a hecatomb of oxen. Hence the ſacrifice is often called ἑκατομβία and ſometimes λεχαῖνα, from λεχος a bed, becauſe Juno preſided over marriage, births, &c. There was a feſtival of the ſame name in Elis, celebrated every fifth year, in which ſixteen matrons wove a garment for the goddeſs.——There were alſo others inſtituted by Hippodamia, who had received aſſiſtance from Juno when ſhe married Pelops. Sixteen matrons, each attended by a maid, preſided at the celebration. The contenders were young virgins, who being divided in claſſes, according to their age, ran races each in their order, beginning with the youngeſt. The habit of all was exactly the ſame, their hair was diſhevelled, and their right ſhoulder bare to the breaſt, with coats reaching no lower than the knee. She who obtained the victory was rewarded with crowns of olives, and obtained a part of the ox that was offered in ſacrifice, and was permitted to dedicate her picture to the goddeſs.——There was alſo a ſolemn day of mourning at Corinth which bore the ſame name, in commemoration of Medea's children, who were buried in Juno's temple. They had been ſlain by the Corinthians; who, as it is reported, to avert the ſcandal which accompanied ſo barbarous a murder, preſented Euripides with a large ſum of money to write a play, in which Medea is repreſented as the murderer of her children.——Another feſtival of the ſame name at Pallene, with games in which the victor was rewarded with a garment.

HERÆI MONTES, a chain of mountains at the north of Sicily. Diod. 14.

HERÆUM, a temple and grove of Juno, ſituate between Argos and Mycenæ.——A town of Thrace.

HERBESSUS, a town of Sicily, built by a Phœnician or Carthaginian colony. Sil. 14, v. 265.

HERBITA, an inland town of Sicily. Cic. Verr. 2, c. 64. l. 3, c. 32.

HERCEIUS, an epithet given to Jupiter.

HERCULANEA VIA, a mound raiſed between the Lucrine lake and the ſea, called alſo Herculeum iter. Sil. 12, v. 118.

HERCU-

HERCULĀNEUM, a town of Campania ſwallowed up, with Pompeii, by an earthquake, produced from an eruption of mount Veſuvius, Auguſt 24th, A. D. 79, in the reign of Titus. After being buried under the lava for more than 1600 years, theſe famous cities were diſcovered in the beginning of the preſent century; Herculaneum in 1713, about 24 feet under ground, by laborers digging for a well, and Pompeii 40 years after, about 12 feet below the ſurface, and from the houſes and the ſtreets, which in a great meaſure remain ſtill perfect, have been drawn buſts, ſtatues, manuſcripts, paintings, and utenſils, which do not a little contribute to enlarge our notions concerning the antients, and develope many claſſical obſcurities. The valuable antiquities, ſo miraculouſly recovered, are preſerved in the muſeum of Portici, a ſmall town in the neighbourhood, and the engravings, &c. ably taken from them have been munificently preſented to the different learned bodies of Europe. Seneca. Nat. Q. 6, c. 1 & 26.——Cic. Att. 7, ep. 3.—Mela. 2, c. 4. —Paterc. 2, c. 16.

HERCŬLES, a celebrated hero, who, after death, was ranked among the gods, and received divine honors. According to the antients there were many perſons of the ſame name. Diodorus mentions three, Cicero ſix, and ſome authors extend the number to no leſs than forty-three. Of all theſe the ſon of Jupiter and Alcmena, generally called the Theban, is the moſt celebrated, and to him, as may eaſily be imagined, the actions of the others have been attributed. The birth of Hercules was attended with many miraculous and ſupernatural events; and it is reported that Jupiter, who introduced himſelf to the bed of Alcmena, was employed for three nights in forming a child whom he intended to be the greateſt hero the world ever beheld. [Vid. Alcmena.] Hercules was brought up at Tirynthus; or, according to Diodorus, at Thebes, and before he had completed his eighth month, the jealouſy of Juno, intent upon his deſtruction, ſent two ſnakes to devour him. The child, not terrified at the ſight of the ſerpents, boldly ſeized them in both his hands and ſqueezed them to death, while his brother Iphiclus alarmed the houſe with his frightful ſhrieks. [Vid. Iphiclus.] He was early inſtructed in the liberal arts, and Caſtor the ſon of Tyndarus taught him how to fight, Eurytus how to ſhoot with a bow and arrows, Autolycus to drive a chariot, Linus to play on the lyre, and Eumolpus to ſing. He, like the reſt of his illuſtrious contemporaries, ſoon after became the pupil of the centaur Chiron, and under him he perfected and rendered himſelf the moſt valiant and accompliſhed of the age. In the 18th year of his age he reſolved to deliver the neighbourhood of mount Cithæron from a huge lion which preyed on the flocks of Amphitryon, his ſuppoſed father; and which laid waſte the adjacent country. He went to the court of Theſpius, king of Theſpis, who ſhared in the general calamity, and he received there a tender treatment, and was entertained during fifty days. The fifty daughters of the king became all mothers by Hercules, during his ſtay at Theſpis, and ſome ſay that it was effected in one night. After he had deſtroyed the lion of mount Cithæron, he delivered his country from the annual tribute of an hundred oxen which it paid to Erginus. [Vid. Erginus.] Such public ſervices became univerſally known, and Creon, who then ſat on the throne of Thebes, rewarded the patriotic deeds of Hercules by giving him his daughter in marriage, and entruſting him with the government of his kingdom. As Hercules by the will of Jupiter was ſubjected to the power of Euryſtheus [Vid. Euryſtheus.] and obliged to obey him in every reſpect, Euryſtheus, acquainted with his ſucceſſes and riſing power, ordered him to appear at Mycenæ and perform the labors which by priority of birth he was empowered to impoſe upon him. Hercules refuſed, and Juno, to puniſh his diſobedience, rendered him ſo delirious that he killed his own children by Megara, ſuppoſing them to be the offſpring of Euryſtheus. [Vid. Megara.] When he recovered the uſe of his ſenſes, he was ſo ſtruck with the misfortunes which had proceeded from his inſanity, that he concealed himſelf and retired from the ſociety of men for ſome time. He afterwards conſulted the oracle of Apollo, and was told that he muſt be ſubſervient for twelve years to the will of Euryſtheus, in compliance with the commands of Jupiter; and that after he had atchieved the moſt celebrated labors he ſhould be reckoned in the number of the gods. So plain and expreſſive an anſwer determined him to go to Mycenæ, and to bear with fortitude whatever gods or men impoſed upon him. Euryſtheus ſeeing ſo great a man totally ſubjected to him, and apprehenſive of ſo powerful an enemy, commanded him to atchieve a number of enterprizes the moſt difficult and arduous ever known, generally called the 12 labors of Hercules. The favors of the gods had completely armed him when he undertook his labors. He had received a coat of arms and helmet from Minerva, a ſword from Mercury, a horſe from Neptune, a ſhield from Jupiter, a bow and arrows from Apollo, and from Vulcan a golden cuiraſs and brazen buſkin, with a celebrated club of braſs according to the opinion opinion of ſome writers.——The firſt labor impoſed upon Hercules by Euryſtheus, was to kill the lion of Nemæa, which ravaged the country near Mycenæ. The hero, unable to deſtroy him with his arrows, boldly attacked him with his club, purſued him to his den, and after a cloſe and ſharp engagement he choaked him to death. He carried the dead beaſt on his ſhoulders to Mycenæ, and ever after cloathed himſelf with the ſkin. Euryſtheus was ſo aſtoniſhed at the ſight of the beaſt, and at the courage of Hercules, that he ordered him never to enter the gates of the city when he returned from his expeditions, but to wait for his orders without the walls. He even made himſelf a brazen veſſel into which he retired whenever Hercules returned.——The ſecond labor of Hercules, was to deſtroy the Lernæan hydra, which had ſeven heads according to Apollodorus, 50 according to Simonides, and 100 according to Diodorus. This celebrated monſter he attacked with his arrows, and ſoon after he came to a cloſe engagement, and by means of his heavy club he deſtroyed the heads of his enemy. But this was productive of no advantage, for as ſoon as one head was beaten to pieces by the club, immediately two ſprang up, and the labor of Hercules would have remained unfiniſhed had not he commanded his friend Iolas to burn, with a hot iron, the root of the head which he had cruſhed to pieces. This ſucceeded, [Vid Hydra.] and Hercules become victorious, opened the belly of the monſter, and dipped his arrows in the gall to render the wounds which he gave fatal and incurable.——He was ordered in his third labor to bring alive and unhurt into the preſence of Euryſtheus a ſtag, famous for its incredible ſwiftneſs, its golden horns, and brazen feet. This celebrated animal frequented the neighbourhood of Œnoe, and Hercules was employed for a whole year in continually purſuing it, and at laſt he caught it in a trap, or when tired, or according to others, by ſlightly wounding it and leſſening its ſwiftneſs. As he returned victorious, Diana ſnatched the goat from him, and ſeverely reprimanded him for moleſting an animal which was ſacred to her. Hercules pleaded neceſſity, and by repreſenting the commands of Euryſtheus, he appeaſed the goddeſs and obtained the beaſt. ——The fourth labor was to bring alive to Euryſtheus a wild boar which ravaged the neighbourhood of Erymanthus. In this expedition he deſtroyed the centaurs, [Vid. Centauri.] and caught the boar by cloſely purſuing him through the deep ſnow. Euryſtheus was ſo frightened at the ſight of the boar, that, according to Diodorus, he hid himſelf in his brazen veſſel for ſome days.——In his fifth labor Hercules was ordered to clean the ſtables of Augias, where 3000 oxen had been confined for many years. [Vid. Augias.]——For his ſixth labor he was ordered to kill the carnivorous birds which ravaged the country near the lake Stymphalis in Arcadia. [Vid. Stymphalis.]——In his ſeventh labor he brought alive into Peloponneſus a prodigious wild bull which laid waſte the iſland of Crete.——In his eighth labor he was employed in obtaining the mares of Diomedes which fed upon human fleſh. He killed Diomedes, and gave him to be eaten by his mares, which he brought to Euryſtheus. They were ſent to mount Olympus by the king of Mycenæ, where they were devoured by the wild beaſts; or, according to others, they were conſecrated to Jupiter, and their breed ſtill exiſted in the age of Alexander the Great.——For his ninth labor, he was commanded to obtain the girdle of the queen of the Amazons. [Vid. Hippolite.]——In his tenth labor he killed the monſter Geryon, king of Gades, and brought to Argos his numerous flocks which fed upon human fleſh. [Vid. Geryon.]——The eleventh labor was to obtain apples from the garden of the Heſperides. [Vid. Heſperides.]——The twelfth and laſt, and moſt dangerous of his labors, was to bring upon earth the three headed dog Cerberus. This was cheerfully undertaken by Hercules, and he deſcended into hell by a cave on mount Tænarus. He was permitted by Pluto to carry away his friends Theſeus and Pirithous, who were condemned to puniſhment in hell, and Cerberus alſo was granted to his prayers, provided he made uſe of no arms, but only force to drag him away. Hercules, as ſome report, carried him back to hell after he had brought him before Euryſtheus.—— Beſides theſe arduous labors, which the jealouſy of Euryſtheus impoſed upon him, he alſo atchieved others of his own accord equally great and celebrated. [Vid. Cacus, Antæus, Buſiris, Eryx, &c.] He accompanied the Argonauts to Colchis before he delivered himſelf up to the king of Mycenæ. He aſſiſted the gods in their wars againſt the giants, and it was through him alone that Jupiter obtained a victory. [Vid. Gigantes.] He conquered Laomedon, and pillaged Troy. [Vid. Laomedon.] When Iole, the daughter of Eurytus, king of Œchalia, of whom he was deeply enamoured, was refuſed to his entreaties, he became the prey of a ſecond fit of inſanity, and he murdered Iphitus, the only one of the ſons of Eurytus who favored his addreſſes to Iole. [Vid. Iphitus.] He was ſome time after purified of the murder, and and his infanity ceaſed, but the gods perſecuted him more, and he was viſited by a diſorder which obliged him to apply to the oracle of Delphi for relief. The coldneſs with which the Pythia received him irritated him, and he reſolved to plunder Apollo's temple and carry away the ſacred tripod. Apollo oppoſed him, and a ſevere conflict was begun, which nothing but the interference of Jupiter with his thunderbolts could have prevented. He was upon this told by the oracle that he muſt be ſold as a ſlave, and remain three years in the moſt abject ſervitude to recover from his diſorder. He complied, and Mercury, by order of Jupiter, conducted him to Omphale, queen of Lydia, to whom he was ſold as a ſlave. Here he cleared all the country from robbers, and Omphale who was aſtoniſhed at the greatneſs of his exploits, reſtored him to liberty, and married him. Hercules had Agelaus, and Lamon, according to others, by Omphale, from whom Crœſus, king of Lydia, was deſcended. He became alſo enamoured of one of Omphale's female ſervants, by whom he had Alceus. After he had completed the years of his ſlavery, he returned to Peloponneſus, where he reeſtabliſhed on the throne of Sparta Tyndarus, who had been expelled by Hippocoon. He became one of Dejanira's ſuitors, and married her after he had overcome all his rivals. [Vid. Achelous.] He was obliged to leave Calydon his father-in-law's kingdom, becauſe he had inadvertently killed a man with a blow of his fiſt, and it was on account of this expulſion that he was not preſent at the hunting of the Calydonian boar. From Calydon he retired to the court of Ceyx, king of Trachinia. In his way he was ſtopped by the ſwollen ſtreams of the Evenus, where the centaur Neſſus attempted to offer violence to Dejanira, under the perfidious pretence of conveying her over the river. Hercules perceived the diſtreſs of Dejanira, and killed the centaur, who as he expired gave her a tunic, which as he obſerved had the power of recalling a huſband from unlawful love. [Vid. Dejanira.] Ceyx, king of Trachinia, received him and his wife with great marks of friendſhip, and purified him of the murder which he had committed at Calydon. Hercules was ſtill mindful that he had once been refuſed the hand of Iole, he therefore made war againſt her father Eurytus, and killed him, with three of his ſons. Iole fell into the hands of her father's murderer, and found that ſhe was loved by Hercules as much as before. She accompanied him to mount Œta, where he was going to raiſe an altar and offer a ſolemn ſacrifice to Jupiter. As he had not then the tunic in which he arrayed himſelf to offer a ſacrifice, he ſent Lichas to Dejanira in order to provide himſelf a proper dreſs. Dejanira, informed of her huſband's tender attachment to Iole, ſent him a philter, or more probably the tunic which ſhe had received from Neſſus, and Hercules as ſoon as he had put it on fell into a deſperate diſtemper, and found the poiſon of the Lernæan hydra penetrate through his bones. He attempted to pull off the fatal dreſs, but it was too late, and in the midſt of his pains and tortures he inveighed in the moſt bitter imprecations againſt the credulous Dejanira, the cruelty of Euryſtheus, and the jealouſy and hatred of Juno. As the diſtemper was incurable, he implored the protection of Jupiter, and gave his bow and arrows to Philoctetes, and erected a large burning pile on the top of mount Œta. He ſpread on the pile the ſkin of the Nemæan lion, and laid himſelf down upon it as on a bed, leaning his head on his club. Philoctetes, or according to others, Pæan or Hyllus, was ordered to ſet fire to the pile, and the hero ſaw himſelf on a ſudden ſurrounded with the flames, without betraying any marks of fear or aſtoniſhment. Jupiter ſaw him from heaven, and told to the ſurrounding gods that he would raiſe to the ſkies the immortal parts of a hero who had cleared the earth from ſo many monſters and tyrants. The gods applauded Jupiter's reſolution, the burning pile was ſuddenly ſurrounded with a dark ſmoke, and after the mortal parts of Hercules were conſumed, he was carried up to heaven in a chariot drawn by four horſes. Some loud claps of thunder accompanied his elevation, and his friends, unable to find either his bones or aſhes, ſhowed their gratitude to his memory by raiſing an altar where the burning pile had ſtood. Menœtius, the ſon of Actor, offered him a ſacrifice of a bull, a wild boar, and a goat, and enjoined the people of Opus yearly to obſerve the ſame religious ceremonies. His worſhip ſoon became as univerſal as his fame, and Juno, who had once perſecuted him with ſuch inveterate fury, forgot her reſentment, and gave him her daughter Hebe in marriage. Hercules has received many ſirnames and epithets, either from the place where his worſhip was eſtabliſhed, or from the labors which he atchieved. His temples were numerous and magnificent, and his divinity revered. No dogs or flies ever entered his temple at Rome, and that of Gades, according to Strabo, was always forbidden to women and pigs. The Phœnicians offered quails on his altars, and as it was ſuppoſed that he preſided over dreams, the ſick and infirm were ſent to ſleep in his temples, that they might receive in their dreams the agreeable preſages of their approaching recovery.

The white poplar was particularly dedicated to his ſervice. Hercules is generally repreſented naked, with ſtrong and well proportioned limbs, he is ſometimes covered with the ſkin of the Nemæan lion, and holds a knotted club in his hand, on which he often leans. Sometimes he appears crowned with the leaves of the poplar, and holding the corn of plenty under his arm. At other times he is repreſented ſtanding with Cupid, who inſolently breaks to pieces his arrows and his club, to intimate the paſſion of love in the hero, who ſuffered himſelf to be beaten and ridiculed by Omphale, who dreſſed herſelf in his armour while he was ſitting to ſpin with her female ſervants. The children of Hercules are as numerous as the labors and difficulties which he underwent, and indeed they became ſo powerful ſoon after his death, that they alone had the courage to invade all Peloponneſus. [Vid. Heraclidæ.] He was father of Deicoon and Therimachus, by Megara; of Cteſippus, by Aſtydamia; of Palemon, by Autonoe; of Everes, by Parthenope; of Glyciſenetes, Gyneus and Odites, by Dejanira; of Theſſalus, by Chalciope; of Theſſalus, by Epicaſte; of Tlepolemus, by Aſtyoche; of Agathyrſus, Gelon, and Scytha, by Echidna, &c. Such are the moſt ſtriking characteriſtics of the life of Hercules, who is ſaid to have ſupported for a while the weight of the heavens upon his ſhoulders, [Vid. Atlas] and to have ſeparated by the force of his arm the celebrated mountains which were afterwards called the boundaries of his labors. [Vid. Abyla.] He is held out by the antients as a true pattern of virtue and piety, and as his whole life had been employed for the common benefit of mankind, he was deſervedly rewarded with immortality. His judicious choice of virtue in preference to pleaſure, as deſcribed by Xenophon, is well known. Diod. 1 & 4—Cic. de Nat. D. 1, &c.—Apollod. 1 & 2.—Pauſ. l. 3, 5, 9, & 10.—*Heſiod. in Scut. Hermaphrŏdītus, a ſon of Venus and Mercury, educated on mount Ida by the Naiades. At the age of 15 he began to travel to gratify his curioſity. When he came to Caria, he bathed himſelf in a fountain, and Salmacis, the nymph who preſided over it, became enamoured of him and attempted to ſeduce him. Hermaphroditus continued deaf to all entreaties and offers; and Salmacis, endeavouring to obtain by force what was denied to prayers, cloſely embraced him, and entreated the gods to make them two but one body. Her prayers were heard, and Salmacis and Hermaphroditus, now two in one body, ſtill preſerved the characteriſtics of both their ſexes. Hermaphroditus begged the gods that all who bathed in that fountain might become effeminate. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 347.—Hygin. fab. 271.

Pyrrhus, at his return from Troy, carried home Hermione and married her. Hermione, tenderly attached to her couſin Oreſtes, looked upon Pyrrhus with horror and indignation. According to others, however, Hermione received the addreſſes of Pyrrhus with pleaſure, and even reproached Andromache, his concubine, with ſtealing his affections from her. Her jealouſy for Andromache, according to ſome, induced her to unite herſelf to Oreſtes, and to deſtroy Pyrrhus. HERMANDŪRI, a people of Germany.

HERMANNI, a people of Germany.

HERMAPHRŎDĪTUS, a ſon of Venus and Mercury, educated on mount Ida by the Naiades. At the age of 15 he began to travel to gratify his curioſity. When he came to Caria, he bathed himſelf in a fountain, and Salmacis, the nymph who preſided over it, became enamoured of him and attempted to ſeduce him. Hermaphroditus continued deaf to all entreaties and offers; and Salmacis, endeavouring to obtain by force what was denied to prayers, cloſely embraced him, and entreated the gods to make them two but one body. Her prayers were heard, and Salmacis and Hermaphroditus, now two in one body, ſtill preſerved the characteriſtics of both their ſexes. Hermaphroditus begged the gods that all who bathed in that fountain might become effeminate. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 347.—Hygin. fab. 271.

HERMATHĒNA, a ſtatue which repreſented Mercury and Minerva in the ſame body. This ſtatue was generally placed in ſchools where eloquence and philoſophy were taught, becauſe theſe two deities preſided over the arts and ſciences.

HERMIŎNE, a daughter of Mars and Venus, who married Cadmus. The Gods, except Juno, honored her nuptials with their preſence, and ſhe received, as a preſent, a rich veil and a ſplendid necklace which had been made by Vulcan. She was changed into a ſerpent with her huſband Cadmus, and placed in the Elyſian fields. [Vid. Harmonia.] Apollod. 3.—Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 13.——A daughter of Menelaus and Helen. She was privately promiſed in marriage to Oreſtes the ſon of Agamemnon; but her father, ignorant of this pre-engagement, gave her hand to Pyrrhus the ſon of Achilles, whoſe ſervices he had experienced in the Trojan war. Pyrrhus, at his return from Troy, carried home Hermione and married her. Hermione, tenderly attached to her couſin Oreſtes, looked upon Pyrrhus with horror and indignation. According to others, however, Hermione received the addreſſes of Pyrrhus with pleaſure, and even reproached Andromache, his concubine, with ſtealing his affections from her. Her jealouſy for Andromache, according to ſome, induced her to unite herſelf to Oreſtes, and to deſtroy Pyrrhus. She gave herſelf to Oreſtes after this murder, and received the kingdom of Sparta as a dowry. Horat. Od. 4.—Eurip. in Andr. & Oreſt.—*Ovid. Hermippus, a freed man, diſciple of Philo, in the reign of Adrian, by whom he was greatly eſteemed. He wrote five books upon dreams.——A man who accuſed Aſpaſia, the miſtreſs of Pericles, of impiety and proſtitution. Plut.——A Peripatetic philoſopher of Smyrna who floriſhed B.C. 210.

Hermŏcrătes, a general of Syracuſe, againſt Nicias the Athenian. His lenity towards the Athenian priſoners was looked upon as treacherous. He was baniſhed from Sicily without even a trial, and he was murdered as he attempted to return back to his country, B. C. 408. Plut. in Nic. &c.——A ſophiſt celebrated for his riſing talents. He died in the 28th year of his age, in the reign of the emperor Severus.——The father-in-law of Dionyſius, tyrant of Sicily.——A Rhodian employed by Artaxerxes to corrupt the Grecian ſtates, &c.——A ſophiſt, preceptor to Pauſanias the murderer of Philip. Diod. 16.

Hermodōrus, a Sicilian, pupil to Plato.——A philoſopher of Epheſus, who is ſaid to have aſſiſted, as interpreter, the Roman decemvirs in the compoſition of the 10 tables of laws, which had been collected in Greece. Cic. Tuſc. 5, c. 36.—Plin. 34, c. 5.——A native of Salamis contemporary with Philo the Athenian architect. Cic. in Orat. 1, c. 14.——A poet who wrote a book called Νεμεμα on the laws of different nations.

Hermŏgĕnes, an architect of Alabanda in Caria, employed in building the temple of Diana at Magneſia. He wrote a book upon his profeſſion.——A rhetorician in the ſecond century, the beſt editions of whoſe rhetorica are that of Sturmius, 3 vols. 12mo Argent. 1571. and Laurentius Genev. 1614. He died A. D. 161, and it is ſaid that his body was opened and his heart found hairy and of an extraordinary ſize. At the age of 25, as is reported, he totally loſt his memory.——A lawyer in the age of Dioclefian.——A muſician. Horat. 1, Sat. 3, v. 129.——A ſophiſt of Tarſus, of ſuch brilliant talents, that at the age of 15 he excited the attention and gained the patronage of the emperor M. Antoninus.

Hermolāus, a young Macedonian among the attendants of Alexander. As he was one day hunting with the king he killed a wild boar which was coming towards him. Alexander, who followed cloſe behind him, was ſo diſappointed becauſe the beaſt had been killed before he could dart at it, that he ordered Hermolaus to be ſeverely whipped. This treatment irritated Hermolaus, and he conſpired to take away the king's life, with others who were diſpleaſed with the cruel treatment he had received. The plot was diſcovered by one of the conſpirators, and Alexander ſeized them, and aſked what had impelled them to conſpire to take his life. Hermolaus anſwered for the reſt, and obſerved that it was unworthy of Alexander to treat his moſt faithful and attached friends like ſlaves, and to ſhed their blood without the leaſt mercy. Alexander ordered him to be put to death. Curt. 8, c. 6.

Hermopŏlis, two towns of Egypt, now Aſhmunein and Demenhur. Plin. 5, c. 9.

Hermotīmus, a famous prophet of Clazomenæ. It is ſaid that his ſoul ſeparated itſelf from his body, and wandered in every part of the earth to explain futurity, after which it returned again and animated his frame. His wife, who was acquainted with the frequent abſence of his ſoul, took advantage of it and burnt his body, as if totally dead, and deprived the ſoul of its natural receptacle. Hermotimus received divine honors in a temple at Clazomenæ, into which it was unlawful for women to enter. Plin. 7, c. 52, &c.—Lucian.

Hermundūri, a people of Germany, ſubdued by Aurelius. They were at the north of the Danube, and were conſidered by Tacitus as a tribe of the Suevi, but called, together with the Suevi, Hermiones by Pliny 4, c. 14.—Tacit. An. 13, extra.—Vell. 2, c. 106.

Hermus, a river of Aſia Minor, whoſe ſands, according to the poets, were covered with gold. It flows near Sardes and receives the waters of the Pactolus and Hyllus, after which it falls into the Ægean ſea. It is now called Kedous or Sarabat. *Virg. Hernĭci, a people of Campania, celebrated for their inveterate enmity to the riſing power of Rome. Liv. 9, c. 43 & 44.—Sil. 4, v. 226.—Juv. 14, v. 180.—Dionyſ. Hal. 8.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 684.

Hero, a beautiful prieſteſs of Venus at Seſtos, greatly enamoured of Leander, a youth of Abydos. Theſe two lovers were ſo faithful to one another, that Leander in the night eſcaped from the vigilance of his family, and ſwam acroſs the Helleſpont, while Hero in Seſtos directed his courſe by holding a burning torch on the top of a high tower. After many interviews of mutual affection and tenderneſs, Leander was drowned in a tempeſtuous night as he attempted his uſual courſe, and Hero in deſpair threw herſelf down from her tower and periſhed in the ſea. Muſæus de Leand. & Hero.—Ovid. Heroid. 17 & 18.—Virg. G. 3, v. 258.

Herōdes, firnamed the Great and Aſcalonita, followed the intereſt of Brutus and Caſſius, and afterwards that of Antony. He was made king of Judæa by means of Antony, and after the battle of Actium he was continued in his power by his flattery and ſubmiſſion to Auguſtus. He rendered himſelf odious by his cruelty, and as he knew that the day of his death would become a day of mirth and feſtivity, he ordered the moſt illuſtrious of his ſubjects to be confined and murdered the very moment that he expired, that every eye in the kingdom might ſeem to ſhed tears at the death of Herod. He died in the 70th year of his age, after a reign of 40 years. Joſephus. ——Antipas, a ſon of Herod the Great, governor of Galilæa, &c.——Agrippa, a Jew, intimate with the emperor Caligula, &c. This name was common to many of the Jews. Joſephus.——Atticus. Vid. Atticus.

Herodiānus, a Greek hiſtorian who floriſhed A. D. 247. He was born at Alexandria, and he was employed among the officers of the Roman emperors. He wrote a Roman hiſtory in eight books, from the death of Marcus Aurelius to Maximinus. His ſtyle is peculiarly elegant, but it wants preciſion, and the work too plainly betrays that the author was not a perfect maſter of geography. He is accuſed of being too partial to Maximinus, and too ſevere upon Alexander Severus. His book comprehends the hiſtory of 68 or 70 years, and he aſſerts that he has been an eye-witneſs of whatever he has written. The beſt editions of his hiſtory are that of Politian, 4to. Dovan, 1525, who afterwards publiſhed a very valuable Latin tranſlation, and that of Oxford, 8vo. 1708.

Herodicus, a phyſician ſirnamed Gymnaſtic, who floriſhed B. C. 443.——A grammarian ſirnamed Crateleus, B. C. 123.

Hērŏdŏtus, a celebrated hiſtorian of Halicarnaſſus, whoſe father's name was Lyxes, and that of his mother's Dryo. He fled to Samos when his country labored under the oppreſſive tyranny of Lygdamis, and travelled over Egypt, Italy, and all Greece. He afterwards returned to Halicarnaſſus, and expelled the tyrant; which patriotic deed, far from gaining the eſteem and admiration of the populace, diſpleaſed and irritated them ſo that Herodotus was obliged to fly from Greece from the public reſentment. To procure a laſting fame he publicly repeated at the Olympic games the hiſtory which he had compoſed, in his 39th year, B. C. 445. It was received with ſuch univerſal applauſe that the names of the nine Muſes were unanimouſly given to the nine books into which it is divided. This celebrated compoſition, which has procured its author the title of father of hiſtory, is written in the Ionic dialect. Herodotus is among the hiſtorians what Homer is among the poets, and Demoſthenes among the orators. His ſtyle abounds with elegance, eaſe, and ſweetneſs; and if there is any of the fabulous or incredible, the author candidly informs the reader that it is introduced upon the narration of others. The work is an hiſtory of the wars of the Perſians againſt the Greeks, from the age of Cyrus to the battle of Mycale in the reign of Xerxes, and beſides this it gives an account of the moſt celebrated nations in the world. Herodotus had written another hiſtory of Aſſyria and Arabia, which is not extant. The life of Homer, generally attributed to him, is ſuppoſed by ſome not to be the production of his pen. Plutarch has accuſed him of malevolence towards the Greeks: an imputation which can eaſily be refuted. The two beſt editions of this great hiſtorian are that of Weſſeling, fol. Amſterdam, 1763, and that of Glaſgow, 9 vols. 12mo. 1761. Cic. de leg. 1. de orat. 2.—Dionyſ. Hal. 1. —Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Plut. de mal. Herod. ——A man who wrote a treatiſe concerning Epicurus. Diog.——A Theban wreſtler of Megara, in the age of Demetrius, ſon of Antigonus. He was ſix feet and a half in height, and he ate generally twenty pounds of fleſh, with bread in proportion, at each of his meals.

Heroes, a name which was given by the ancients to ſuch as were born from a god, or to ſuch as had ſignalized themſelves by their actions, and ſeemed to deſerve immortality by the ſervice they had rendered their country. The heroes which Homer deſcribes, ſuch as Ajax, Achilles, were of ſuch a prodigious ſtrength, that they could lift up and throw ſtones which the united force of four or five men of his age could not have moved. The heroes were ſuppoſed to be intereſted in the affairs of mankind after death, and they were invoked with much ſolemnity. As the altars of the gods were crouded with ſacrifices and libations, ſo the heroes were often honored with a funeral ſolemnity, in which their great exploits were enumerated. The origin of heroiſm might proceed from the opinions of ſome philoſophers, who taught that the ſouls of great men were often raiſed to the ſtars, and introduced among the immortal gods. According to the notions of the Stoics, the ancient heroes inhabited a pure and ſerene climate, ſituate above the moon.

Herōis, a feſtival, celebrated every 9th year by the Delphians, in honor of a heroine.

There was in the celebration a great number of myſterious rites, with a repreſentation of ſomething like Semele's reſurrection.

Heron, two mathematicians, one of whom is called the ancient and the other the younger. The former, who lived about 100 years before Chriſt, was diſciple of Cteſibius, and wrote a curious book tranſlated into Latin, under the title of Spiritualium Liber; the only edition of which is that of Baldus. Aug. Vind. 1616.

Heroopŏlis, a town of Egypt on the Arabic gulf.

Herŏphĭla, a Sybil, who, as ſome ſuppoſe, came to Rome in the reign of Tarquin. (Vid. Sibyllæ.) Pauſ. 10, c. 12.

Herophĭlus, an impoſtor in the reign of J. Cæſar, who pretended to be the grandſon of Marius. He was baniſhed from Rome by Cæſar for his ſeditions, and was afterwards ſtrangled in priſon.——A Greek phyſician, about 570 years before the Chriſtian era. He was one of the firſt who diſſected bodies. Pliny, Cicero, and Plutarch, have greatly commended him.

Herostrătus. Vid. Eroſtratus.

Herpa, a town of Cappadocia.

Herse, a daughter of Cecrops, king of Athens, beloved by Mercury. The god diſcloſed his love to Aglauros, Herſe's ſiſter, in hopes of procuring an eaſy admiſſion to Herſe; but Aglauros, through jealouſy, diſcovered the amour. Mercury was ſo offended at her behaviour, that he ſtruck her with his caduceus and changed her into a ſtone. Herſe became mother of Cephalus by Mercury, and, after death, ſhe received divine honors at Athens. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 559, &c.——A wife of Danaus. Apollod.

Hersĭlia, one of the Sabines carried away by the Romans at the celebration of the Conſualia. She was given and married to Romulus; and, being preſented with immortality by Juno, received divine honors under the name of Ora. Liv. 1, c. 11.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 832.

Hertha & Herta, a goddeſs among the Germans ſuppoſed to be the ſame as the earth. She had a temple and a chariot dedicated to her ſervice in a remote iſland, and was ſuppoſed to viſit the earth at ſtated times, when her coming was celebrated with the greateſt rejoicings and feſtivity. Tacit. de Germ.

Hesæus, a mountain near Pæonia.

Hēsĭŏdus, a celebrated poet born at Aſcra, in Bœotia. His father's name was Dius and his mother's Pycimede. He lived in the age of Homer, and even obtained a poetical prize in competition with him according to Varro and Plutarch. Quintilian, Philoſtratus, and others maintain that Heſiod lived before the age of Homer; but Val. Peterculus, &c. ſupport that he floriſhed about 100 years after him. Heſiod is the firſt who wrote a poem on agriculture. This compoſition is called, The Works and the Days; and, beſides the inſtructions which are given to the cultivator of the field, the reader is pleaſed to find many moral reflections worthy of a refined Socrates or a Plato. His Theogony is a miſcellaneous narration executed without art, preciſion, choice, judgment, or connection, yet it is the more valuable for the faithful account it gives of the gods of antiquity. His Shield of Hercules is but a fragment of a larger poem, in which it is ſuppoſed he gave an account of the moſt celebrated heroines among the ancients. Heſiod, without being maſter of the fire and ſublimity of Homer, is admired for the elegance of his diction, and the ſweetneſs of his poetry. Beſides theſe poems he wrote others, now loſt. Pauſanias ſays, that, in his age, Heſiod's verſes were ſtill written on tablets in the temple of the Muſes, of which the poet was a prieſt. If we believe Clem. Alexand. 6, Strom. the poet borrowed much from Muſæus. One of Lucian's dialogues bears the name of Heſiod, and, in it, the poet is introduced as ſpeaking of himſelf. Virgil, in his Georgics, has imitated the compoſitions of Heſiod, and taken his opera and dies for model, as he acknowledges. Cicero ſtrongly commends him, and the Greeks were ſo partial to his poetry and moral inſtructions that they ordered their children to learn all by heart. Heſiod was murdered by the ſons of Ganyctor of Naupactum, and his body was thrown into the ſea Some dolphins brought back the body to the ſhore which was immediately known, and the murderers were diſcovered by the poet's dogs, and thrown into the ſea. If Heſiod floriſhed in the age of Homer, he lived 907 B. C. The beſt editions of this poet are that of Robinſon, 4to, Oxon. 1737, that of Loeſner 8vo, Lipſ. 1778, and that of Parma, 4to, 1785. Cic. Fam. 6, ep. 18.—Pauſ. 9. c. 3, &c.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Paterc.—Varro.—Plut. de 7. Sep. & de Anim. Sag.

Hēsĭŏne, a daughter of Laomedon, king of Troy, by Strymo, the daughter of the Scamander. It fell to her lot to be expoſed to a ſea monſter, to whom the Trojans yearly preſented a marriageable virgin, to appeaſe the reſentment of Apollo and Neptune, whom Laomedon had offended, but Hercules promiſed to deliver her, provided he received as a reward ſix beautiful horſes. Laomedon conſented, and Hercules attacked the the monſter juſt as he was going to devour Heſione, and he killed him with his club. Laomedon, however, refuſed to reward the hero's ſervices; and Hercules, incenſed at his treachery, beſieged Troy, and put the king and all his family to the ſword, except Podarces, or Priam, who had adviſed his father to give the promiſed horſes to his ſiſter's deliverer. The conqueror gave Heſione in marriage to his friend Telamon, who had aſſiſted him during the war, and he eſtabliſhed Priam upon his father's throne. The removal of Heſione to Greece proved at laſt fatal to the Trojans; and Priam, who remembered with indignation that his ſiſter had been forcibly given to a foreigner, ſent his ſon Paris to Greece to reclaim the poſſeſſions of Heſione, or more probably to revenge his injuries upon the Greeks by carrying away Helen, which gave riſe, ſoon after, to the Trojan war. Lycophron mentions, that Hercules threw himſelf, armed from head to foot, into the mouth of the monſter to which Heſione was expoſed, and that he tore his belly to pieces, and came out ſafe only with the loſs of his hair, after a confinement of three days. Homer. Il. 5.—Apollod. 2, c. 5, &c.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 212.——The wife of Nauplius.

Hesperia, a large iſland of Africa, once the reſidence of the Amazons. Diod. 3. ——A name common both to Italy and Spain. It is derived from Heſper or Veſper, the ſetting ſun, or the evening, whence the Greeks called Italy Heſperia, becauſe it was ſituate at the ſetting ſun, or in the weſt. The ſame name, for ſimilar reaſons, was applied to Spain by the Latins. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 634, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 36, v. 4. l. 1, od. 27, v. 28.—Sil. 7, v. 15.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 258.——A daughter of the Cebrenus. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 769.

Hesperides, three celebrated nymphs, daughters of Heſperus. Apollodorus mentions four, Ægle, Erythia, Veſta, and Arethuſa; and Diodorus confounds them with the Atlantides, and ſuppoſes that they were the ſame number. They were appointed to guard the golden apples which Juno gave to Jupiter on the day of their nuptials; and the place of their reſidence placed beyond the ocean by Heſiod, is more univerſally believed to be near mount Atlas in Africa, according to Apollodorus. This celebrated place or garden abounded with fruits of the moſt delicious kind, and was carefully guarded by a dreadful dragon which never ſlept. It was one of the labors of Hercules to procure ſome of the golden apples of the Heſperides. The hero, ignorant of the ſituation of this celebrated garden, applied to the nymphs in the neighbourhood of the Po for information, and was told that Nereus the god of the ſea, if properly managed, [Vid. Nereus] would direct him in his purſuits. Hercules ſeized Nereus as he was aſleep, and the ſea god, unable to eſcape from his graſp, anſwered all the queſtions which he propoſed. Some ſay that Nereus ſent Hercules to Prometheus, and that from him he received all his information. When Hercules came into Africa, he repaired to Atlas, and demanded of him three of the golden apples. Atlas unloaded himſelf, and placed the burden of the heavens on the ſhoulders of Hercules, while he went in queſt of the apples. At his return, Hercules expreſſed his wiſh to eaſe his burden by putting ſomething on his head, and, when Atlas aſſiſted him to remove his inconvenience, Hercules artfully left the burden, and ſeized the apples, which Atlas had thrown on the ground. According to other accounts, Hercules gathered the apples himſelf, without the aſſiſtance of Atlas, and he previouſly killed the watchful dragon which kept the tree. Theſe apples were brought to Euryſtheus and afterwards carried back by Minerva into the garden of the Heſperides, as they could be preſerved in no other place. Hercules is ſometimes repreſented gathering the apples, and the dragon which guarded the tree appears bowing down his head, as having received a mortal wound. This monſter, as it is ſuppoſed, was the offſpring of Typhon, and it had a hundred heads and as many voices. This number, however, is reduced by ſome to only one head. Thoſe that attempt to explain mythology, obſerve, that the Heſperides were certain perſons who had an immenſe number of flocks, and that the ambiguous word μηλον, which ſignifies an apple and a ſheep, gave riſe to the fable of the golden apples of the Heſperides. Diod. 4.—*Ovid. Hierapŏlis, a town of Syria.——Another of Phrygia, famous for hot baths, now Bambukkalaſi.——Another of Crete.

Hiĕrax, a youth who awoke Argus to inform him that Mercury was ſtealing Io. Mercury killed him, and changed him into a bird of prey. Apollod. 2, c. 1.——Antiochus, king of Syria, and brother to Seleucus, received the ſirname of Hierax. Juſtin. 37, c. 3.——An Egyptian philoſopher in the third century.

Hierŏchus (untis) the name of Jericho in the holy land, called the city of Palm-trees, from its abounding in dates. Plin. 5, c. 14.—Tacit. H. 5, c. 6.

Hiĕro 1ſt, a king of Syracuſe, after his brother Gelon, who rendered himſelf odious in the beginning of his reign by his cruelty and avarice. He made war againſt Theron, the tyrant of Agrigentum, and took Himera. He obtained three different crowns at the Olympic games, two in horſe races, and one at a chariot race. Pindar has celebrated him as being victorious at Olympia. In the latter part of his reign the converſation of Simonides, Epicharmus, Pindar, &c. ſoftened in ſome meaſure the roughneſs of his morals and the ſeverity of his government, and rendered him the patron of learning, genius, and merit. He died, after a reign of 18 years, B. C. 467, leaving the crown to his brother Thraſybulus, who diſgraced himſelf by his vices and tyranny. Diod. 11.——The ſecond of that name, king of Syracuſe, was deſcended from Gelon. He was unanimouſly elected king by all the ſtates of the iſland of Sicily, and appointed to carry on the war againſt the Carthaginians. He joined his enemies in beſieging Meſſana, which had ſurrendered to the Romans, but he was beaten by Appius Claudius, the Roman conſul, and obliged to retire to Syracuſe, where he was ſoon blocked up. Seeing all hopes of victory loſt, he made peace with the Romans, and proved ſo faithful to his engagements during the fifty-nine years of his reign, that the Romans never had a more firm, or more attached ally. He died in the 94th year of his age, about 225 years before the chriſtian era. He was univerſally regretted, and all the Sicilians ſhowed, by their lamentations, that they had loſt a common father and a friend. He liberally patronized the learned, and employed the talents of Archimedes for the good of his country. He wrote a book on agriculture, now loſt. He was ſucceeded by Hieronymus. Ælian. V. H. 4, 8.—Juſtin. 23, c. 4.—Flor. 2, c. 2.—Liv. 16.——An Athenian, intimate with Nicias the general. Plut. in Nic.——A Parthian, &c. Tacit.

Hiero-

HIEROCEPIA, an island near Paphos in Cyprus.

HIERŎCLES, a persecutor of the Christians under Diocletian, who pretended to find inconsistencies in Scripture, and preferred the miracles of Thyaneus to those of Christ. His writings were refuted by Lactantius and Eusebius.——A Platonic philosopher, who taught at Alexandria, and wrote a book on providence and fate, fragments of which are preserved by Photius; a commentary on the golden verses of Pythagoras; and facetious moral verses. He flourished A. D. 485. The best edition is that of Asheton and Warren, 8vo. London, 1742.——A general in the interest of Demetrius. Polyæn. 5.——A governor of Bithynia and Alexandria, under Diocletian. ——An officer. Vid. Heliogabalus.

HIERODŪLUM, a town of Libya.

HIERONĬCA LEX, by Hiero, tyrant of Sicily, to settle the quantity of corn, the price and time of receiving it, between the farmers of Sicily and the collector of the corn tax at Rome. This law, on account of its justice and candor, was continued by the Romans when they became masters of Sicily.

HIERONŸMUS, a tyrant of Sicily who succeeded his father or grandfather Hiero, when only 15 years old. He rendered himself odious by his cruelty, oppression, and debauchery. He abjured the alliance of Rome, which Hiero had observed with so much honor and advantage. He was assassinated, and all his family was overwhelmed in his fall, and totally extirpated, B. C. 214.——An historian of Rhodes, who wrote an account of the actions of Demetrius Poliorcetes, by whom he was appointed over Bœotia, B. C. 254. Plut. in Dem.——An Athenian set over the fleet, while Conon went to the king of Persia. ——A Christian writer, commonly called St. Jerome, born in Pannonia, and distinguished for his zeal against heretics. He wrote commentaries on the Prophets, St. Matthew's Gospel, &c. a Latin version, known by the name of Vulgate, polemical treatises, and an account of ecclesiastical writers before him. Of his works, which are replete with lively animation, sublimity, and erudition, the best edition is that of Vallarsius, fol. Veronæ, 1734 to 1740, 10 vols. Jerome died A. D. 420, in his 80th year.

HIEROPHĬLUS, a Greek physician. He instructed his daughter Agnodice in the art of midwifery, &c. Vid. Agnodice.

HIEROSOLŸMA, a celebrated city of Palestine, the capital of Judæa, taken by Pompey, who, on that account, is surnamed Hierosolymarius. Titus also took it and destroyed it the 8th of September, A. D. 70, according to Josephus 2177 years after its foundation. In the siege by Titus, 110,000 persons are said to have perished, and 97,000, to have been made prisoners, and afterwards either sold for slaves, or wantonly exposed for the sport of their insolent victors to the fury of wild beasts. Joseph. Bell. J. 7, c. 16, &c.—Cic. ad Attic. 2. ep. 9. Flacc. 28.

HIGNATIA VIA, a large road which led from the Ionian sea to the Hellespont across Macedonia, about 530 miles. Strab. 7.

HILARIA, a daughter of Leucippus and Philodice. As she and her sister Phœbe were going to marry their cousins Lynceus and Idas, they were carried away by Castor and Pollux, who married them. Hilaria had Anagon by Castor. Paus. 2, c. 22. l. 3, c. 19.——Festivals at Rome in honor of the mother of the gods.

HILARIUS, a bishop of Poictiers, in France, who wrote several treatises, the most famous of which is on the Trinity, in twelve books. The only edition is that of the Benedictin monks, fol. Paris, 1693. Hilary died A. D. 372, in his 80th year.

HILLEVIŌNES, a people of Scandinavia. Plin. 4, c. 13.

HIMELLA, now Aia, a small river in the country of the Sabines. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 714.

HIMĔRA, a city of Sicily built by the people of Zancle, and destroyed by the Carthaginians 240 years after. Strab. 6. ——There were two rivers of Sicily of the same name, the one, now Fiumi de Termini, falling at the east of Panormus into the Tuscan sea, with a town of the same name at its mouth, and also celebrated baths. Cic. Ver. 4, c. 33. The other, now Fiume Salso, running in a southern direction, and dividing the island in almost two parts. Liv. 24, c. 6. l. 25, c. 49.——The ancient name of the Eurotas. Strab. 6.—Mela. 2, c. 7. —Polyb.

HIMILCO, a Carthaginian sent to explore the western parts of Europe. Fest. Avien.——A son of Amilcar, who succeeded his father in the command of the Carthaginian armies in Sicily. He died, with his army, by a plague, B. C. 398. Justin. 19, c. 2.

HIPPAGŎRAS, a man who wrote an account of the republic of Carthage. Athen. 14.

HIPPALCIMUS, a son of Pelops and Hippodamia, who was among the Argonauts.

HIPPALUS, the first who sailed in open sea from Arabia to India. Arrian. in perip.

HIPPARCHIA, a woman in Alexander's age, who became enamoured of Crates, the Cynic

Cynic philoſopher, becauſe ſhe heard him diſcourſe. She married him, though he at firſt diſdained her addreſſes, and repreſented his poverty and meanneſs. She was ſo attached to him that ſhe was his conſtant companion, and was not aſhamed publicly to gratify his impureſt deſires. She wrote ſome things, now loſt. Vid. Crates.

HIPPARCHUS, a ſon of Piſiſtratus, who ſucceeded his father as tyrant of Athens, with his brother Hippias. He patronized ſome of the learned men of the age, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his fondneſs for literature. The ſeduction of a ſiſter of Harmodius raiſed him many enemies, and he was at laſt aſſaſſinated by a deſperate band of conſpirators, with Harmodius and Ariſtogiton at their head, 513 years before Chriſt.——One of Antony's freed men.——The firſt perſon who was baniſhed by oſtraciſm at Athens.——The father of Aſclepiades.——A mathematician and aſtronomer of Nicæa. He firſt diſcovered that the interval between the vernal and the autumnal equinox is 186 days, 7 days longer than between the autumnal and vernal, occaſioned by the eccentricity of the earth's orbit. He divided the heavens into 49 conſtellations, 12 in the ecliptic, 21 in the northern, and 16 in the ſouthern heniſiſphere, and gave names to all the ſtars. He makes no mention of comets. From viewing a tree on a plain from different ſituations, which changed its apparent poſition, he was led to the diſcovery of the parallax of the planets, or the diſtance between their real or apparent poſition, viewed from the centre, and from the ſurface of the earth. He determined longitude and latitude, and fixed the firſt degree of longitude at the Canaries. He likewiſe laid the firſt foundations of trigonometry, ſo eſſential to facilitate aſtronomical ſtudies. He was the firſt who, after Thales and Sulpicius Gallus, found out the exact time of eclipſes, of which he made a calculation for 600 years. After a life of labor in the ſervice of ſcience and aſtronomy, and after publiſhing ſeveral treatiſes, and valuable obſervations on the appearance of the heavens, he died 125 years before the chriſtian era. Plin. 2, c. 26, &c.——An Athenian who conſpired againſt Heraclides, who kept Athens for Demetrius, &c. Polyæn. 5.

HIPPARĪNUS, a ſon of Dionyſius who ejected Callipus from Syracuſe, and ſeized the ſovereign power for twenty-ſeven years. Polyæn. 5.——The father of Dion.

HIPPĂRION, one of Dion's ſons.

HIPPĂSUS, a ſon of Ceyx, who aſſiſted Hercules againſt Eurytus. Apollod. 2, c. 7.——A pupil of Pythagoras. Diog.——A centaur, killed at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 352.——An illegitimate ſon of Priam. Hygin. fab. 90.

HIPPEUS, an illegitimate ſon of Hercules by a daughter of Theſtius. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

HIPPI, four ſmall iſlands near Erythæ.

HIPPIA, a laſcivious woman, &c. Juv. 6, v. 82.

HIPPIAS, a philoſopher of Elis, who maintained that virtue conſiſted in not being in want of the aſſiſtance of men. At the Olympic games he boaſted that he was maſter of all the liberal and mechanical arts; and he ſaid that the ring upon his finger, the tunic, cloak, and ſhoes, which he then wore, were all the work of his own hands. Cic. de orat. 3.——A ſon of Piſiſtratus, who became tyrant of Athens after the death of his father, with his brother Hipparchus. He was willing to revenge the death of his brother, who had been aſſaſſinated, and for this violent meaſure he was driven from his country. He fled to king Darius in Perſia, and was killed at the battle of Marathon, fighting againſt the Athenians, B. C. 490. He had five children by Myrrhine, the daughter of Callias. Herodot. 6.—Thucyd. 7.

HIPPIS, an hiſtorian and poet of Rhegium, in the reign of Xerxes. Ælian. 8, H. An. c. 33.

HIPPIUS, a ſirname of Neptune, from his having raiſed a horſe (ἵππος) from the earth in his conteſt with Minerva concerning the giving a name to Athens.

HIPPO, a daughter of Sceda ſus, who, upon being raviſhed by the ambaſſadors of Sparta, killed herſelf, curſing the city that gave birth to ſuch men. Pauſ. 9, c. 13.——A celebrated town of Africa, on the Mediterranean. Ital. 3, v. 252.——Strabo, 17, ſays that there are two of the ſame name in Africa, one of which by way of diſtinction is called Regius. Plin. 5, c. 3. l. 9, c. 8.—Mela. 1, c. 7.—Liv. 29, c. 3 & 32.——Alſo a town of Spain. Liv. 39, c. 30.——of the Brutii.

HIPPOBOTES, a large meadow near the Caſpian ſea, where 50,000 horſes could graze.

HIPPOBOTUS, a Greek hiſtorian, who compoſed a treatiſe on philoſophers. Diog. in Pyth.

HIPPOCENTAURI, a race of monſters who dwelt in Theſſaly. Vid. Centauri.

HIPPOCOON, a ſon of Œbalus, brother to Tyndarus. He was put to death by Hercules, becauſe he had driven his brother from the kingdom of Lacedæmon. He was at the chace of the Calydonian boar. Diod. 4.—Apollod. 2, c. &c. l. 3, c. 10.—Pauſ. Lacon.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 314.——A friend of of Æneas, ſon of Hyrtacus, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the funeral games of Sicily. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 492, &c.

HIPPOCRĂTE, a daughter of Theſpius. Apollod.

HIPPŎCRĂTES, a celebrated phyſician, of Cos, one of the Cyclades. He ſtudied phyſic, in which his grandfather Nebrus was ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed; and he improved himſelf by reading the tablets in the temples of the gods, where each individual had written down the diſeaſes under which he had labored, and the means by which he had recovered. He delivered Athens from a dreadful peſtilence in the beginning of the Peloponneſian war, and he was publicly rewarded with a golden crown, the privileges of a citizen of Athens, and the initiation at the grand feſtivals. Skilful and diligent in his profeſſion, he openly declared the meaſures which he had taken to cure a diſeaſe, and candidly confeſſes that of 42 patients which were entruſted to his care, only 17 had recovered, and the reſt had fallen a prey to the diſtemper in ſpite of his medical applications. He devoted all his time for the ſervice of his country; and when Artaxerxes invited him, even by force of arms, to come to his court, Hippocrates firmly and modeſtly anſwered, that he was born to ſerve his countrymen, and not a foreigner. He enjoyed the rewards which his well directed labors claimed, and while he lived in the greateſt popularity, he was carefully employed in obſerving the ſymptoms and the growth of every diſorder, and from his judicious remarks, ſucceeding phyſicians have received the moſt valuable advantages. The experiments which he had tried upon the human frame increaſed his knowledge, and from his conſummate obſervations, he knew how to moderate his own life as well as to preſcribe to others. He died in the 99th year of his age, B. C. 361, free from all diſorders of the mind and body; and after death he received with the name of Great, the ſame honors which were paid to Hercules. His writings, few of which remain, have procured him the epithet of divine, and ſhow that he was the Homer of his profeſſion. According to Galen, his opinion is as reſpectable as the voice of an oracle. He wrote in the Ionic dialect, at the advice of Democritus, though he was a Dorian. His memory is ſtill venerated at Cos, and the preſent inhabitants of the iſland ſhew a ſmall houſe, which Hippocrates, as they mention, once inhabited. The beſt editions of his works are that of Fæſius, Genev. fol. 1657; of Linden, 2 vols. 8vo. Amſt. 1665; and that of Mackius, 2 vols. fol. Viennæ, 1743. His treatiſes, eſpecially the Aphoriſms, have been publiſhed ſeparately. Plin. 7, c. 37.—Cic. de orat. 3.——An Athenian general in the Peloponneſian war. Plut.——A mathematician.——An officer of Chalcedon, killed by Alcibiades. Plut. in Alc.——A Syracuſan defeated by Marcellus. The father of Piſiſtratus.——A tyrant of Gela.

HIPPOCRATIA, a feſtival in honor of Neptune in Arcadia.

HIPPŌCRĒNE, a fountain of Bœotia, near mount Helicon, ſacred to the muſes. It firſt roſe from the ground, when ſtruck by the feet of the horſe Pegaſus, whence the name ἵππου κρήνη, the horſe's fountain. Ovid. Met. v. 256.

HIPPŎDĂMAS, a ſon of the Achelous,—of Priam. Apollod.

HIPPŎDĂME & HIPPODAMĪA, a daughter of Œnomaus, king of Piſa, in Elis, who married Pelops, ſon of Tantalus. Her father, who was either enamoured of her himſelf, or afraid leſt he ſhould periſh by one of his daughter's children, according to an oracle, refuſed to marry her, except to him who could overcome him in a chariot race. As the beauty of Hippodamia was greatly celebrated, many courted her, and accepted her father's conditions, though death attended a defeat. Thirteen had already been conquered, and forfeited their lives, when Pelops came from Lydia and entered the liſts. Pelops previouſly bribed Myrtilus, the charioteer of Œnomaus, and enſured himſelf the victory. In the race, Œnomaus mounted on a broken chariot, which the corrupted Myrtilus had purpoſely provided for him, was eaſily overcome, and was killed in the courſe; and Pelops married Hippodamia, and avenged the death of Œnomaus, by throwing into the ſea the perfidious Myrtilus, who claimed for the reward of his treachery, the favor which Hippodamia could grant only to her huſband. Hippodamia became mother of Atreus and Thyeſtes, and it is ſaid that ſhe died of grief for the death of her father, which her guilty correſpondence with Pelops and Myrtilus had occaſioned. Virg. G. 3, v. 7.—Hygin. fab. 84.—Pauſ. 5, c. 14, &c.—Diod. 4.—Ovid. Heroid. 8 & 17.——A daughter of Adraſtus, king of Argos, who married Pirithous, king of the Lapithæ. The feſtivity which prevailed on the day of her marriage was interrupted by the attempts of Eurytus to offer her violence. [Vid. Pirithous.] Ovid. Met. 12.—Plut. in Theſ.——A daughter of Danaus. Apollod.——A prieſteſs of Achilles, daughter of Briſes.——A daughter of Anchiſes, who married Alcathous. Homer. Il. 13.

Hippŏlўte, a queen of the Amazons, given in marriage to Theſeus by Hercules, who had conquered her, and taken away her girdle by order of Euryſtheus. [Vid. Hercules.] She had a ſon by Theſeus, called Hippolytus. Plut. in Theſ.—Propert. 4, el. 3.——The wife of Acaſtus, who fell in love with Peleus, who was in exile at her huſband's court. She accuſed him of incontinence, and of attempts upon her virtue, before Acaſtus, only becauſe he refuſed to gratify her deſires. She is alſo called Aſtyochia. [Vid. Acaſtus.]——A daughter of Cretheus. Apollod.

Hippŏlўtus, a ſon of Theſeus and Hippolyte, famous for his virtues and his misfortunes. His ſtep-mother Phædra fell in love with him, and when he refuſed to pollute his father's bed, ſhe accuſed him of offering violence to her perſon before Theſeus. Her accuſation was readily believed, and Theſeus entreated Neptune ſeverely to puniſh the incontinence of his ſon. Hippolytus fled from the reſentment of his father, and, as he purſued his way along the ſea ſhore, his horſes were ſo frightened at the noiſe of ſea-calves, which Neptune had purpoſely ſent there, that they ran among the rocks till his chariot was broken and his body torn to pieces. Temples were raiſed to his memory, particularly at Trœzene, where he received divine honors. According to ſome accounts, Diana reſtored him to life. Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 268. Met 15, v. 469.—Virg. Met. 10, v. 585, &c.——The father of Megareus.

Hippomolgi, a people of Scythia. Dionyſ. Perieg.

Hippon & Hippo, a town of Africa.

Hippōna, a goddeſs who preſided over horſes. Her ſtatues were placed in horſes' ſtables. Juv. 8, v. 157.

Hippōnax, a Greek poet, born at Epheſus, 540 years before the Chriſtian era. He cultivated the ſame ſatyrical poetry as Archilochus, and was not inferior to him in the beauty or vigor of his lines. His ſatyrical raillery obliged him to fly from Epheſus. As he was naturally deformed, two brothers, Buphalus and Anthermus, made a ſtatue of him, which, by the deformity of its features, expoſed the poet to univerſal ridicule. Hipponax reſolved to revenge the injury, and he wrote ſuch bitter invectives and ſatyrical lampoons againſt them that they hanged themſelves in deſpair. Cic. ad famil. 7, ep. 24.

Hipponiates, a bay in the country of the Brutii.

Hippōnium, a city in the country of the Brutii, where Agathocles built a dock. Strab.

Hipponous, the father of Peribœa and Capaneus. He was killed by the thunderbolts of Jupiter before the walls of Thebes. Apollod. 1, c. 8. l. 3, c. 1.——The firſt name of Bellerophon.——A ſon of Priam.

Hippopŏdes, a people of Scythia, who have horſes feet. Dionyſ. Perieg.

Hippoſtrătus, a favorite of Lais.

Hippŏtădes, the patronymic of Æolus, grandſon of Hippotas, by Segeſta, as alſo of Amaſtrus, his ſon, who was killed in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 674.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 431.

Hippotas or Hippŏtes, a Trojan prince, prince, changed into a river. Vid. Crinius.

Hippothoe, a daughter of Meſtor and Lyſidice, carried away to the iſlands called Echinades by Neptune, by whom ſhe had a ſon named Taphius. Apollod. 2, c. 4.——One of the Nereides. Id. 1, c. 2.——A daughter of Pelias. Id.

Hippŏthoon, a ſon of Neptune and Alope, daughter of Cercyon, expoſed in the woods by his mother, that her amours with the god might be concealed from her father. Her ſhame was diſcovered, and her father ordered her to be put to death. Neptune changed her into a fountain, and the child was preſerved by mares, whence his name. Hygin. fab. 187.—Pauſ. 1, c. 38.

Hippothoontis, one of the 12 Athenian tribes, which received its name from Hippothoon.

Hippŏthous, a ſon of Lethus, killed by Ajax in the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2 & 17.——A ſon of Priam. Apollod. 3, c. 12.——A ſon of Ægyptus. Id.——One of the hunters of the Calydonian boar. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 307.

Hippŏtion, a prince who aſſiſted the Trojans, and was killed by Merion. Homer. Il. 13 & 14.

Hippūris, one of the Cyclades. Mela. 2, c. 7.

Hippus, a river falling into the Phaſis.

Hipsides, a Macedonian, &c. Curt. 7, c. 7.

Hira, a maritime town of Peloponneſus. Homer. Il. 12.

Hirpīni, a people of the Samnites. Sil. 8, v. 570.

Q. Hirpīnus, a Roman, to whom Horace dedicated his 2 od. 11. and alſo 1. ep. 16.

Hirtus, a debauched fellow, &c. Juv. 10, v. 222.

Hirtia lex de magiſtratibus, by A. Hirtius. It required that none of Pompey's adherents ſhould be raiſed to any office or dignity in the ſtate.

Hirtius Aulus, a conſul with Panſa, who aſſiſted Brutus when beſieged at Mutina by Antony. They defeated Antony, but were both killed in battle B. C. 43. Suet. in Aug. 10.——An hiſtorian to whom the 8th book of Cæſar's hiſtory of the Gallic wars, as alſo that of the Alexandrian and Spaniſh wars, is attributed. The ſtile is inferior to that of Cæſar's Commentaries. The author who was Cæſar's friend, and Cicero's pupil, is ſuppoſed to be no other than the conſul of that name.

Hisbon, a Rutulian, killed by Pallas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 384.

Hispălis, an antient town of Spain, now called Seville. Plin. 3, c. 3.—Cæſ. Fam. 10, ep. 32.

Hispānia or Hispaniæ, called by the poets Iberia, Heſperia, & Heſperia Ultima, a large country of Europe, ſeparated from Gaul by the Pyrenean mountains, and bounded on every other ſide by the ſea. Spain was firſt known to the merchants of Phœnicia, and from them paſſed to the Carthaginians, to whoſe power it long continued in ſubjection. The Romans became ſole maſters of it at the end of the ſecond Punic war, and divided at firſt into citerior and ulterior, which laſt was afterwards ſeparated into Bætica and Luſitania by Auguſtus. The Hiſpania citerior was alſo called Tarraconenſis. The inhabitants were naturally warlike, and they often deſtroyed a life which was become uſeleſs, and even burdenſome, by its infirmities. Spain was famous for its rich mines of ſilver, which employed 40,000 workmen, and daily yielded to the Romans no leſs than 20,000 drachms. Theſe have long ſince failed, though in the floriſhing times of Rome, Spain was ſaid to contain more gold, ſilver, braſs and iron than the reſt of the world. It gave birth to Quintilian, Lucan, Martial, Mela, Silius, Seneca, &c. Juſtin. 44.—Strab. 3.—Mela. 2, c. 6.—Plin. 3, c. 1 & 20.

Hispānus, a native of Spain; the word Hiſpanienſis was alſo uſed, but generally applied to a perſon living in Spain and not born there. Martial. 12, præf.

Hispellum, a town of Umbria.

Hispo, a noted debauchee, &c. Juv. 2, v. 56.

Hispulla, a laſcivious woman. Juv. 6, v. 74.

Histaspes, a relation of Darius III. killed in a battle, &c. Curt. 4, c. 4.

Hister, a river. Vid. Iſter.

Hister Pacuvius, a man diſtinguiſhed as much by his vices as his immenſe riches. Juv. 2, v. 58.

Histiæa, a city of Eubœa, anciently called Talantia. It was near the promontory called Ceneum. Homer. Il. 2.

Histiæotis, a country of Theſſaly, ſituate below mount Olympus and mount Oſſa, anciently called Doris, from Dorus the ſon of Deucalion, and inhabited by the Pelaſgi. The Pelaſgi were driven from the country by the Cadmeans, and theſe laſt were alſo diſpoſſeſſed by the Perrhæbeans, who gave to their newly acquired poſſeſſions the name of Hiſtiæotis, or Eſtiæotis, from Eſtiæa, or Hiſtiæa, a town of Eubœa, which they had then lately deſtroyed, and whoſe inhabitants they had carried to Theſſaly with them. Strab.—Herodot. 4.——A ſmall country of Eubœa, of which Hiſtiæa, or Eſtiæa, was the capital.

Histiæus, a tyrant of Miletus, who excited excited the Greeks to take up arms againſt Perſia. Herodot. 5, &c.——An hiſtorian of Miletus.

HISTRIA. Vid. Iſtria.

HODIUS, a herald in the Trojan war.

HOLŎCRON, a mountain of Macedon.

HŎMĒRUS, a celebrated Greek poet, the moſt ancient of all the profane writers. The age in which he lived is not known, though ſome ſuppoſe it to be about 168 years after the Trojan war, or, according to others, 160 years before the foundation of Rome. According to Paterculus, he floriſhed 968 years before the Chriſtian era, or 884, according to Herodotus, who ſuppoſed him to be cotemporary with Heſiod. The Arundelian Marbles fix his era 907 years before Chriſt, and make him alſo cotemporary with Heſiod. This diverſity of opinions proves the antiquity of Homer; and the uncertainty prevails alſo concerning the place of his nativity. No leſs than ſeven illuſtrious cities diſputed the right of having given birth to the greateſt of poets, as it is well expreſſed in theſe lines:

Smyrna, Chios, Colophon, Salamis, Rhodos, Argos, Athenæ,
Orbis de patriâ certat, Homere, tuâ.

He was called Meleſigenes, becauſe ſuppoſed to be born on the borders of the river Meles. There prevailed a report that he had eſtabliſhed a ſchool at Chios in the latter part of his life; and, indeed, this opinion is favored by the preſent inhabitants of the iſland, who ſtill glory in ſhowing to travellers the ſeats where the venerable maſter and his pupils ſat in the hollow of a rock, at the diſtance of about four miles from the modern capital of the iſland. Theſe difficulties and doubts have not been removed, though Ariſtotle, Herodotus, Plutarch, and others, have employed their pen in writing his life. In his two celebrated poems called the Iliad and Odyſſey, Homer has diſplayed the moſt conſummate knowledge of human nature, and rendered himſelf immortal by the ſublimity, the fire, ſweetneſs, and elegance of his poetry. He deſerves a greater ſhare of admiration when we conſider that he wrote without a model, and that none of his poetical imitators have been able to ſurpaſs, or, perhaps, to equal their great maſter. If there are any faults found in his poetry, they are to be attributed to the age in which he lived, and not to him; and we muſt obſerve, that the world is indebted to Homer for his happy ſucceſſor Virgil. In his Iliad, Homer has deſcribed the reſentment of Achilles, and its fatal conſequences in the Grecian army before the walls of Troy. In the Odyſſey, the poet has for his ſubject the return of Ulyſſes into his country, with the many misfortunes which attended his voyage after the fall of Troy. Theſe two poems are each divided into 24 books, the ſame number as the letters of the Greek alphabet, and, though the Iliad claims an unconteſted ſuperiority over the Odyſſey, yet the ſame force, the ſame ſublimity and elegance, prevail, though diveſted of its more powerful fire; and Longinus, the moſt refined of critics, beautifully compares the Iliad to the mid-day, and the Odyſſey to the ſetting ſun, and obſerves, that the latter ſtill preſerves its original ſplendor and majeſty, though deprived of its meridian heat. The poetry of Homer was ſo univerſally admired that, in ancient times, every man of learning could repeat with facility any paſſage in the Iliad or Odyſſey; and, indeed, it was a ſufficient authority to ſettle diſputed boundaries, or to ſupport any argument. The poems of Homer are the compoſitions of a man who travelled and examined with the moſt critical accuracy whatever deſerved notice and claimed attention. Modern travellers are aſtoniſhed to ſee the different ſcenes which the pen of Homer deſcribed about 3000 years ago, ſtill exiſting in the ſame unvaried form, and the ſailor who ſteers his courſe along the Ægean, ſees all the promontories and rocks which appeared to Neſtor and Menelaus, when they returned victorious from the Trojan war. The ancients had ſuch veneration for Homer, that they not only raiſed temples and altars to him, but offered ſacrifices, and worſhipped him as a god. The inhabitants of Chios celebrated feſtivals every fifth year in his honor, and medals were ſtruck, which repreſented him ſitting on a throne, holding his Iliad and Odyſſey. The inhabitants of Cos, one of the Sporades, boaſted that Homer was buried in their iſland; and the Cyprians claimed the ſame honor, and ſaid that he was born of Themiſto, a female native of Cyprus. Alexander was ſo fond of Homer, that he generally placed his compoſitions under his pillow, with his ſword; and he carefully depoſited the Iliad in one of the richeſt and moſt valuable caſkets of Darius, obſerving, that the moſt perfect work of human genius ought to be preſerved in a box the moſt valuable and precious in the world. It is ſaid, that Piſiſtratus, tyrant of Athens, was the firſt who collected and arranged the Illiad and Odyſſey in the manner in which they now appear to us; and that it is to the well directed purſuits of Lycurgus that we are indebted for their preſervation. Many of the ancients have written the life of Homer, yet their enquiries and labors have not much contributed to prove the native place, the parentage, and connections, of a man whom ſome have repreſented as deprived of ſight. Beſides the Iliad and Odyſſey, Homer wrote, according to the opinion of ſome authors, a poem upon Amphiarus' expedition againſt Thebes, beſides the Phoceis, the Cercopes, the ſmall Iliad, the Epicichlides, and the Batrachomyomachia, and many hymns to ſome of the gods. The merit of originality is taken very improperly, perhaps, from Homer, by thoſe who ſuppoſe, with Clemens Alex. 6 Strom. that he borrowed from Orpheus, or that, according to Suidas, [voce Corinnus] he took his plan of the Iliad from Corinnus, an epic poet, who wrote on the Trojan war, at the very time the Greeks beſieged that famed city. Agathon, an ancient painter, according to Ælian, repreſented the merit of the poet in a manner as bold as it is indelicate. Homer was repreſented as vomiting, and all other poets as ſwallowing what he ejected. Of the numerous commentaries publiſhed on Homer, that of Euſtathius, biſhop of Theſſalonica, is by far the moſt extenſive and erudite. The beſt editions of Homer's Iliad and Odyſſey may, perhaps, be found to be Barnes, 2 vols, 4to. Cantab. 1711; that of Glaſgow, 2 vols. fol. 1758; that of Berglerus, 2 vols. 12mo. Amſt 1707; that of Dr. Clarke, of the Iliad, 2 vols. 4to. 1729, and of the Odyſſey, 1740; and that of Oxford, 5 vols. 8vo. 1780, containing the ſcholia, hymns, and an index. Herodot. 2, c. 53.—Theocrit. 16.—*Ariſtot. He wrote 45 tragedies, all loſt.——There were ſeven other poets, of inferior note, who bore the name of Homer.

Homŏle, a lofty mountain of Theſſaly, once the reſidence of the Centaurs. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 675.

Homŏlea, a mountain of Magneſia.

Homolippus, a ſon of Hercules and Xanthis. Apollod.

Homoloides, one of the ſeven gates of Thebes. Stat. Theb. 7, v. 252.

Homonadenses, a people of Cilicia.

Honōrius, an emperor of the weſtern empire of Rome, who ſucceeded his father Theodoſius the Great, with his brother Arcadius. He was neither bold nor vicious, but he was of a modeſt and timid diſpoſition, unfit for enterpriſe, and fearful of danger. He conquered his enemies by means of his generals, and ſuffered himſelf and his people to be governed by miniſters who took advantage of their imperial maſter's indolence and inactivity. He died of a dropſy in the 39th year of his age, 15th of Auguſt, A. D. 423. He left no iſſue, though he married two wives. Under him and his brother the Roman power was divided into two different empires. The ſucceſſors of Honorius, who fixed their reſidence at Rome, were called the emperors of the weſt, and the ſucceſſors of Arcadius, who ſat on the throne of Conſtantinople, were diſtinguiſhed by the name of emperors of the eaſtern Roman empire. This diviſion of power proved fatal to both empires, and they ſoon looked upon one another with indifference, contempt, and jealouſy.

Hora, a goddeſs at Rome, ſuppoſed to be Herſilia, who married Romulus. She was ſaid to preſide over beauty. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 851.

Horacitæ, a people near Illyricum.

Horapollo, a Greek writer, whoſe age is unknown. His Hieroglyphica, a curious and entertaining book, has been edited by Corn. de Pauw. 4to. Ultraj. 1727.

Horæ, three ſiſters, daughters of Jupiter and Themis, according to Heſiod, called Eunomia, Dice, and Irene. They were the ſame as the ſeaſons who preſided over the ſpring, ſummer, and winter, and were repreſented by the poets as opening the gates of heaven and of Olympus. Homer. Il. 5.—Pauſ. 5.—Heſiod. Theog.

Horātia, the ſiſter of the Horatii, killed by her brother for mourning the death of the Curiatii. Cic. de inv. 2, c. 20.

Hŏrātius Cocles. Vid. Cocles.——Q. Flaccus, a celebrated poet, born at Venuſia. His father was a freed-man, and, though poor in his circumſtances, he liberally educated his ſon, and ſent him to learn philoſophy at Athens, after he had received the leſſons of the beſt maſters at Rome. Horace followed Brutus from Athens, and the timidity which he betrayed at the battle of Philippi ſo effectually diſcouraged him, that he for ever abandoned the profeſſion of arms, and, at his return to Rome, he applied himſelf to cultivate poetry. His riſing talents claimed the attention of Virgil and Varius, who recommended him to the care of Mecænas and Auguſtus, the moſt celebrated patrons of literature. Under the foſtering patronage of the emperor and of his miniſter, Horace gave himſelf up to indolence and refined pleaſure. He was a follower of Epicurus, and, while he liberally indulged his appetites, he neglected the calls of ambition, and never ſuffered himſelf to be carried away by the tide of popularity or public employments. He even refuſed to become the ſecretary of Auguſtus, and the emperor was not offended at his refuſal. He lived at the table of his illuſtrious patrons as if he were in his own houſe; and Auguſtus, while ſitting at his meals with Virgil at his right hand, and Horace at his left, often ridiculed the ſhort breath of the former, and the watery eyes of the latter, by obſerving that he ſat between tears and ſighs, Ego ſum inter ſuſpiria & lacrymas. Horace was warm in his friendſhip, and, if ever any ill-judged reflection had cauſed offence, the poet immediately made every conceſſion which could effect a reconciliation, and not deſtroy the good purpoſes of friendly ſociety. Horace died in the 57th year of his age, B. C. 8. His gaiety was ſuitable to the liveline's and diſſipation of a court; and his familiar intimacy with Mecænas has induced ſome to believe that the death of Horace was violent, and that he haſtened himſelf out of the world to accompany his friend. The 17th ode of his ſecond book, which was written during the laſt illneſs of Mecænas, is too ſerious to be conſidered as a poetical rhapſody or unmeaning effuſion; and, indeed, the poet ſurvived the patron only three weeks, and ordered his bones to be buried near thoſe of his friend. He left all his poſſeſſions to Auguſtus. The poetry of Horace, ſo much commended for its elegance and ſweetneſs, is deſervedly cenſured for the licentious expreſſions and indelicate thoughts which he too frequently introduces. In his odes he has imitated Pindar and Anacreon; and if he has confeſſed himſelf to be inferior to the former, he has ſhown that he bears the palm over the latter by his more ingenious and refined ſentiments, by the eaſe and melody of his expreſſions, and by the pleaſing variety of his numbers. In his ſatires and epiſtles, Horace diſplays much wit, and much ſatirical humor, without much poetry, and his ſtile, ſimple and unadorned, differs little from proſaical compoſition. In his art of poetry he has ſhown much taſte and judgment, and has rendered in Latin hexameters, what Ariſtotle had, ſome ages before, delivered to his pupils in Greek proſe. The poet gives judicious rules and uſeful precepts to the moſt powerful and opulent citizens of Rome, who, in the midſt of peace and enjoyment, wiſhed to cultivate poetry and court the muſes. The beſt editions of Horace will be found to be that of Baſil, fol. 1580, illuſtrated by eighty commentators; that of Baxter's, edited by Geſner, 8vo. Lipſ. 1752; and that of Glaſgow, 12mo. 1744. Suet. in Aug. Ovid. Triſt. 4. el. 10, v. 49.——Three brave Romans, born at the ſame birth, who fought againſt the three Curiatii, about 667 years before Chriſt. This celebrated fight was fought between the hoſtile camps of the people of Alba and Rome, and on their ſucceſs depended the victory. In the firſt attack two of the Horatii were killed, and the only ſurviving brother, by joining artifice to valor, obtained an honorable trophy: by pretending to fly from the field of battle, he eaſily ſeparated his antagoniſts, and, in attacking them one by one, he was enabled to conquer them all. As he returned victorious to Rome, his ſiſter reproached him with the murder of one of the Curiatii, to whom ſhe was promiſed in marriage. He was incenſed at the rebuke, and killed his ſiſter. This violence raiſed the indignation of the people; he was tried and capitally condemned. His eminent ſervices, however, pleaded in his favor; the ſentence of death was exchanged for a more moderate but more ignominious puniſhment, and he was only compelled to paſs under the yoke. A trophy was raiſed in the Roman forum, on which he ſuſpended the ſpoils of the conquered Curiatii Cic. de Invent. 2, c. 26. Liv. 1, c. 24, &c.—*Dionyſ. During the ceremony he was informed of the death of his ſon, but he did not forget the ſacred character he then bore for the feelings of a parent, and continued the dedication after ordering the body to be buried. Liv. 2.

HORCIAS, the general of 3000 Macedonians, who revolted from Antigonus in Cappadocia. Polyæn. 4.

HORMISDAS, a name which ſome of the Perſian kings bore in the reign of the Roman emperors.

HORESTI, a people of Britain, ſuppoſed to be the inhabitants of Eſkdale now in Scotland. Tacit. Ag. 38.

HORRATUS, a Macedonian ſoldier, who fought with another private ſoldier in ſight of the whole army of Alexander. Curt. 9, c. 7.

HORTENSIA, a celebrated Roman lady, daughter of the orator Hortenſius, whoſe eloquence ſhe had inherited in the moſt eminent degree. When the triumvirs had obliged 14,000 women to give upon oath an account of their poſſeſſions, to defray the expences of the ſtate, Hortenſia undertook to plead their cauſe, and was ſo ſucceſsful in her attempt, that 1000 of her female fellow-ſufferers eſcaped from the avarice of the triumvirate. Val. Max. 8, c. 3.

HORTENSIA LEX, by Q. Hortenſius, the dictator, A. U. C. 867. It ordered the whole body of the Roman people to pay implicit obedience to whatever was enacted by the commons. The nobility, before this law was enacted, had claimed an abſolute exemption.

HORTA, or HORTINUM, a town of the Sabines, on the confluence of the Nar and the Tiber. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 716.

Q. HORTENSIUS, a celebrated orator, who began to diſtinguiſh himſelf by his eloquence quence, in the Roman forum, at the age of nineteen. His friend and ſucceſſor Cicero ſpeaks with great eulogium of his oratorical powers, and mentions the uncommon extent of his memory. The affected actions of Hortenſius at the bar procured him the ridiculous ſirname of Dionyſia, a celebrated ſtage dancer at that time. He was prætor and conſul, and died 50 years before Chriſt, in his 63d year. His orations are not extant. Quintilian mentions them as undeſerving the great commendations which Cicero had ſo liberally beſtowed upon them. Hortenſius was very rich, and not leſs than 10,000 caſks of Arviſian wine were found in his cellar after his death. He had written pieces of amorous poetry, and annals, all loſt. Cic. in Brut. ad Attic. de Orat. &c.—Varro de R. R. 3, c. 5.——Corbio, a grandſon of the orator of the ſame name, famous for his laſciviouſneſs.——A rich Roman, who aſked the elder Cato his wife, to procreate children. Cato gave his wife to his friend, and took her again after his death. This behaviour of Gato was highly cenſured at Rome, and it was obſerved, that Cato's wife had entered the houſe of Hortenſius very poor, but that ſhe returned to the bed of Cato in the greateſt opulence. Plut. in Cat.——A Roman, ſlain by Antony on his brother's tomb. Id.——A prætor, who gave up Macedonia to Brutus. Id.——One of Sylla's lieutenants. Id.——A Roman, the firſt who introduced the eating of peacocks at Rome. This was at the feaſt he gave when he was created augur.

Hortōna, a town of Italy, on the confines of the Æqui. Liv. 3, c. 30.

Horus, a ſon of Iſis, one of the deities of the Egyptians.——A king of Aſſyria.

Hostilia lex was enacted A. U. C. 583. By it ſuch as were among the enemies of the republic, or abſent when the ſtate required their aſſiſtance, were guilty of rapine.

Hostilia, a large town on the Po. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 40.—Plin. 21, c. 12.

Hostius Hostilius, a warlike Roman, preſented with a crown of boughs by Romulus, for his intrepid behaviour in a battle. Dionyſ. Hal.——A conſul.——A Latin poet, in the age of J. Cæſar.

Hunni, a people of Sarmatia, who invaded the empire of Rome in the fifth century, and ſettled in Pannonia, to which they gave the name of Hungary.

Hyacinthia, an annual ſolemnity at Amyclæ, in Laconia, in honor of Hyacinthus and Apollo. It continued for three days, during which time the grief of the people was ſo great for the death of Hyacinthus, that they did not adorn their hair with garlands during their feſtivals, nor eat bread, but fed only upon ſweetmeats. They did not even ſing pæans in honor of Apollo, or obſerve any of the ſolemnities which were uſual at other ſacrifices. On the ſecond day of the feſtival there were a number of different exhibitions. Youths, with their garments girt about them, entertained the ſpectators, by playing ſometimes upon the flute, or upon the harp, and by ſinging anapeſtic ſongs, in loud echoing voices, in honor of Apollo. Others paſſed acroſs the theatre mounted upon horſes richly adorned, and, at the ſame time, choirs of young men came upon the ſtage ſinging their uncouth ruſtic ſongs, and accompanied by perſons who danced at the ſound of vocal and inſtrumental muſic, according to the ancient cuſtom. Some virgins were alſo introduced in chariots of wood, covered at the top, and magnificently adorned. Others appeared in race chariots. The city began then to be filled with joy, and immenſe numbers of victims were offered on the altars of Apollo, and the votaries liberally entertained their friends and ſlaves. During this latter part of the feſtivity, all were eager to be preſent at the games, and the city was almoſt deſolate, and without inhabitants. Athen. 4.

Hyacinthus, a ſon of Amyclas and Diomede, greatly beloved by Apollo and Zephyrus. He returned the former's love, and Zephyrus, incenſed at his coldneſs and indifference, reſolved to puniſh his rival. As Apollo, who was entruſted with the education of Hyacinthus, once played at quoit with his pupil, Zephyrus blew the quoit, as ſoon as it was thrown by Apollo, upon the head of Hyacinthus, and he was killed with the blow. Apollo was ſo diſconſolate at the death of Hyacinthus, that he changed his blood into a flower, which bore his name, and placed his body among the conſtellations. The Spartans alſo eſtabliſhed yearly feſtivals in honor of the nephew of their king. [Vid. Hyacinthia.] Pauſ. 3, c. 19.—Ovid. Met. 10, v. 185, &c.—Apollod. 3, &c.

Hyădes, five daughters of Atlas, king of Mauritania, who were ſo diſconſolate at the death of their brother Hyas, who had been killed by a wild boar, that they pined away and died. They became ſtars after death, and were placed near Taurus, one of the 12 ſigns of the Zodiac. They received the name of Hyades from their brother Hyas. Their names are Phaola, Ambroſia, Eudora, Coronis, and Polyxo. To theſe ſome have added Thione and Prodice, and they maintained, that they were daughters of Hyas and Æthra, one of the Oceanides. Euripides calls them daughters of Erechtheus. The ancients ſuppoſed that the riſing and ſetting of the Hyades was always attended with much rain, whence the name (ὑω pluo). Ovid. Faſt. 5, v. 165.—Hygin. fab. 182.—Eurip. in Ion.

HYĂGNIS, a Phrygian, father of Marſyas. He invented the flute. Plut. de Muſic.

HYĂLA, a city at the mouth of the Indus, where the government is the ſame as at Sparta.——One of Diana's attendant nymphs. Ovid.

HYAMPŎLIS, a city of Phocis, on the Cephiſus. Herodot. 8.

HYANTHES, the ancient name of the inhabitants of Bœotia, from king Hyas. Cadmus is ſometimes called Hyanthius, becauſe he is king of Bœotia. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 147.

HYANTIS, an ancient name of Bœotia.

HYARBITA, a man who endeavoured to imitate Timogenes, &c. Horat. 1, ep. 19, v. 15.

HYAS, a ſon of Atlas, of Mauritania, by Æthra. His extreme fondneſs for ſhooting proved fatal to him, and, in his attempts to rob a lioneſs of her whelps, he was killed by the enraged animal. Some ſay that he died by the bite of a ſerpent, and others that he was killed by a wild boar. His ſiſters mourned his death with ſuch conſtant lamentations, that Jupiter, in compaſſion of their ſorrow, changed them into ſtars. [Vid. Hyades.] Hygin. fab. 192.—Ovid. Faſt. 5, v. 170.

HYBLA, a mountain in Sicily, called afterwards Megara, where thyme and odoriferous flowers of all ſorts grew in abundance. It is famous for its honey. There is, at the foot of the mountain, a town of the ſame name. There is alſo another near mount Ætna; and a third near Catana. Pauſ. 5, c. 23.—Strab. 6.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Cic. Verr. 3, c. 43. l. 5, c. 25.—Sil. 14, v. 26.—Stat. 14, v. 201.——A city of Attica bears alſo the name of Hybla.

HYBRĒAS, an orator of Caria, &c. Strab. 13.

HYBRIANES, a people near Thrace.

HYCCARON, (plur. a), a town of Sicily, the native place of Lais.

HYDA & HYDE, a town of Lydia, under mount Tmolus, which ſome ſuppoſe to be the ſame as Sardes.

HYDARA, a town of Armenia. Strab. 12.

HYDĂRNES, one of the ſeven noble Perſians who conſpired to deſtroy the uſurper Smerdis, &c. Herodot. 3 & 6.—Strab. 11.

HYDASPES, a river of Aſia, flowing by Suſa.——Another in India, now Behut, or Chelum, the boundaries of Alexander's conqueſts in the eaſt. It falls into the Indus. Curt. 5, c. 2.—Lucan. 8, v. 227.—Horat. 1, od. 22, v. 7.—Strab. 15.——A friend of Æneas, killed in the Rutulian war. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 747.

HYDRA, a celebrated monſter, which infeſted the neighbourhood of the lake Lerna in Peloponneſus. It was the fruit of Echidna's union with Typhon. It had an hundred heads, according to Diodorus; fifty, according to Simonides; and nine, according to the more received opinion of Apollodorus, Hyginus, &c. As ſoon as one of theſe heads was cut off, two immmediately grew up if the wound was not ſtopped by fire. It was one of the labors of Hercules to deſtroy this dreadful monſter, and this he eaſily effected with the aſſiſtance of Iolaus, who applied a burning iron to the wounds as ſoon as one head was cut off. While Hercules was deſtroying the hydra, Juno, jealous of his glory, ſent a ſea-crab to bite his foot. This new enemy was ſoon diſpatched; and Juno, unable to ſucceed in her attempts to leſſen the fame of Hercules, placed the crab among the conſtellations, where it is now called the Cancer. The conqueror dipped his arrows in the gall of the hydra, and, from that circumſtance, all the wounds which he gave proved incurable and mortal. Heſiod. Theog.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Pauſ. 5, c. 17.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 69.—Horat. 4, od. 4, v. 61.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 276. l. 7, v. 658.

HYDRAOTES, a river of India, croſſed by Alexander.

HYDROPHŎRIA, a feſtival obſerved at Athens, called απο του φορειν ὑδωρ, from carrying water. It was celebrated in commemoration of thoſe who periſhed in the deluge.

HYDRUNTUM & HYDRUS, a city of Calabria, 50 miles ſouth of Brunduſium. As the diſtance from thence to Greece was only 60 miles, Pyrrhus, and afterwards Varro, Pompey's lieutenant, meditated the building here a bridge acroſs the Adriatic. Though ſo favorably ſituated, Hydrus, now called Otranto, is but an inſignificant town, ſcarce containing 3000 inhabitants. Plin. 3, c. 11.—Cic. 15. Att. 21. l. 16. ep. 5.—Lucan. 5, v. 375.

HYDRŪSA, a town of Attica. Strab. 9.

HYĔLA, a town of Lucania. Strab. 6.

HYEMPSAL, a ſon of Micipſa, brother to Adherbal, murdered by Jugurtha, after the death of his father. Salluſt. de Jug. bell.

HYETTUS, a town of Bœotia. Pauſ. 9, c. 24.

HYGEIA, the goddeſs of health, daughter of Æſculapius, held in great veneration among the ancients. Her ſtatues repreſented her with a veil, and the matrons uſually conſecrated their locks to her. She was alſo repreſented on monuments like a young woman woman holding a ſerpent in one hand, and in the other a cup, out of which the ſerpent ſometimes drank. According to ſome authors, Hygeia is the ſame as Minerva, who received that name from Pericles, who erected her a ſtatue, becauſe in a dream ſhe had told him the means of curing an architect, whoſe aſſiſtance he wanted to build a temple. Plut. in Pericl.—Pauſ. 1, c. 23.

HYGIANA, a town of Peloponneſus.

C. JUL. HYGĪNUS, a grammarian, one of the freed men of Auguſtus. He was a native of Alexandria; or, according to ſome, he was a Spaniard, very intimate with Ovid. He was appointed librarian to the library of mount Palatine, and he was able to maintain himſelf by the liberality of C. Licinius. He wrote a mythological hiſtory, which he called fables, and Poeticon Aſtronomicon, beſides treatiſes on the cities of Italy, on ſuch Roman families as were deſcended from the Trojans, a book on agriculture, commentaries on Virgil, the lives of great men, &c. now loſt. The beſt edition of Hyginus is that of Munkerus, 2 vols. 8vo. Amſt. 1681. Theſe compoſitions have been greatly mutilated, and their incorrectneſs and their bad Latinity, have induced ſome to ſuppoſe that they are ſpurious. Sueton. de Gram.

HYLA & HYLAS, a river of Myſia, where Hylas was drowned. Virg. G. 3, v. 6.—— A colony of Phocis.

HYLÆUS, a name given to ſome centaurs, killed at the nuptials of Pirithous. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 294.——One of Actæon's dogs.

HYLAS, a ſon of Thiodamus, king of Myſia and Menodice, ſtolen away by Hercules, and carried on board the ſhip Argo to Colchis. On the Aſiatic coaſt the Argonauts landed to take a ſupply of freſh water, and Hylas, following the example of his companions, went to the fountain with a pitcher, and fell into the water and was drowned. The poets have embelliſhed this tragical ſtory, by ſaying, that the nymphs of the river, enamoured of the beautiful Hylas, carried him away; and that Hercules, diſconſolate at the loſs of his favorite youth, filled the woods and mountains with his complaints, and, at laſt, abandoned the Argonautic expedition to go and ſeek him. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Hygin. fab. 14, 271.—Virg. Ecl. 6.—Propert. 1, el. 20.——A river of Bithynia. Plin. 5, c. 32.

HYLAX, a dog mentioned in Virgil, Ecl. 8.

HYLÆ, a ſmall town of Bœotia. Plin. 4, c. 7.

HYLIAS, a river of Magna Græcia.

HYLLAICUS, a part of Peloponneſus, near Meſſenia.

HYLLUS, a ſon of Hercules and Dejanira, who, ſoon after his father's death, married Iole. He, as well as his father, was perſecuted by the envy of Euryſtheus, and obliged to fly from the Peloponneſus. The Athenians gave a kind reception to Hyllus and the reſt of the Heraclidæ, and marched againſt Euryſtheus. Hyllus obtained a victory over his enemies, and killed with his own hand Euryſtheus, and ſent his head to Alcmena, his grandmother. Some time after he attempted to recover the Peloponneſus with the Heraclidæ, and was killed in ſingle combat by Echemus, king of Arcadia. [Vid. Heraclidæ, Hercules.] Herodot. 7, c. 204, &c.—Strab. 9.—Diod. 4.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 279.——A river of Lydia, flowing into the Hermus. It is called alſo Phryx. Liv. 37, c. 38.—Herodot. 1, c. 180.

HYLONŎME, the wife of Cyllaras, who killed herſelf the moment her huſband was murdered by the Lapithæ. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 405.

HYLOPHĂGI, a people of Æthiopia. Diod. 3.

HYMĔNÆUS & HYMEN, the god of marriage among the Greeks, was ſon of Bacchus and Venus, or according to others, of Apollo and one of the muſes. Hymenæus, according to the more received opinions, was a young Athenian of extraordinary beauty, but ignoble origin. He became enamoured of the daughter of one of the richeſt and nobleſt of his countrymen, and, as the rank and elevation of his miſtreſs removed him from her preſence and converſation, he contented himſelf to follow her wherever ſhe went. In a certain proceſſion, in which all the matrons of Athens went to Eleuſis, Hymenæus, to accompany his miſtreſs, diſguiſed himſelf in woman's cloaths, and joined the religious troop. His youth, and the fairneſs of his features, favored his diſguiſe. A great part of the proceſſion was ſeized by the ſudden arrival of ſome pirates, and Hymenæus, who ſhared the captivity of his miſtreſs, encouraged his female companions, and aſſaſſinated their raviſherswhile they were aſleep. Immediately after this, Hymenæus repaired to Athens, and promiſed to reſtore to liberty the matrons who had been enſlaved, provided he was allowed to marry one among them who was the object of his paſſion. The Athenians conſented, and Hymenæus experienced ſo much felicity in his marriage ſtate, that the people of Athens inſtituted feſtivals in his honor, and ſolemnly invoked him at their nuptials, as the Latins did their Thalaſſius. Hymen was generally repreſented as crowned with flowers, chiefly with marjoram or roſes, and holding a burning torch in one hand, and in the other a veſt of a purple color. It was ſuppoſed that he always attended at nuptials; for, if not, matrimonial connections were fatal, and ended in the moſt dreadful calamities; and hence people ran about, calling aloud, Hymen! Hymen! &c. Ovid. Medea. Met. 12, v. 215.—Virg. Æn. 1, &c.—Catull. ep. 62.

HYMETTUS, a mountain of Attica, about 22 miles in circumference, and about two miles from Athens, ſtill famous for its bees and excellent honey. There was alſo a quarry of marble there. Jupiter had there a temple; whence he is called Hymettius. Strab. 9.—Ital. 14, v. 200.—Plin. 36, c. 3.—Horat. 2, od. 18, v. 3. Sat. 2, 2, v. 15.—Cic. 2. fin. 34.

HYPÆPA or IPEPÆ, now Berki, a town of Lydia, ſacred to Venus, between mount Tmolus and the Cayſtrus. Strab. 13.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 152.

HYPÆSIA, a country of Peloponneſus.

HYPĂNIS, a river of European Scythia, now called Bog, which falls into the Boryſthenes, and with it into the Euxine. Herodot. 4, c. 52, &c.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 285.——A river of India.——Another of Pontus. Cic. Tuſc. 2, c. 39.——A Trojan who joined himſelf to Æneas, and was killed by his own people, who took him for one of the enemy in the night that Troy was burned by the Greeks. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 428.

HYPARĪNUS, a ſon of Dion, who reigned at Syracuſe for two years after his father.——The father of Dion.

HYPĂTES, a river of Sicily, near Camarina. Ital. 14, v. 231.

HYPĂTUA, a town of Theſſaly. Liv. 41, c. 25.

HYPĒNOR, a Trojan killed by Diomedes at Troy. Homer. Il. 5.

HYPERBIUS, a ſon of Ægyptus. Apollod.

HĬPERBŎREI, a nation in the northern parts of Europe and Aſia, who were ſaid to live to an incredible age, even to a thouſand years, and in the enjoyment of all poſſible felicity. The ſun was ſaid to riſe and ſet to them but once a year, and therefore perhaps they are placed by Virgil under the north pole. The word ſignifies people who inhabit beyond the wind Boreas. Thrace was the reſidence of Boreas, according to the ancients. Whenever the Hyperboreans made offerings they always ſent them towards the ſouth, and the people of Dodona were the firſt of the Greeks who received them. The word Hyperboreans is applied, in general, to all thoſe who inhabit any cold climate. Plin. 4, c. 12. l. 6, c. 17.—Mela. 3, c. 5.—Virg. G. 1, v. 240. l. 3, v. 169 & 381.—Herodot. 4, c. 13, &c.—Cic. N. D. 3, c. 23. l. 4, c. 12.

HYPEREA & HYPERĪA, a fountain of Theſſaly, with a town of the ſame name. Strab. 9.——Another in Meſſenia, in Peloponneſus. Flacc 1, v. 375.

HYPERESIA, a town of Achaia. Strab. 8.

HYPĔRĬDES, an Athenian orator, diſciple to Plato and Socrates, and long the rival of Demoſthenes His father's name was Glaucippus. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his eloquence, and the active part he took in the management of the Athenian republic. After the unfortunate battle of Cranon, he was taken alive, and, that he might not be compelled to betray the ſecrets of his country, he cut off his tongue. He was put to death by order of Antipater, B. C. 322. Only one of his numerous orations remains, admired for the ſweetneſs and elegance of his ſtile. It is ſaid, that Hyperides once defended the courtezan Phryne, who was accuſed of impiety, and that, when he ſaw his eloquence ineffectual, he unveiled the boſom of his client, upon which the judges, influenced by the ſight of her beauty, acquitted her. Plut. in Demoſt.—Cic. in Orat. 1, &c.—Quintil. 10, &c.

HYPĔRĪON, a ſon of Cœlus and Terra, who married Thea, by whom he had Aurora, the ſun and moon. Hyperion is often taken by the poets for the ſun itſelf. Heſiod. Theog.—Apollod. 1, c. 1 & 2. Homer. hymn. ad Ap.——A ſon of Priam. Apollod. 1, c. 2.

HYPERMNESTRA, one of the fifty daughters of Danaus, who married Lynceus, ſon of Ægyptus. She diſobeyed her father's bloody commands, who had ordered her to murder her huſband the firſt night of her nuptials, and ſuffered Lynceus to eſcape unhurt from the bridal bed. Her father ſummoned her to appear before a tribunal for her diſobedience, but the people acquitted her, and Danaus was reconciled to her and her huſband, to whom he left his kingdom at his death. Some ſay, that Lynceus returned to Argos with an army, and that he conquered and put to death his father-in-law, and uſurped his crown. Vid. Danaides. Pauſ. 2, c. 19.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Ovid. Heroid. 14.——A daughter of Theſtius. Apollod.

HYPERBATUS, a pretor of the Achæans, B. C. 224.

HYPHÆUS, a mountain of Campania. Plut. in Syll.

HYPSA, now Belici, a river of Sicily falling into the Criniſus. Ital. 14, v. 228.

HYPSEA,

Hypsea, a Roman matron, of the family of the Plautii. She was blind, according to Horace; or, perhaps, was partial to some lover, who was recommended neither by personal nor mental excellence. Horat. 1, sat. 2, v. 91.

Hypsēnor, a priest of the Scamander, killed during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 5.

Hypseus, a son of the river Peneus.——A pleader at the Roman bar before the age of Cicero. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 36.

Hypsicrătēa, the wife of Mithridates, who accompanied her husband in man's cloaths, when he fled before Pompey. Plut. in Pomp.

Hypsicrătes, a Phœnician, who wrote an history of his country, in the Phœnician language. This history was saved from the flames of Carthage, when that city was taken by Scipio, and translated into Greek.

Hypsipĭdes, a Macedonian in Alexander's army famous for his friendship for Menedemus, &c. Curt. 7, c. 7.

Hypsĭpўle, a queen of Lemnos, daughter of Thoas. During her reign, Venus, whose altars had been universally slighted, punished the Lemnian women, and rendered their mouths and breath so extremely offensive to the smell, that their husbands abandoned them and gave themselves up to some female slaves, whom they had taken in a war against Thrace. This contempt was highly resented by all the women of Lemnos, and they resolved on revenge, and all unanimously put to death their male relations, Hypsipyle alone excepted, who spared the life of her father Thoas. Soon after this cruel murder, the Argonauts landed at Lemnos, in their expedition to Colchis, and remained for some time in the island. During their stay the Argonauts rendered the Lemnian women mothers, and Jason, the chief of the Argonautic expedition, left Hypsipyle pregnant at his departure, and promised her eternal fidelity. Hypsipyle brought twins, Euneus and Nebrophonus, whom some have called Deiphilus or Thoas. Jason forgot his vows and promises to Hypsipyle, and the unfortunate queen was soon after forced to leave her kingdom by the Lemnian women, who conspired against her life, still mindful that Thoas had been preserved by means of his daughter. Hypsipyle, in her flight, was seized by pirates, and sold to Lycurgus, king of Nemæa. She was entrusted with the care of Archemorus, the son of Lycurgus; and, when the Argives marched against Thebes, they met Hypsipyle, and obliged her to show them a fountain, where they might quench their thirst. To do this more expeditiously, she laid down the child on the grass, and, in her absence, he was killed by a serpent. Lycurgus attempted to revenge the death of his son, but Hypsipyle was screened from his resentment by Adrastus, the leader of the Argives. Ovid. Heroid. 6.—Apollon. 1.—Stat. 5. Theb.—Flac. 2.—Apollod. 1, c. 9. l. 3, c. 6.—Hygin. fab. 15, 74, &c. Vid. Archemorus.

Hyrcānia, a large country of Asia, at the north of Parthia, and at the west of Media, abounding in serpents, wild beasts, &c. It is very mountainous, and unfit for drawing a cavalry in order of battle. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 367.—Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 45.—Strab. 2 & 11.——A town of Lydia, destroyed by a violent earthquake in the age of Tiberius.—Liv. 37, c. 38.

Hyrcānum mare, a large sea, called also Caspian. Vid. Caspium mare.

Hyrcānus, a name common to some of the high priests of Judæa. Josephus.

Hyria, a country of Bœotia, near Aulis with a lake, river, and town of the same name. It is more probably situate near Tempe. It received its name from Hyrie, a woman, who wept so much for the loss of her son, that she was changed into a fountain. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 372.—Herodot. 7, c. 170.——A town of Isauria, on the Calycadnus.

Hyrieus & Hyreus, a peasant, or, as some say, a prince of Tanagra, who kindly entertained Jupiter, Neptune, and Mercury, when travelling over Bœotia. Being childless, he asked of the gods to give him a son without his marrying, as he promised his wife, who was lately dead, and whom he tenderly loved, that he never would marry again. The gods, to reward the hospitality of Hyreus, made water in the hide of a bull, which had been sacrificed the day before to their divinity, and they ordered him to wrap it up and bury it in the ground for nine months. At the expiration of the nine months, Hyreus opened the earth, and found a beautiful child in the bull's hide, whom he called Orion. Vid. Orion.

Hyrmina, a town of Elis, in Peloponnesus. Strab. 8.

Hyrneto & Hyrnetho, a daughter of Temenus, king of Argos, who married Deyphon, son of Celeus. She was the favorite of her father, who greatly enriched her husband. Apollod. 2, c. 6.—Paus. 2, c. 19.

Hyrnĭthium, a plain of Argos, fertile in olives.

Hyrtăcus, a Trojan of mount Ida, father to Nisus, one of the companions of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 177 & 406. Hence the patronymic of Hyrtacides is applied to Nisus. It is also applied to Hippocoon. Id. 5, v. 492.

Hysia, a town of Bœotia, built by Nycteus, Antiope's father.——A village of Argos.——A city of Arcadia.——The royal residence of the king of Parthia.

Hyspa, a river of Sicily. Ital. 14, v. 228,

Hyssus & Hyssi, a port and river of Cappadocia on the Euxine ſea.

Hystaspes, a noble Perſian, of the family of the Achæmenides. His father's name was Arſames. His ſon Darius reigned in Perſia after the murder of the uſurper Smerdis. It is ſaid, by Cteſias, that he wiſhed to be carried to ſee the royal monument which his ſon had built between two mountains. The prieſts who carried him, as reported, ſlipped the cord with which he was ſuſpended in aſcending the mountain, and he died of the fall. Hyſtaſpes was the firſt who introduced the learning and myſteries of the Indian Brachmans into Perſia, and to his reſearches in India the ſciences were greatly indebted, particularly in Perſia. Darius is called Hyſtaſpes, or ſon of Hyſtaſpes, to diſtinguiſh him from his royal ſucceſſors of the ſame name. Herodot. 1, c. 209. l. 5, c. 83. —Cteſias Fragm.

Hystieus. Vid. Hiſtiæus.

Ia, the daughter of Midas, who married Atys, &c.

Iacchus, a ſirname of Bacchus, ab ιαχειν, from the noiſe and ſhouts which the Bacchanals raiſed at the feſtivals of this deity. Virg. Ecl. 6, G. 1, v. 166.—Ovid. Met. 4, 15.——Some ſuppoſe him to be a ſon of Ceres; becauſe in the celebration of the Eleuſinian myſteries, the word Iachus was frequently repeated. Herodot. 8, c. 65.——Pauſ. 1, c. 2.

Iader, a river of Dalmatia.

Ialēmus, a wretched ſinger, ſon of the muſe Calliope. Athen. 14.

Ialmĕnus, a ſon of Mars and Aſtyoche, who went to the Trojan war, with 30 ſhips, with his brother Aſcalaphus. Homer. Il. 2.

Iālўsus, a town of Rhodes, built by Ialyſus, of whom Protogenes was making a beautiful painting when Demetrius Poliorcetes took Rhodes. The Telchines were born there. Ovid. Met. 7, fab. 9.—Plin. 35, c. 6. —Cic. 2, ad Attic. ep. 21.—Plut. in Dem. —Ælian. 12, c. 5.

Iambe, a ſervant maid of Metanira, wife of Celeus, king of Eleuſis, who tried to exhilarate Ceres, when ſhe travelled over Attica in queſt of her daughter Proſerpine. From the jokes and ſtories which ſhe made uſe of, free and ſatyrical verſes have been called Iambics. Apollod. 1, c. 5.

Iamblĭcus, a Greek author, who wrote the life of Pythagoras, and the hiſtory of his followers, an exhortation to philoſophy, a treatiſe againſt Porphyry's letter on the myſteries of the Egyptians, &c. He was a great favorite with the emperor Julian, and died A. D. 363.

Iamenus, a Trojan, killed by the Greeks. Homer.

Iamĭdæ, certain prophets among the Greeks, deſcended from Iamus, a ſon of Apollo, who received the gift of prophecy from his father, which remained among his poſterity. Pauſ. 6, c. 2.

Janĭcŭlum & Janicularius mons, one of the ſeven hills at Rome, joined to the city by Ancus Martius, and made a kind of citadel, to protect the place againſt an invaſion. This hill, (vid. Janus) which was on the oppoſite ſhore of the Tiber, was joined to the city by the bridge Sublicius, the firſt ever built acroſs that river, and perhaps in Italy. It was leſs inhabited than the other parts of the city, on account of the groſſneſs of the air, though from its top, the eye could have a commanding view of the whole city. It is famous for the burial of king Numa and the poet Italicus. Porſenna, king of Etruria, pitched his camp on mount Janiculum, and the ſenators took refuge there in the civil wars, to avoid the reſentment of Octavius. Liv. 1, c. 33, &c. —Dio. 47.—Ovid. 1, Faſt. v. 246.—Virg. 8, v. 358.—Mart. 4, ep. 64. l. 7, ep. 16.

Ianthe, a girl of Crete, who married Iphis. [Vid. Iphis.] Ovid. Met. 9, v. 714, &c.

Ianthea, one of the Oceanides.——One of the Nereides. Pauſ. 4, c. 30 —Homer. Il. 8.

Jānus, the moſt ancient king who reigned in Italy. He was a native of Theſſaly, and ſon of Apollo, according to ſome. He came to Italy where he planted a colony and built a ſmall town on the river Tiber, which he called Janiculum. Some authors make him ſon of Cœlus and Hecate; and others make him a native of Athens. During his reign, Saturn, driven from heaven by his ſon Jupiter, came to Italy, where Janus received him with much hoſpitality, and made him his colleague on the throne. Janus is repreſented with two faces, becauſe he was acquainted with the paſt and the future; or, according to others, becauſe he was taken for the ſun who opens the day at his riſing, and ſhuts it at his ſetting. Some ſtatues repreſented Janus with four heads. He ſometimes appeared with a beard, and ſometimes without. In religious religious ceremonies, his name was always invoked the firſt, becauſe he preſides over all gates and avenues, and it is through him only that prayers can reach the immortal gods. From that circumſtance, he often appears with a key in his right hand, and a rod in his left. Sometimes he holds the number 300 in one hand, and in the other 65, to ſhew that he preſides over the year, of which the firſt month bears his name. Some ſuppoſe that he is the ſame as the world, or Cœlus; and, from that circumſtance, they call him Eanus, ab eundo, becauſe of the revolution of the heavens. He was called by different names, ſuch as Conſivius a Conſerendo, becauſe he preſided over generation; Quirinus or Martialis, becauſe he preſided over war. He is alſo called Patulcius & Clauſius, becauſe the gates of his temples were opened during the time of war, and ſhut in time of peace. He was chiefly worſhipped among the Romans, where he had many temples, ſome erected to Janus Bifrons, others to Janus Quadrifrons. The temples of Quadrifrons were built with four equal ſides, with a door and three windows on each ſide. The four doors were the emblems of the four ſeaſons of the year, and the three windows in each of the ſides the three months of each ſeaſon, and, all together, the twelve months of the year. Janus was generally repreſented in ſtatues as a young man. After death, Janus was ranked among the gods, for his popularity, and the civilization which he had introduced among the wild inhabitants of Italy. His temple, which was always open in times of war, was ſhut only three times during above 700 years, under Numa, 234 B. C. and under Auguſtus, and during that long period of time, the Romans were continually employed in war. Ovid. Faſt. 1, v. 65, &c.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 607.—Varro de L. L. 1.—Macrob. Sat. 1.——A ſtreet at Rome, near the temple of Janus. It was generally frequented by uſurers and money-brokers, and bookſellers alſo kept their ſhops there. Horat. 1, ep. 1.

Japĕtus, a ſon of Cœlus or Titan, by Terra, who married Aſia, or, according to others, Clymene, by whom he had Atlas, Menœtius, Prometheus, and Epimetheus. The Greeks looked upon him as the father of all mankind. His ſons received the patronymic of Iapetionides. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 631.—Heſiod. Theog.—Apollod. 1, c. 1.

Iāsion & Iasius, a ſon of Jupiter and Electra, one of the Atlantides, who reigned over part of Arcadia, where he diligently applied himſelf to agriculture. He married the goddeſs Cybele or Ceres, and all the gods were preſent at the celebration of his nuptials. He had by Ceres two ſons, Philomelus and Plutus, to whom ſome have added a third, Corybas, who introduced the worſhip and myſteries of his mother in Phrygia. He had alſo a daughter whom he expoſed as ſoon as born, ſaying that he would raiſe only male children. The child, who was ſuckled by a ſhe-bear and preſerved, rendered herſelf famous afterwards under the name of Atalanta. Jaſion was killed with a thunderbolt of Jupiter, and ranked among the gods after death by the inhabitants of Arcadia. Heſiod. Theog.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 168.—Hygin. Poet. 2, c. 4.

Iāsis, a name given to Atalanta daughter of Iaſius.

Iasius, a ſon of Abas, king of Argos.——A ſon of Jupiter. Vid. Iaſion.

Jāson, a celebrated hero, ſon of Alcimede, daughter of Phylacus, by Æſon the ſon of Cretheus and Tyro the daughter of Salmoneus. Tyro, before her connection with Cretheus the ſon of Æolus, had two ſons, Pelias and Neleus by Neptune. Æſon was king of Iolchos, and at his death the throne was usurped by Pelias, on account of the tender youth of Jason, the lawful successor. The education of young Jason was entrusted to the care of the Centaur Chiron, and he was removed from the presence of the usurper, who had been informed by an oracle that one of the descendants of Æolus would dethrone him. After he had made the most rapid progress in every branch of science, Jason left the Centaur, and by his advice went to consult the oracle. He was ordered to go to Iolchos his native country covered with the spoils of a leopard, and dressed in the garments of a Magnesian. In his journey he was stopped by the inundation of the river Evenus or Enipeus, over which he was carried by Juno, who had changed herself into an old woman. In crossing the streams, he lost one of his sandals, and at his arrival at Iolchos, the singularity of his dress and the fairness of his complexion attracted the notice of the people, and drew a crowd around him in the market place. Pelias came to see him with the rest, and as he had been warned by the oracle to beware of a man who should appear at Iolchos with one foot bare, and the other shod, the appearance of Jason, who had lost one of his sandals alarmed him. His terrors were soon after augmented. Jason, accompanied by his friends, repaired to the palace of Pelias, and boldly demanded the kingdom which he had unjustly usurped. The boldness and popularity of Jason intimidated Pelias; he was unwilling to abdicate the crown, and yet he feared the resentment of his adversary. As Jason was young and ambitious of glory, Pelias, at once, to remove his immediate claims to the crown, reminded him that Æetes king of Colchis had severely treated, and inhumanly murdered their common relation Phryxus. He observed that such a treatment called aloud for punishment, and that the undertaking would be accompanied with much glory and fame. He farther added that his old age had prevented him from avenging the death of Phryxus, and that if Jason would undertake the expedition, he would resign to him the crown of Iolchos when he returned victorious from Colchis. Jason readily accepted a proposal which seemed to promise such military fame. His intended expedition was made known in every part of Greece, and the youngest and bravest of the Greeks assembled to accompany him, and share his toils and glory. They embarked on board a ship called Argo, and after a series of adventures they arrived at Colchis. (Vid. Argonautæ.) Æetes promised to restore the golden fleece, which was the cause of the death of Phryxus, and of the voyage of the Argonauts, provided they submitted to his conditions. Jason was to tame bulls who breathed flames, and who had feet and horns of brass, and to plough with them a field sacred to Mars. After this he was to sow in the ground the teeth of a serpent from which armed men would arise, whose fury would be converted against him who ploughed the field. He was also to kill a monstrous dragon who watched night and day at the foot of the tree on which the golden fleece was suspended. All were concerned for the fate of the Argonauts; but Juno, who watched with an anxious eye over the safety of Jason, extricated them from all these difficulties. Medea, the king's daughter, fell in love with Jason, and as her knowledge of herbs, enchantments and incantation was uncommon, she pledged herself to deliver her lover from all his dangers if he promised her eternal fidelity. Jason, not insensible to her charms and to her promise, vowed eternal fidelity in the temple of Hecate, and received from Medea whatever instruments and herbs could protect him against the approaching dangers. He appeared in the field of Mars, he tamed the fury of the oxen, ploughed the plain, and sowed the dragon's teeth. Immediately an army of men sprang from the field, and ran towards Jason. He threw a stone among them, and they fell one upon the other till all were totally destroyed. The vigilance of the dragon was lulled to sleep by the power of herbs, and Jason took from the tree the celebrated golden fleece, which was the sole object of his voyage. These actions were all performed in the presence of Æetes and his people, who were all equally astonished at the boldness and success of Jason. After this celebrated conquest, Jason immediately set sail for Europe with Medea, who had been so instrumental in his preservation. Upon this Æetes, desirous to revenge the perfidy of his daughter Medea, sent his son Absyrtus to pursue the fugitives. Medea killed her brother, and strewed his limbs in her father's way, that she might more easily escape, while he was employed in collecting the mangled body of his son. (Vid. Absyrtus.) The return of the Argonauts in Thessaly was celebrated with universal festivity; but Æson, Jason's father, was unable to attend on account of the infirmities of old age. This obstruction was removed, and Medea, at the request of her husband, restored Æson to the vigor and sprightliness of youth. (Vid. Æson.) Pelias the usurper of the crown of Iolchos, wished also to see himself restored to the flower of youth, and his daughters, persuaded by Medea, who wished to avenge her husband's wrongs, cut his body to pieces, and placed his limbs in a cauldron of boiling water. Their credulity was severely punished. Medea suffered the flesh to be consumed to the bones, and Pelias was never restored to life. This inhuman action drew the resentment of the the populace upon Medea, and she fled to Corinth with her husband Jason, where they lived in perfect union and love during ten successive years. Jason's partiality for Glauce, the daughter of the king of the country, afterwards disturbed their matrimonial happiness, and Medea was divorced that Jason might more freely indulge his amorous propensities. This infidelity was severely revenged by Medea, (Vid. Glauce) who destroyed her children in the presence of their father. (Vid. Medea.) After his separation from Medea, Jason lived an unsettled and melancholy life. As he was one day reposing himself by the side of the ship which had carried him to Colchis, a beam fell upon his head, and he was crushed to death. This tragical event had been predicted to him before by Medea, according to the relation of some authors. Some say that he afterwards returned to Colchis, where he seized the kingdom, and reigned in great security. Eurip. in Med.—*Ovid. Ibi, an Indian nation.

Ibis, a poem of the poet Callimachus, in which he bitterly satyrizes the ingratitude of his pupil the poet Apollonius. Ovid has also written a poem which bears the same name, and which in the same satyrical language seems, according to the opinion of some, to inveigh bitterly against Hyginus the supposed hero of the composition.

Ibycus, a lyric poet of Rhegium about 540 years before Christ. He was murdered by robbers, and at the moment of death he implored the assistance of some cranes which at that moment flew over his head. Some time after as the murderers were in the market place, one of them observed some cranes in the air, and said to his companions, αἱ Ἴβυκου ἐκδικοι πάρεισιν, there are the birds that are conscious of the death of Ibycus. These words and the recent murder of Ibycus raised suspicions in the people: the assassins were seized and tortured, and they confessed their guilt. Cic. 4. Tusc. c. 43.—Ælian. V. H.——The husband of Chloris whom Horace ridicules, 3 od. 15.

Icaris & Icariotis, a name given to Penelope as daughter of Icarius.

Icarium mare, a part of the Ægean sea near the islands of Mycone and Gyaros. Vid. Icarus.

Icarius, an Athenian, father of Erigone. He gave wine to some peasants who drank it with the greatest avidity, ignorant of its intoxicating nature. They were soon deprived of their reason, and the fury and resentment of their friends and neighbours were immediately turned upon Icarius, who perished by their hands. After death he was honored with public festivals, and his daughter was led to discover the place of his burial by means of his faithful dog Mœra. Erigone hung herself in despair, and was changed into a constellation called Virgo, Icarius was changed into the star Bootes, and the dog Mœra into the star Canis. Hygin. fab. 130.—Apollod. 3, c. 14.——A son of Œbalus of Lacedæmon. He gave his daughter Penelope in marriage to Ulysses king of Ithaca, but he was so tenderly attached to her, that he wished her husband to settle at Lacedæmon. Ulysses refused, and when he saw the earnest petitions of Icarius, he told told Penelope as they were going to embark, that she might choose freely either to follow him to Ithaca, or to remain with her father. Penelope blushed in the deepest silence, and covered her head with her veil. Icarius upon this permitted his daughter to go to Ithaca, and immediately erected a temple to the goddess of modesty, on the spot where Penelope had covered her blushes with her veil. Homer. Od.

Icărus, a son of Dædalus, who, with his father, fled with wings from Crete to escape the resentment of Minos. His flight being too high proved fatal to him, the sun melted the wax which cemented his wings, and he fell into that part of the Ægean sea which was called after his name. [Vid. Dædalus.] Ovid. Met. 8, v. 178, &c.——A mountain of Attica.

Iculisma, a town of Gaul, now Angoulesme, on the Charente.

Ida, a nymph of Crete who went into Phrygia, where she gave her name to a mountain of that country. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 177.——The mother of Minos 2d.—— A celebrated mountain, or more properly a ridge of mountains in Troas, chiefly in the neighbourhood of Troy. The abundance of its waters became the source of many rivers, and particularly of the Simois, Scamander, Æsepus, Granicus, &c. It was on mount Ida that the shepherd Paris adjudged the prize of beauty to the goddess Venus. It was covered with green wood, and the elevation of its top opened a fine extensive view of the Hellespont and the adjacent countries, from which reason the poets say that it was frequented by the gods during the Trojan war. Strab. 13.—Mela. 1, c. 18.—*Homer. Idanthyrsus, a powerful king of Scythia, who refused to give his daughter in marriage to Darius the 1st, king of Persia. This refusal was the cause of a war between the two nations, and Darius marched against Idanthyrsus, at the head of 700,000 men. He was defeated and retired to Persia, after an inglorious campaign. Strab. 13.

Idarnes, an officer of Darius, by whose negli-negligence the Macedonians took Miletus. Curt. 4, c. 5.

Idas, a ſon of Aphareus and Arane, famous for his valor and military glory. He was among the Argonauts, and married Marpeſſa the daughter of Evenus king of Ætolia. Marpeſſa was carried away by Apollo, and Idas purſued his wife's raviſher with bows and arrows, and obliged him to reſtore her. [Vid. Marpeſſa.] According to Apollodorus, Idas with his brother Lynceus aſſociated with Pollux and Caſtor to carry away ſome flocks; but when they had obtained a ſufficient quantity of plunder, they refuſed to divide it into equal ſhares. This provoked the ſons of Leda, Lynceus was killed by Caſtor, and Idas, to revenge his brother's death, immediately killed Caſtor, and in his turn periſhed by the hand of Pollux. According to Ovid and Pauſanias, the quarrel between the ſons of Leda and thoſe of Aphareus aroſe from a more tender cauſe: Idas and Lynceus, as they ſay, were going to celebrate their nuptials with Phœbe and Hilaira the two daughters of Leucippus; but Caſtor and Pollux, who had been invited to partake the common feſtivity, offered violence to the brides, and carried them away. Idas and Lynceus fell in the attempt to recover their wives. Homer. Il. 9.—Hygin. fab 14, 100, &c.—*Ovid. Idŏmĕne, a daughter of Pheres, who married Amythaon. Apollod. 1, c. 9.

Idŏmĕneus, ſucceeded his father Deucalion on the throne of Crete, and accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war, with a fleet of 90 ſhips. During this celebrated war he rendered himſelf famous by his valor, and ſlaughtered many of the enemy. At his return he made a vow to Neptune in a dangerous tempeſt, that if he eſcaped from the fury of the ſeas and ſtorms, he would offer to the god whatever living creature firſt preſented itſelf to his eye on the Cretan ſhore. This was no other than his ſon, who came to congratulate his father upon his ſafe return. Idomeneus performed his promiſe to the god, and the inhumanity and raſhneſs of his ſacrifice rendered him ſo odious in the eyes of his ſubjects, that he left Crete, and migrated in queſt of a ſettlement. He came to Italy and founded a city on the coaſt of Calabria, which he called Salentum. He died in an extreme old age, after he had had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing his new kingdom floriſh, and his ſubjects happy. According to the Greek ſcholiaſt of Lycophron, v. 1217, Idomeneus, during his abſence in the Trojan war, entruſted the management of his kingdom to Leucos, to whom he promiſed his daughter Cliſithere in marriage at his return. Leucos, at firſt governed with moderation; but he was perſuaded by Nauplius, king of Eubœa, to put to death Meda the wife of his maſter, with her daughter Cliſithere, and to ſeize the kingdom. After theſe violent meaſures, he ſtrengthened himſelf on the throne of Crete; and Idomeneus, at his return, found it impoſſible to expel the uſurper. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 358.—Hygin. 92.—*Homer. ILUA, now Elba, an island in the Tyrrhene sea, celebrated for its iron mines. The people are called Iluates. Liv. 30, c. 39. —Virg. Æn. 10, v. 173.—Plin. 3, c. 6. 34, c. 14.

ILURO, now Oleron, a town of Gascony in France.

ILUS, the 4th king of Troy, was son of Tros by Callirhoe. He married Eurydice the daughter of Adrastus, by whom he had Themis, who married Capys, and Laomedon the father of Priam. He built, or rather embellished, the city of Ilium, called also Troy, from his father Tros. Jupiter gave him the Palladium, a celebrated statue of Minerva, and promised that as long as it remained in Troy, so long would the town remain impregnable. When the temple of Minerva was in flames, Ilus rushed into the middle of the fire to save the Palladium, for which action he was deprived of his sight by the goddess; though he recovered it some time after. Homer. Il.—Hyg. fab. 13.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 33. l. 6, v. 419.——A name of Ascanius, while he was at Troy. Virg. Æn 1, v. 272.——A friend of Turnus, killed by Pallas. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 400.

IMANUENTIUS, a king of part of Britain, killed by Cassivelaunus, &c. Cæs. bell. G. 5.

IMAUS, a large mountain of Scythia, which is part of mount Taurus. It divides Scythia, which is generally called Intra Imaum, and Extra Imaum. It extends, according to some, as far as the boundaries of the eastern ocean. Plin. 6, c. 17.—Strab. 1.

IMBĂRUS, a part of mount Taurus, in Armenia.

IMBRĂCĬDES, a patronymic given to Asius, as son of Imbracus. Virg. Æn. 10, v. 123.

IMBRĂSĬDES, a patronymic given to Glaucus and Lades, as sons of Imbrasus. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 343.

IMBRĂSUS, or Parthenius, a river of Samos. Juno, who was worshipped on the banks, received the surname of Imbrasia. Paus. 7, c. 4.——The father of Pirus, the leader of the Thracians during the Trojan war. Virg. Æn. 10 & 12.—Homer. Il. 4.

IMBREUS, one of the Centaurs, killed by Dryas at the nuptials of Pirithous. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 310.

IMBRIUS, a Trojan killed by Teucer, son of Mentor. He had married Medesicaste, Priam's daughter. Homer. Il. 13.

IMBRIVIUM, a place of Samnium.

IMBROS, now Embro, an island of the Ægean sea, near Thrace, 32 miles from Samothrace, with a small river and town of the same name. Imbros was governed for some time by its own laws, but afterwards subjected to the power of Persia, Athens, Macedonia, and the kings of Pergamus. It afterwards became a Roman province. Thucyd. 8.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Homer. Il. 13.—Strab. 2.—Mela. 2, c. 7. —Ovid. Trist. 10, v. 18.

INĂCHI, a name given to the Greeks, particularly the Argives, from king Inachus.

INACHIA, a name given to Peloponnesus, from the river Inachus.——A festival in Crete in honor of Inachus; or, according to others, of Ino's misfortunes.——A courtezan in the age of Horace. Epod. 12.

INĂCHĬDÆ, the name of the eight first successors of Inachus, on the throne of Argos.

INĂCHĬDES, a patronymic of Epaphus, as grandson of Inachus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 704.——And of Perseus descended from Inachus. Id. 4, fab. 11.

INĂCHIS, a patronymic of Io, as daughter of Inachus. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 454.

INĂCHIUM, a town of Peloponnesus.

INĂCHUS, a ſon of Oceanus and Tethys, father of Io. He founded the kingdom of Argos, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Phoroneus, B. C. 1807, and gave his name to a river of Argos, of which he became the tutelar deity. He reigned 60 years. Virg. G. 3, v. 151.—Apollod. 2, c. 3.—Pauſ.——A river of Argos.——Another in Epirus.

INAMĂMES, a river in the eaſt of Aſia, as far as which Semiramis extended her empire. Polyæn. 8.

INARĬME, an iſland near Campania, with a mountain, under which Jupiter confined the giant Typhœus. It is now called Iſchia, and is remarkable for its fertility and population. There was formerly a volcano in the middle of the iſland. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 716.

INĂRUS, a town of Egypt, in whoſe neighbourhood the town of Naucratis was built by the Mileſians.——A tyrant of Egypt, who died B. C. 456.

INCITĀTUS, a horſe of the emperor Caligula, made high prieſt.

INDATHYRSUS. Vid. Idanthyrſus.

INDIA, the moſt celebrated and opulent of all the countries of Aſia, bounded on one ſide by the Indus, from which it derives its name. It is ſituate at the ſouth of the kingdoms of Perſia, Parthia, &c. along the maritime coaſts. It has always been reckoned famous for the riches it contains; and ſo perſuaded were the antients of its wealth, that they ſuppoſed that its very ſands were gold. It contained 9000 different nations, and 5000 remarkable cities, according to geographers. Bacchus was the firſt who conquered it. In more recent ages, part of it was tributary to the power of Perſia. Alexander invaded it; but his conqueſt was checked by the valor of Porus, one of the kings of the country, and the Macedonian warrior was unwilling or afraid to engage another. Semiramis alſo extended her empire far in India. The Romans knew little of the country, yet their power was ſo univerſally dreaded, that the Indians paid homage by their ambaſſadors to the emperor Antoninus, Trajan, &c. India is divided into ſeveral provinces. There is an India extra Gangem, an India intra Gangem, and an India propria; but theſe diviſions are not particularly noticed by the antients. Diod. 1.—Strab. 1, &c.—Mela. 3, c. 7.—Plin. 5, c. 28.—Curt. 8, c. 10.—Juſtin. 1, c. 2. l. 12, c. 7.

INDIBĬLIS, a princeſs of Spain, betrothed to Albutius.

INDĬGĔTES, a name given to thoſe deities who were worſhipped only in ſome particular places, or who were become gods from men, as Hercules, Bacchus, &c. Some derive the word from inde & geniti, born at the ſame place where they received their worſhip. Virg. G. 1, v. 498.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 608.

INDĬGĔTI, a people of Spain.

INDUS, now Sinde, a large river of Aſia, from which the adjacent country has received the name of India. It falls into the Indian ocean by two mouths. According to Plato, it was larger than the Nile; and Pliny ſays, that 19 rivers diſcharge themſelves into it, before it falls into the ſea. Cic. N. D. 2, c. 52.—Strab. 15.—Curt. c. 9.—Diod. 2.—Ovid. Faſt. 3, v. 720.—Plin. 6, c. 20.——A river of Caria. Liv. 38, c. 14.

INDUTIOMARUS, a Gaul conquered by Cæſar, &c. Cæſ. B. G.

INFERUM MARE, the Tuſcan ſea.

INO, a daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, who nurſed Bacchus. She married Athamas, king of Thebes, after he had divorced Nephele, by whom he had two children, Phryxus and Helle. Ino became mother of Melicerta and Learchus, and ſoon conceived an implacable hatred againſt the children of Nephele, becauſe they were to aſcend the throne in preference to her own. Phryxus and Helle, were informed of Ino's machinations, and they eſcaped to Colchis on a golden ram. (Vid. Phryxus.) Juno, jealous of Ino's proſperity, reſolved to diſturb her peace; and more particularly becauſe ſhe was of the deſcendants of her greateſt enemy, Venus. Tiſiphone was ſent, by order of the goddeſs, to the houſe of Athamas; and ſhe filled the whole palace with ſuch fury, that Athamas taking Ino to be a lioneſs, and her children whelps, purſued her and daſhed her ſon Learchus againſt a wall. Ino eſcaped from the fury of her huſband, and from a high rock ſhe threw herſelf into the ſea, with Melicerta in her arms. The gods pitied her fate, and Neptune made her a ſea deity, which was afterwards called Leucothoe. Melicerta became alſo a ſea god, known by the name of Palæmon. Homer. od. 5.—Cic. Tuſc. Nat. D. 3, c. 48.—Plut. Symp. 5.—Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 13, &c.—Pauſ. 1, 2, &c.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Hygin. fab. 12, 14 & 15.

INŌA, feſtivals in memory of Ino, celebrated yearly with ſports and ſacrifices at Corinth. An anniverſary ſacrifice was alſo offered to Ino at Megara, where ſhe was firſt worſhipped, under the name of Leucothoe.——Another in Laconia, in honor of the ſame. It was uſual at the celebration, to throw cakes of flour into a pond, which, if they ſunk, were preſages of proſperity; but if they ſwam on the face of the waters, they were inauſpicious and very unlucky.

Inous, a patronymic given to the god Palæmon, as ſon of Ino. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 823.

Inōpus, a river of Delos, which the inhabitants ſuppoſe to be the Nile, coming from Egypt under the ſea. It was near its banks that Apollo and Diana were born. Plin. 2, c. 103.—Flacc. 5, v. 105.—Strab. 6.—Pauſ. 2, c. 4.

Insŭbres, the inhabitants of Inſubria, a country near the Po, ſuppoſed to be of Gallic origin. They were conquered by the Romans, and their country became a province, where the modern towns of Milan and Pavia were built. Strab. 5.—Tacit. A. 11, c. 23.—Plin. 3, c. 17.—Liv. 5, c. 34.

Intaphernes, one of the ſeven Perſian noblemen who conſpired againſt Smerdis, who uſurped the crown of Perſia. He was ſo diſappointed for not obtaining the crown, that he fomented ſeditions againſt Darius who had been raiſed to the throne after the death of the uſurper. When the king had ordered him and all his family to be put to death, his wife, by frequently viſiting the palace, excited the compaſſion of Darius, who pardoned her, and permitted her to redeem from death any one of her relations whom ſhe pleaſed. She obtained her brother; and when the king expreſſed his aſtoniſhment, becauſe ſhe preferred him to her huſband and children, ſhe replied that ſhe could procure another huſband, and children likewiſe; but that ſhe could never have another brother, as her father and mother were dead. Intaphernes was put to death. Herodot. 3.

Intemelium, a town near the Alps. Cic. Div. 8, c. 14.

Interamna, an ancient city of Umbria, the birth place of the hiſtorian Tacitus, and of the emperor of the ſame name. It is ſituate between two branches of the Nar, (inter amnes) whence its name. Varro. L. L. 4, c. 5.—Tacit. Hiſt. 2, c. 64.——A colony on the confines of Samnium, on the Liris.

Intercatia, a town of Spain.

Interrex, a ſupreme magiſtrate at Rome, who was entruſted with the care of the government after the death of a king, till the election of another. This office was exerciſed by the ſenators alone, and none continued in power longer than five days, or, according to Plutarch, only 12 hours. The firſt interrex mentioned in Roman hiſtory, is after the death of Romulus, when the Romans quarrelled with the Sabines concerning the choice of a king. There was ſometimes an interrex during the conſular government; but this happened only to hold aſſemblies in the abſence of the magiſtrates, or when the election of any of the acting officers was diſputed. Liv. 1, c. 17.—Dionyſ. 2.

Inui castrum. Vid. Caſtrum Inui. It received its name from Inu[illegible] a divinity ſuppoſed to be the ſame as t[illegible] Faunus of the Latins, and worſhipped in this city.

Inycus, a city of Sicily. Herodot.

Io, daughter of Inachus, or, according to others, of Jaſus or Pirene, was prieſteſs of Juno at Argos. Jupiter became enamoured of her; but Juno, jealous of his intrigues, diſcovered the object of his affection, and ſurpriſed him in the company of Io. Jupiter changed his miſtreſs into a beautiful heifer; and the goddeſs, who well knew the fraud, obtained from her huſband the animal, whoſe beauty ſhe had condeſcended to commend. Juno commanded the hundred-eyed Argus to watch the heifer; but Jupiter anxious for the ſituation of Io, ſent Mercury to deſtroy Argus, and to reſtore her to liberty. (Vid. Argus.) Io, freed from the vigilance of Argus, was now perſecuted by Juno; who ſent one of the furies, or rather a malicious inſect, to torment her. She wandered over the greateſt part of the earth, and croſſed over the ſea, till at laſt ſhe ſtopped on the banks of the Nile, ſtill expoſed to the unceaſing torments of Juno's inſect. Here ſhe intreated Jupiter to reſtore her to her ancient form; and when the god had changed her from a heifer into a woman, ſhe brought forth Epaphus. Afterwards ſhe married Telegonus king of Egypt or Oſiris, according to others, and ſhe treated her ſubjects with ſuch mildneſs and humanity, that, after death, ſhe received divine honors, and was worſhipped under the name of Iſis. According to Herodotus, Io was carried away by Phœnician merchants, who wiſhed to make repriſals for Europa, who had been ſtolen from them by the Greeks. Some ſuppoſe that Io never came to Egypt. She is ſometimes called Phoronis, from her brother Phoroneus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 748.—Pauſ. 1, c. 25. l. 3, c. 18.——Moſchus.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 789.—Hygin. fab. 145.

Iobates & Jobates, a king of Lycia father of Stenobæa, the wife of Prœtus, king of Argos. He was ſucceeded on the throne by Bellorophon, to whom he had given one of his daughters, called Philonoe, in marriage. (Vid. Bellorophon.) Apollod. 2, c. 2.—Hygin. fab. 57.

Iobes, a ſon of Hercules by a daughter of Theſpius. He died in his youth. Apollod. 2, c. 7.

Jocasta, a daughter of Menœceus, who married Laius, king of Thebes, by whom ſhe had Œdipus. She afterwards married her

her ſon Œdipus, without knowing who he was, and had by him Eteocles, Polynices, &c. (Vid. Laius, Œdipus.) When ſhe diſcovered that ſhe had married her own ſon, and had been guilty of inceſt, ſhe hanged herſelf in deſpair. She is called Epicaſta by ſome mythologiſts. Stat. Theb. 8, v. 42.—Senec. & Sophocl. in Oedip.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Hygin. fab. 66. &c.—Homer. Od. 11.

IOLAIA, a feſtival at Thebes, the ſame as that called Heracleia. It was inſtituted in honor of Hercules and his friend Iolas, who aſſiſted him in conquering the hydra. It continued during ſeveral days, on the firſt of which were offered ſolemn ſacrifices. The next day horſe races and athletic exerciſes were exhibited. The following day was ſet apart for wreſtling; the victors were crowned with garlands of myrtle, generally uſed at funeral ſolemnities. They were ſometimes rewarded with tripods of braſs. The place where the exerciſes were exhibited was called Iolaion, where there were to be ſeen the monument of Amphitryon, and the cenotaph of Iolas, who was buried in Sardinia. Theſe monuments were ſtrewed with garlands and flowers on the day of the feſtival.

IŎLAS or IOLĀUS, a ſon of Iphiclus, king of Theſſaly, who aſſiſted Hercules in conquering the hydra, and burnt with a hot iron the place where the heads had been cut off, to prevent the growth of others. (Vid. Hydra.) He was reſtored to his youth and vigor by Hebe, at the requeſt of his friend Hercules. Some time afterwards, Iolas aſſiſted the Heraclidæ againſt Euryſtheus, and killed the tyrant with his own hand. According to Plutarch, Iolas had a monument in Bœotia and Phocis, where lovers uſed to go and bind themſelves by the moſt ſolemn oaths of fidelity, conſidering the place as ſacred to love and friendſhip. According to Diodorus and Pauſanias, Iolas died and was buried in Sardinia, where he had gone to make a ſettlement at the head of the ſons of Hercules by the fifty daughters of Theſpius. Ovid. Met. 9. v. 399.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Pauſ. 10, c. 17.——A compiler of a Phœnician hiſtory ——A friend of Æneas, killed by Catillus in the Rutulian wars. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 640.——A ſon of Antipater, cup-bearer to Alexander. Plut.

IOLCHOS, a town of Magneſia, above Demetrias, where Jaſon was born. It was founded by Cretheus, ſon of Æolus and Enaretta. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Strab. 8.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Lucan. 3, v. 192.

IŎLE, a daughter of Eurytus, king of Œchalia. Her father promiſed her in marriage to Hercules, but he refuſed to perform his engagements, and Iole was carried away by force. (Vid. Eurytus.) It was to extinguiſh the love of Hercules for Iole, that Dejanira ſent him the poiſoned tunic, which cauſed his death. (Vid Hercules & Dejanira.) After the death of Hercules, Iole married his ſon Hyllus, by Dejanira. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 279.

ION, a ſon of Xuthus and Creuſa, daughter of Erechtheus, who married Helice, the daughter of Selinus, king of Ægiale. He ſucceeded on the throne of his father-in-law, and built a city, which he called Helice, on account of his wife. His ſubjects from him received the name of Ionians, and the country that of Ionia. (Vid. Iones & Ionia.) Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Pauſ. 7, c. 1.—Strab. 7.—Herodot. 7, c. 94, &c.——A tragic poet of Chios, whoſe tragedies, when repreſented at Athens, met with univerſal applauſe. He is mentioned and greatly commended by Ariſtophanes and Athenæus, &c. Athen. 10, &c.——A native of Epheſus, introduced in Plato's dialogues as reaſoning with Socrates.

IŌNE, one of the Nereides.

IŌNES, a name originally given to the ſubjects of Ion, who dwelt at Helice. In the age of Ion the Athenians made a war againſt the people of Eleuſis, and implored his aid againſt their enemies. Ion conquered the Eleuſinians and Eumolpus, who was at their head; and the Athenians, ſenſible of his ſervices, invited him to come and ſettle among them; and the more ſtrongly to ſhow their affection, they aſſumed the name of Ionians. Some ſuppoſe that, after this victory, Ion paſſed into Aſia Minor, at the head of a colony. When the Achæans were driven from Peloponneſus by the Heraclidæ, eighty years after the Trojan war, they came to ſettle among the Ionians, who were then maſters of Ægialus. They were ſoon diſpoſſeſſed of their territories by the Achæans, and went to Attica, where they met with a cordial reception. Their migration from Greece to Aſia Minor was about 60 years after the return of the Heraclidæ, B. C. 1044, and 80 years after the departure of the Æolians; and they therefore finally ſettled themſelves, after a wandering life of about 30 years.

IŌNIA, a country of Aſia Minor, bounded on the north by Æolia, on the weſt by the Ægean and Icarian ſeas, on the ſouth by Caria, and on the eaſt by Lydia and part of Caria. It was founded by colonies from Greece, and particularly Attica, by the Ionians, or ſubjects of Ion. Ionia was divided into twelve ſmall ſtates, which formed a celebrated confederacy, often mentioned by the ancients. Theſe twelve ſtates were Priene, Miletus, Colophon, Clazomenæ, Epheſus, Lebedos, Teos, Phocæa, Erythræ, Smyrna, and the capitals of Samos and Chios. The inhabitants of Ionia built a temple, which they called Pan Ionium, from the concourſe of of people that flocked there from every part of Ionia. After they had enjoyed for some time their freedom and independence, they were made tributary to the power of Lydia by Crœsus. The Athenians assisted them to shake off the slavery of the Asiatic monarchs; but they soon forgot their duty and relation to their mother country, and joined Xerxes when he invaded Greece. They were delivered from the Persian yoke by Alexander, and restored to their original independence. They were reduced by the Romans under the dictator Sylla. Ionia has been always celebrated for the salubrity of the climate, the fruitfulness of the ground, and the genius of its inhabitants. Herodot. 1, &c.—Strab. 14.—Mela. 1, c. 2, &c.—Paus. 7, c. 1.——An ancient name given to Hellas, or Achaia, because it was for some time the residence of the Ionians.

Iōnium mare, a part of the Mediterranean sea, at the bottom of the Adriatic, lying between Sicily and Greece. That part of the Ægean sea which lies on the coasts of Ionia, in Asia, is called the sea of Ionia, and not the Ionian sea. According to some authors, the Ionian sea receives its name from Io, who swam across there, after she had been metamorphosed into a heifer. Strab. 7, &c.—Dionys. Perieg.

Iōpas, a king of Africa, among the suitors of Dido. He was an excellent musician, poet, and philosopher. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 744.

Iōpe & Joppa, now Jafa, a famous town of Phœnicia, more ancient than the deluge, according to some traditions. It was about forty miles from the capital of Judæa, and was remarkable for a sea-port much frequented, though very dangerous, on account of the great rocks that lie before it. Strab. 16, &c.—Propert. 2, el. 28, v. 51.——A daughter of Iphicles, who married Theseus. Plut.

Iŏphon, a son of Sophocles, who accused his father of imprudence in the management of his affairs, &c.——A poet of Gnossus, in Crete. Paus. 1, c. 34.

Jordānes, a river of Judæa, illustrious in sacred history. It rises near mount Libanus, and after running through the lake Samachonitis, and that of Tiberias, it falls, after a course of 150 miles, into the Dead Sea. Strab. 16.

Jornandes, an historian, who wrote on the Goths. He died A. D. 552.

Ios, now Nio, an island in the Myrtoan sea, celebrated, as some say, for the tomb of Homer, and the birth of his mother. Plin. 4, c. 12.

Josēphus Flavius, a celebrated Jew, born in Jerusalem, who signalized his military abilities in supporting a siege of forty-seven days against Vespasian and Titus, in a small town of Judæa. When the city surrendered there were found not less than 40,000 Jews slain, and the number of captives amounted to 1,200. Josephus saved his life by flying into a cave, where 40 of his countrymen had also taken refuge. He dissuaded them from committing suicide, and, when they had all drawn lots to kill one another, Josephus fortunately remained the last, and surrendered himself to Vespasian. He gained the conqueror's esteem, by foretelling that he would become one day the master of the Roman empire. Josephus was present at the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, and received all the sacred books which it contained from the conqueror's hands. He came to Rome with Titus, where he was honored with the name and privileges of a Roman citizen. Here he made himself esteemed by the emperors Vespasian and Titus, and dedicated his time to study. He wrote the history of the wars of the Jews, first in Syriac, and afterwards translated it into Greek. This composition so pleased Titus, that he authenticated it by placing his signature upon it, and by preserving it in one of the public libraries. He finished another work, which he divided into 20 books, containing the history of the Jewish antiquities, in some places subversive of the authority and miracles mentioned in the Scriptures. He also wrote two books to defend the Jews against Apion, their greatest enemy; besides an account of his own life, &c. Josephus has been admired for his lively and animated style, the bold propriety of his expressions, the exactness of his descriptions, and the persuasive eloquence of his orations. He has been called the Livy of the Greeks. Though, in some cases, inimical to the Christians, yet he has commended our Saviour so warmly, that St. Jerome calls him a Christian writer. Josephus died A. D. 93, in the 56th year of his age. The best editions of his works are Hudson's, 2 vols. fol. Oxon 1720, and Havercamp's, 2 vols. fol. Amst. 1726. Sueton. &c. in Vesp. &c.

Joviānus Flavius Claudius, a native of Pannonia, elected emperor of Rome by the soldiers after the death of Julian. He at first refused to be invested with the imperial purple, because his subjects followed the religious principles of the late emperor; but they removed his groundless apprehensions, and, when they assured him that they were warm for Christianity, he accepted the crown. He made a disadvantageous treaty with the Persians, against whom Julian was marching with a victorious army. Jovian died seven months and twenty days after his ascension, and was found in his bed suffocated by the vapors of charcoal, which had been lighted in his room, A. D. 364. Some attribute his death to intemperance, and ſay that he was the ſon of a baker. He burned a celebrated library at Antioch. Marcellin.

IPHIANASSA, a daughter of Prœtus, king of Argos, who, with her ſiſters Iphinoe and Lyſippe, ridiculed Juno, &c. Vid. Proetides. ——The wife of Endymion.

IPHĬCLUS, or IPHICLES, a ſon of Amphitryon and Alcmena, born at the ſame birth with Hercules. As theſe two children were together in the cradle, Juno, jealous of Hercules, ſent two large ſerpents to deſtroy him. At the ſight of the ſerpents Iphicles alarmed the houſe, but Hercules, though not a year old, boldly ſeized them, one in each hand, and ſqueezed them to death. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Theocrit.——A king of Phylace, in Phthiotis, ſon of Philacus and Clymene. He had bulls famous for their bigneſs, and the monſter which kept them. Melampus, at the requeſt of his brother, [Vid. Melampus] attempted to ſteal them away, but he was caught in the fact, and impriſoned. Iphiclus ſoon received ſome advantages from the prophetical knowledge of his priſoner, and not only reſtored him to liberty, but alſo preſented him with the oxen. Iphiclus, who was childleſs, learned from the ſoothſayer how to become a father. He had married Automeduſa, and afterwards a daughter of Creon, king of Thebes. He was father to Podarce and Proteſilaus. Homer. Od. 11. Il. 13.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Pauſ. 4. c. 36.——A ſon of Theſtius, king of Pleuron. Apollod. 2, c. 1.

IPHICRĂTES, a celebrated general of Athens, who, though ſon of a ſhoemaker, roſe from the loweſt ſtation to the higheſt offices in the ſtate. He made war againſt the Thracians, obtained ſome victories over the Spartans, and aſſiſted the Perſian king againſt Egypt. He changed the dreſs and arms of his ſoldiers, and rendered them more alert and expeditious in uſing their weapons. He married a daughter of Cotys, king of Thrace, and died 380 B. C. When he was once reproached of the meanneſs of his origin, he obſerved, that he would be the firſt of his family, but that his detractor would be the laſt of his own. C. Nep. in Iphic.——A ſculptor of Athens.——An Athenian, ſent to Darius the Third, king of Perſia, &c. Curt. 3, c. 13.

IPHĬDĂMUS, a ſon of Antenor, killed by Agamemnon. Homer. Il. 11.

IPHĬDĔMĪA, a Theſſalian woman, raviſhed by the Naxians, &c.

IPHĬGĔNĪA, a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemneſtra. When the Greeks, going to the Trojan war, were detained by contrary winds at Aulis, they were informed by one of the ſoothſayers, that, to appeaſe the gods, they muſt ſacrifice Iphigenia, Agamemnon's daughter, to Diana. [Vid. Agamemnon.] The father, who had provoked the goddeſs by killing her favorite ſtag, heard this with the greateſt horror and indignation, and rather than to ſhed the blood of his daughter, he commanded one of his heralds, as chief of the Grecian forces, to order all the aſſembly to depart each to his reſpective home. Ulyſſes and the other generals interfered, and Agamemnon conſented to immolate his daughter for the common cauſe of Greece. As Iphigenia was tenderly loved by her mother, the Greeks ſent for her on pretence of giving her in marriage to Achilles. Clytemneſtra gladly permitted her departure, and Iphigenia came to Aulis: here ſhe ſaw the bloody preparations for the ſacrifice; ſhe implored the forgiveneſs and protection of her father, but tears and entreaties were unavailing. Calchas took the knife in his hand, and, as he was going to ſtrike the fatal blow, Iphigenia ſuddenly diſappeared, and a goat of uncommon ſize and beauty was found in her place for the ſacrifice. This ſupernatural change animated the Greeks, the wind ſuddenly became favorable, and the combined fleet ſet ſail from Aulis. Iphigenia's innocence had raiſed the compaſſion of the goddeſs on whoſe altar ſhe was going to be ſacrificed, and ſhe carried her to Taurica, where ſhe entruſted her with the care of her temple. In this ſacred office Iphigenia was obliged, by the command of Diana, to ſacrifice all the ſtrangers which came into that country. Many had already been offered as victims on the bloody altar, when Oreſtes and Pylades came to Taurica. Their mutual and unparalleled friendſhip, [Vid. Pylades & Oreſtes] diſcloſed to Iphigenia that one of the ſtrangers whom ſhe was going to ſacrifice was her brother; and, upon this, ſhe conſpired with the two friends to fly from the barbarous country, and carry away the ſtatue of the goddeſs. They ſucceſsfully effected their enterpriſe, and murdered Thoas, who enforced the human ſacrifices. According to ſome authors, the Iphigenia who was ſacrificed at Aulis was not a daughter of Agamemnon, but a daughter of Helen, by Theſeus. Homer does not ſpeak of the ſacrifice of Iphigenia, though very minute in the deſcription of the Grecian forces, adventures, &c. The ſtatue of Diana, which Iphigenia brought away, was afterwards placed in the grove of Aricia in Italy. Pauſ. 2, c. 22. l. 3, c. 16.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 31.—*Virg. IPHĬMĔDĪA, a daughter of Triopas, who married married the giant Alcœus. She fled from her husband, and had two sons, Otus and Ephialtes, by Neptune, her father's father. Homer. Od. 11.—Paus. 9, c. 22.—Apollod. 1, c. 7.

Iphimedon, a son of Eurystheus, killed in a war against the Athenians and Heraclidæ. Apollod.

Iphimĕdūsa, one of the daughters of Danaus, who married Euchenor. Vid. Danaides.

Iphinoe, one of the principal women of Lemnos, who conspired to destroy all the males of the island after their return from a Thracian expedition. Flacc. 2, v. 163.——One of the daughters of Prœtus. She died of a disease while under the care of Melampus. Vid. Prœtides.

Iphis, son of Alector, succeeded his father on the throne of Argos. He advised Polynices, who wished to engage Amphiaraus in the Theban war, to bribe his wife Eriphyle, by giving her the golden collar of Harmonia.. This succeeded, and Eriphyle betrayed her husband. Apollod. 3.—Flacc. 1, 3, & 7.——A beautiful youth of Salamis, of ignoble birth. He became enamoured of Anaxarete, and the coldness and contempt he met with rendered him so desperate that he hung himself. Anaxarete saw him carried to his grave without emotion, and was instantly changed into a stone. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 703.——A daughter of Thespius. Apollod.——A mistress of Patroclus, given him by Achilles. Homer. Il. 9.——A daughter of Ligdus and Telethusa, of Crete. When Telethusa was pregnant, Ligdus ordered her to destroy her child if it proved a daughter, because his poverty could not afford to maintain an useless charge. The severe orders of her husband alarmed Telethusa, and she would have obeyed, had not Isis commanded her in a dream to spare the life of her child. Telethusa brought forth a daughter, which was given to a nurse, and passed for a boy, under the name of Iphis. Ligdus continued ignorant of the deceit, and, when Iphis was come to the years of puberty, her father resolved to give her in marriage to Ianthe, the beautiful daughter of Telestes. A day to celebrate the nuptials was appointed, but Telethusa and her daughter were equally anxious to put off the marriage; and, when all was unavailing, they implored the assistance of Isis, by whose advice the life of Iphis had been preserved. The goddess was moved, she changed the sex of Iphis, and, on the morrow, the nuptials were consummated with the greatest rejoicings. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 666, &c.

Iphition, an ally of the Trojans, killed by Achilles. Homer. Il. 20.

Iphĭtus, a son of Eurytus, king of Œchalia. When his father had promised his daughter Iole to him who could overcome him or his sons in drawing the bow, Hercules accepted the challenge, and came off victorious. Eurytus refused his daughter to the conqueror, observing, that Hercules had killed one of his wives in a fury, and that Iole might perhaps share the same fate. Some time after, Autolycus stole away the oxen of Eurytus, and Hercules was suspected of the theft. Iphitus was sent in quest of the oxen, and, in his search, he met with Hercules, whose good favors he had gained by advising Eurytus to give Iole to the conqueror. Hercules assisted Iphitus in seeking the lost animals; but, when he recollected the ingratitude of Eurytus, he killed Iphitus by throwing him down from the walls of Tyrinthus. Homer. Od. 21.—Apollod. 2, c. 6.——A Trojan, who survived the ruin of his country, and fled with Æneas to Italy. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 340, &c.——A king of Elis, son of Praxonides, in the age of Lycurgus. He re-established the Olympic games 338 years after their institution by Hercules, or about 884 years before the Christian era. This epoch is famous in chronological history, as every thing previous to it seems involved in fabulous obscurity. Paterc. 1, c. 8.—Paus. 5, c. 4.

Iphthime, a sister of Penelope, who married Eumelus. She appeared to her sister in a dream, to comfort her in the absence of her son Telemachus. Hom. Od. 4.

Ipsea, the mother of Medea. Ovid. Heroid. 17, v. 232.

Ipsus, a place of Phrygia, celebrated for a battle which was fought there about 301 years before the Christian era, between Antigonus and his son, and Seleucus, Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Cassander. The former led into the field an army of above 70,000 foot and 10,000 horse, with 75 elephants. The latter's forces consisted of 64,000 infantry, besides 10,500 horse, 400 elephants, and 120 armed chariots. Antigonus and his son were defeated Plut. in Demetr.

Ira, a city of Messenia, which Agamemnon promised to Achilles, if he would resume his arms to fight against the Trojans. This place is famous in history as having supported a siege of eleven years against the Lacedæmonians. Its capture, B. C. 671, put an end to the second Messenian war. Hom. Il. 9.—Strab. 7.

Irēne, a daughter of Cratinus the painter. Plin. 35, c. 11.——One of the seasons among the Greeks, called by the moderns

Horæ. Her two ſiſters were Dia and Eunomia, all daughters of Jupiter and Themis. Apollod. 1, c. 3.

IRENÆUS, a native of Greece, diſciple of Polycarp, and biſhop of Lyons in France. He wrote on different ſubjects; but, as what remains is in Latin, ſome ſuppoſe he compoſed in that language, and not in Greek. Fragments of his works in Greek are however preſerved, which prove that his ſtile was ſimple, though clear and often animated. His opinions concerning the ſoul are curious. He ſuffered martyrdom A. D. 202. The beſt edition of his works is that of Grabe, Oxon. fol. 1702.

IRESUS, a delightful ſpot in Libya, near Cyrene, where Battus fixed his reſidence. The Egyptians were once defeated there by the inhabitants of Cyrene. Herodot. 4, c. 158, &c.

IRIS, a daughter of Thaumas and Electra, one of the Oceanides, meſſenger of the gods, and more particularly of Juno. Her office was to cut the thread which ſeemed to detain the ſoul in the body of thoſe that were expiring. She is the ſame as the rainbow, and, from that circumſtance, ſhe is repreſented with all the variegated and beautiful colors of the rainbow, and appears ſitting behind Juno ready to execute her commands. She is likewiſe deſcribed as ſupplying the clouds with water to deluge the world. Heſiod. Theog.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 271 & ſeq. l. 4, v. 480. l. 11, v. 585.—*Virg. IRUS, a beggar of Ithaca, who executed the commiſſions of Penelope's ſuitors. When Ulyſſes returned home, diſguiſed in a beggar's dreſs, Irus hindered him from entering the gates, and even challenged him. Ulyſſes brought him to the ground with a blow, and dragged him out of the houſe. Hom. Od. 8.—Ovid. Triſt. 3, el. 7, v. 42.——A mountain of India.

IS, a ſmall river falling into the Euphrates. Its waters abound with bitumen. Herodot. 1, c. 179.——A ſmall town on the river of the ſame name. Id. ib.

ISĂDAS, a Spartan, who, upon ſeeing the Thebans entering the city, ſtripped himſelf naked, and, with a ſpear and ſword, engaged the enemy. He was rewarded with a crown for his valor. Plut.

ISÆA, one of the Nereides.

ISÆUS, an orator of Chalcis, in Eubœa, who came to Athens, and became there the pupil of Lyſias, and ſoon after the maſter of Demoſthenes. Some ſuppoſe that he reformed the diſſipation and imprudence of his early years by frugality and temperance. Demoſthenes imitated him in preference to Iſocrates, becauſe he ſtudied force and energy of expreſſion rather than floridneſs of ſtile. Ten of his ſixty-four orations are extant. Juv. 3, v. 74.—Plut. de 10 Orat. Dem.——Another Greek orator, who came to Rome A. D. 17. He is greatly recommended by Pliny the younger, who obſerves, that he always ſpoke extempore, and wrote with elegance, unlabored eaſe, and great correctneſs.

ISAMUS, a river of India.

ISAURUS, a river of Umbria, falling into the Adriatic.——Another in Magna Græcia. Lucan. 2, v. 406.

ISCHENIA, an annual feſtival at Olympia, in honor of Iſchenus, the grandſon of Mercury and Hierea, who, in a time of famine, devoted himſelf for his country, and was honored with a monument near Olympia.

ISCHOLAUS, a brave and prudent general of Sparta, &c. Polyæn.

ISCHOMĂCHUS, a noble athlete of Crotona, about the conſulſhip of M. Valerius and P. Poſthumius.

ISCHOPŎLIS, a town of Pontus.

ISCIA. Vid. Œnotrides.

ISIA, certain feſtivals obſerved in honor of Iſis, which continued nine days. It was uſual to carry veſſels full of wheat and barley, as the goddeſs was ſuppoſed to be the firſt who taught mankind the uſe of corn. Theſe feſtivals were adopted by the Romans, among whom they ſoon degenerated into licentiouſneſs. They were aboliſhed by a decree decree of the ſenate, A. U. C. 696. They were introduced again, about 200 years after, by Commodus.

Isdegerdes, a king of Perſia, appointed, by the will of Arcadius, guardian to Theodoſius the Second. He died in his 31ſt year, A. D. 408.

Isiacorum portus, a harbour on the ſhore of the Euxine, near Dacia.

Isidorus, a native of Charax, in the age of Ptolemy Lagus, who wrote ſome hiſtorical treatiſes, beſides a deſcription of Parthia.——A diſciple of Chryſoſtom, called Peluſiota, from his living in Egypt. Of his epiſtles 2012 remain, written in Greek, with conciſeneſs and elegance. The beſt edition is that of Paris, fol. 1638.——A Chriſtian Greek writer, who floriſhed in the 7th century. He is ſirnamed Hiſpalenſis. His works have been edited, fol. de Breul, Paris 1601.

Isis, a celebrated deity of the Egyptians, daughter of Saturn and Rhea, according to Diodorus of Sicily. Some ſuppoſe her to be the ſame as Io, who was changed into a cow, and reſtored to her human form in Egypt, where ſhe taught agriculture, and governed the people with mildneſs and equity, for which reaſons ſhe received divine honors after death. According to ſome traditions mentioned by Plutarch, Iſis married her brother Oſiris, and was pregnant by him even before ſhe had left her mother's womb. Theſe two ancient deities, as ſome authors obſerve, comprehended all nature and all the gods of the heathens. Iſis was the Venus of Cyprus, the Minerva of Athens, the Cybele of the Phrygians, the Ceres of Eleuſis, the Proſerpine of Sicily, the Diana of Crete, the Bellona of the Romans, &c. Oſiris and Iſis reigned conjointly in Egypt; but the rebellion of Typhon, the brother of Oſiris, proved fatal to this ſovereign. [Vid. Oſiris & Typhon.] The ox and cow were the ſymbols of Oſiris and Iſis, becauſe theſe deities, while on earth, had diligently applied themſelves in cultivating the earth. [Vid. Apis.] As Iſis was ſuppoſed to be the moon as Oſiris the ſun, ſhe was repreſented as holding a globe in her hand, with a veſſel full of ears of corn. The Egyptians believed that the yearly and regular inundations of the Nile proceeded from the abundant tears which Iſis ſhed for the loſs of Oſiris, whom Typhon had baſely murdered. The word Iſis, according to ſome, ſignifies antient, and, on that account, the inſcriptions on the ſtatues of the goddeſs were often in theſe words: I am all that has been, that ſhall be, and none among mortals has hitherto taken off my veil. The worſhip of Iſis was univerſal in Egypt; the prieſts were obliged to obſerve perpetual chaſtity, their head was cloſely ſhaved, and they always walked barefooted, and clothed themſelves in linen garments. They never eat onions, they abſtained from ſalt with their meat, and were forbidden to eat the fleſh of ſheep and of hogs. During the night they were employed in continual devotion near the ſtatue of the goddeſs. Cleopatra, the beautiful queen of Egypt, was wont to dreſs herſelf like this goddeſs, and affected to be called a ſecond Iſis. Cic. de Div. 1.—Plut. de Iſid. & Oſirid.—Diod. 1.—Dion. Hal. 1.—Herodot. 2, c. 59.—Lucan. 1, v. 831.

Ismarus (Ismara, pl.) a rugged mountain of Thrace, covered with vines and olives, near the Hebrus, with a town of the ſame name. Its wines are excellent. Ismene, a daughter of Œdipus and Jocaſta, who, when her ſiſter Antigone had been condemned to be buried alive by Creon, for giving burial to her brother Polynices, againſt the tyrant's poſitive orders, declared herſelf as guilty as her ſiſter, and inſiſted upon being equally puniſhed with her. This inſtance of generoſity was ſtrongly oppoſed by Antigone, who wiſhed not to ſee her ſiſter involved in her calamities. Sophocl. in Antig.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.——A daughter of the river Aſopus, who married the hundred-eyed Argus, by whom ſhe had Jaſus. Apollod. 2, c. 1.

Ismenias, a celebrated muſician of Thebes. When he was taken priſoner by the Scythians, Atheas, the king of the country, obſerved, that he liked the muſic of Iſmenias better than the braying of an aſs. Plut. in Apoph.——A Theban, bribed by Timocrates of Rhodes, &c. Pauſ. 3, c. 9.——A Theban general, ſent to Perſia with an embaſſy by his countrymen. As none were admitted into the king's preſence without proſtrating themſelves at his feet, Iſmenias had recourſe to artifice to avoid doing an action which would prove diſgraceful to his country. When he was introduced he dropped his ring, and the motion he made to recover it from the ground was miſtaken for the moſt ſubmiſſive homage, and Iſmenias had a ſatisfactory audience of the monarch.——A river of Bœotia, falling into the Euripus, where Apollo had a temple, from which he was called Iſmenius. A youth was yearly choſen by the Bœotians to be the prieſt of the god, an office to which Hercules was once appointed. Pauſ. 9, c. 10.—Ovid. Met. 2.—Strab 9.

Ismēnus, a ſon of Apollo and Melia, one of the Nereides, who gave his name to a river of Bœotia, near Thebes, falling into the Aſopus, and thence into the Euripus. Pauſ. 9. c. 10.——A ſon of Aſopus and Metope. Apollod. 3, c. 12.——A ſon of Amphion and Niobe, killed by Apollo. Id. 3, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 6.

Isŏcrătes, a celebrated orator, ſon of a rich muſical inſtrument maker at Athens. He was taught in the ſchools of Gorgias and Prodicus, but his oratorical abilities were never diſplayed in public; and Iſocrates was prevented by an unconquerable timidity from ſpeaking in the popular aſſemblies. He opened a ſchool of eloquence at Athens, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the number, character, and fame, of his pupils, and by the immenſe riches which he amaſſed. He was intimate with Philip of Macedon, and regularly correſponded with him; and to his familiarity with that monarch the Athenians were indebted for ſome of the few peaceful years which they paſſed. The aſpiring ambition of Philip, however, diſpleaſed Iſocrates, and the defeat of the Athenians at Cheronæa had ſuch an effect upon his ſpirits, that he did not ſurvive the diſgrace of his country, but died, after he had been four days without taking any aliment, in the 99th year of his age, about 338 years before Chriſt. Iſocrates has always been much admired for the ſweetneſs and graceful ſimplicity of his ſtile, for the harmony of his expreſſions, and the dignity of his language. The remains of his orations extant inſpire the world with the higheſt veneration for his abilities, as a moraliſt, an orator, and, above all, as a man. His merit, however, is leſſened by thoſe who accuſe him of plagiariſm from the works of Thucydides, Lyſias, and others, ſeen particularly in his panegyric. He was ſo ſtudious of correctneſs that his lines are ſometimes poetry. The ſevere conduct of the Athenians againſt Socrates highly diſpleaſed him, and, in ſpite of all the undeſerved unpopularity of that great philoſopher, he put on mourning the day of his death. About 31 of his orations are extant. Iſocrates was honored after death with a brazen ſtatue by Timotheus, one of his pupils, and Aphareus, his adopted ſon. The beſt editions of Iſocrates are that of Battie, 2 vols. 8vo. Cantab. 1729, and that of Auger, 3 vols. 8vo. Paris 1782. Plut. de 10 Orat. &c.—*Cic. Isse, a daughter of Macareus, the ſon of Lycaon. She was beloved by Apollo, who to obtain her confidence, changed himſelf into the form of a ſhepherd to whom ſhe was attached. This metamorphoſis of Apollo was repreſented on the web of Arachne. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 124.

Issus, now Aiſſe, a town of Cilicia, on the confines of Syria, famous for a battle fought there between Alexander the Great and the Perſians under Darius their king, in October, B. C. 333, in conſequence of which it was called Nicopolis. In this battle the Perſians loſt, in the field of battle, 100,000 foot, and 10,000 horſe, and the Macedonians only 300 foot, and 150 horſe, according to Diodorus Siculus. The Perſian army, according to Juſtin, conſiſted of 400,000 foot and 100,000 horſe, and 61,000 of the former, and 10,000 of the latter, were left dead on the ſpot, and 40,000 were taken priſoners. The loſs of the Macedonians, as he farther adds, was no more than 130 foot and 150 horſe. According to Curtius, the Perſian ſlain amounted to 100,000 foot, and 10,000 horſe; and thoſe of Alexander to 32 foot, and 150 horſe, killed, and 504 wounded. This ſpot is likewiſe famous for the defeat of Niger by Severus, A. D. 194. Plut. in Alex.—Juſtin. 11, c. 9.—Curt. 3, c. 7.—Arrian.—Diod. 17.—Cic. 5, Att. 20. Fam. 2, ep. 10.

Isthmia, ſacred names among the Greeks, which received their name from the iſthmus of Corinth, where they were obſerved. They were celebrated in commemoration of Melicerta, who was changed into a ſea deity, when his mother Ino had thrown herſelf into the ſea with him in her arms. The body of Melicerta, according to ſome traditions, when caſt upon the ſea-ſhore, received an honorable burial, in memory of which the Iſthmian games were inſtituted, B. C. 1326. They were interrupted after they had been celebrated with great regularity during ſome years, and Theſeus at laſt reinſtituted them in honor of Neptune, whom he publicly called his father.

These games were observed every third, or rather fifth, year, and held so sacred and inviolable, that even a public calamity could not prevent the celebration. When Corinth was destroyed by Mummius, the Roman general, they were observed with the usual solemnity, and the Sicyonians were entrusted with the superintendence, which had been before one of the privileges of the ruined Corinthians. Combats of every kind were exhibited, and the victors were rewarded with garlands of pine leaves. Some time after the custom was changed, and the victor received a crown of dry and withered parsley. The years were reckoned by the celebration of the Isthmian games, as among the Romans from the consular government. Paus. Corint. &c.—Plut. in Thes.

Isthmius, a king of Messenia, &c. Paus. 4, c. 3.

Isthmus, a small neck of land which joins a country to another, and prevents the sea from making them separate, such as that of Corinth, called often the Isthmus by way of eminence, which joins Peloponnesus to Greece. Nero attempted to cut it across, and make a communication between the two seas, but in vain. It is now called Hexamili. Strab. 1.—Mela. 2, c. 2.—Plin. 4, c. 4.—Lucan. 1, v. 101.

Istiæotis, a country of Greece, near Ossa. Vid. Histiæotis.

Istria, a province at the west of Illyricum, at the top of the Adriatic sea, whose inhabitants were originally pirates, and lived on plunder. They were not subjected to Rome till six centuries after the foundation of that city. Strab. 1.—Mela. 2, c. 3.—Liv. 10, &c.—Plin. 3, c. 19.—Justin. 9, c. 2.

Itălia, a celebrated country of Europe, bounded by the Adriatic and Tyrrhene seas, and by the Alpine mountains. It has been compared, and with some similitude, to a man's leg. It has borne at different periods, the different names of Saturnia, Œnotria, Hesperia, Ausonia, and Tyrrhenia, and it received the name of Italy either from Italus, a king of the country, or from Italos, a Greek word which signifies an ox, an animal very common in that part of Europe. The boundaries of Italy appeared to have been formed by nature itself, which seems to have been particularly careful in supplying this country with whatever may contribute not only to the support, but also to the pleasures and luxuries, of life. It has been called the garden of Europe; and the panegyric which Pliny bestows upon it seems not in any degree exaggerated. The ancient inhabitants called themselves Aborigines, offspring of the soil, and the country was soon after peopled by colonies from Greece. The Pelasgi and the Arcadians made settlements there, and the whole country was divided into as many different governments as there were towns, till the rapid increase of the Roman power [Vid. Roma] changed the face of Italy, and united all its states in support of one common cause. Italy has been the mother of arts as well as of arms, and the immortal monuments which remain of the eloquence and poetical abilities of its inhabitants are universally known. It was divided into eleven small provinces or regions by Augustus, though sometimes known under the three greater divisions of Cisalpine Gaul, Italy properly so called, and Magna Græcia. The sea above was called Superum, and that at the south Inferum. Ptol. 3, c. 1.—Dionys. Hal.—Diod. 4.—Justin. 4, &c.—C. Nep. in Dion. Alcib. &c.—Liv. 1, c. 2, &c.—*Varro de R.
